PREFACE.

THIS volume concludes the Religious Encyclopædia in advance of the German original. The revised edition of Herzog has so far reached only the thirteenth volume, to article "Ring;" but, by the kindness of the German editor and publisher, I had the benefit of several advanced sheets of letter S. For the remaining titles the editors used the last seven volumes of the first edition (XIV.–XXI., published 1861–66, to which was added an Index volume in 1868). The best articles, which will be retained in the new edition, have been reproduced, condensed and supplemented to date by competent hands. But fully one-half of the volume is made up of original matter, with the aid of a large number of English and American scholars who are known to be familiar with the topics assigned to them. For their kind and hearty co-operation we again return our sincere thanks.

The three volumes of this work are equivalent in size to about seven or eight volumes of the German work on which it is based. Our aim has been to put the reader in possession of the substance of Herzog, with such additional information as the English reader needs, and cannot expect from a German work written exclusively for German readers. It is simply impossible to make an encyclopædia of one country and people answer the wants of another, without serious changes and modifications. Moreover, an encyclopædia ought to be reconstructed every ten years; and it is hoped that this work will renew its youth and usefulness as soon as the present edition is out of date.

With the reception of the work I have every reason to be satisfied. It has met with a hearty welcome, and secured a permanent place in the reference-library of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. Competent judges acknowledge its impartiality and catholicity, as well as the ability of the leading articles, which are written and signed by conscientious scholars of established reputation. The plan of condensation has been generally approved, as the only feasible way by which such a vast thesaurus of German learning could be made accessible and useful to the English reader. Errors and defects in a work which embraces many thousands of facts and dates are unavoidable; but pains have been taken to secure strict accuracy, and mistakes are corrected in the plates as soon as discovered.

The completed work is now committed to the favor of the public with the prayer that God may bless its use for the promotion of sound Christian learning.

SAADIA HA GAON, Ben Joseph, Jewish rabbi; b. at Fayûm, Upper Egypt, 892; d. at Sura, Babylonia, 941 or 942. He was educated by the Karaites, yet he became their vigorous opponent. He is distinguished for his Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, Job, Psalms, Canticles, and other books (each of which he accompanied by brief annotations), his grammatical and lexical works, and, above all, for his treatise in defence of Judaism, Religion and Doctrines, written in Arabic, but now known only by the Hebrew translation of Judah ben-Tibbon, German translations by Furst (Die jüdischen Religionsphilosophen des Mittelalters, i. Bd., Emanuel We-Deut oder Glaubenslehre und Philosophie von Saadia Fajjumi, Leipzig, 1845) and by Ph. Bloch, in Jüdisches Literaturblatt, Magdeburg, 1878. By his translations, made between 915 and 928, he acquired such fame that in the latter year he was called to Sura in Babylon to be gaon (head teacher) of the famous Jewish school there, and held the office until his death, with the exception of four years (933-937), when he was kept from his office, and lived in Bagdad. It was in this period that he wrote his Religion and Doctrines. His position in the history of exegesis is thus indicated by Professor C. A. Briggs: "The Peshat, or literal interpretation, is used in the Targum of Onkelos and the Greek version of Aquila, with reference to the law, but found little expression among the ancient Jews. The Qarites [Karaites] were the first to emphasize it in the eighth century. Before this time there is no trace of Hebrew grammar or Hebrew dictionary. The Qarites threw off the yoke of rabbinical Halacha, and devoted themselves to the literal sense, and became extreme literalists. Influenced by them, Saadia introduced the literal method into the rabbinical schools, and used it as the most potent weapon to overcome the Qarites. He became the father of Jewish exegesis in the middle ages, and was followed by a large number of distinguished scholars, who have left monuments of Jewish learning." — Biblical Study, New York, 1883, pp. 303, 304. SAALSCHÜTZ, Joseph Levin, German rabbi; b. at Königsberg, March 15, 1801; d. there Aug. 23, 1865. He studied in the university of Königsberg; became Ph.D. in 1821, and in 1819 privat-docent in philosophy, and afterwards professor extraordinary, — the first Jew who ever received the appointment. From 1825 to 1829 he taught in the Berlin Jewish public school; from 1829 to 1835 was rabbi in Vienna; from 1835 to his death was rabbi in Königsberg. His principal works are: Das Mosaische Recht (1816-18, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863), and Archäologie der Hebräer (1856, 2 vols.).

SABAOTH (סַבְאוֹת, sabaoth, "hosts"; the transliteration occurs in the English Version only in Rom. ix. 29, cited from Isa. i. 9, and Jas. v. 4, elsewhere the translation is used). The designation of God as "Jehovah Sabaoth" is not found in all the Old Testament. It is lacking in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; is used first in First and Second Samuel (1 Sam. i. 3, 11, iv. 4, xv. 2, xvii. 45; 2 Sam. v. 10, vi. 2, 18, vii. 8, 26, 27), then in Kings, but very seldom, and only by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings xviii. 15, xix. 10, 14; 2 Kings iii. 14). In the prophetic books of Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, it frequently occurs; but in the others seldom, and in Ezekiel and Daniel not at all. It is missing in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, generally in the Psalms, entirely in the post-exilic books, except in 1 Chronicles, in direct relation to David (xi. 9, xvii. 7, 21). The original meaning of the appellation "Jehovah Sabaoth" does not imply, as many maintain, that Jehovah was a god of war; for it is precisely in that period when he was fighting in a wondrous way for his people that the appellation is unknown. In 1 Sam. xvii. 45 its juxtaposition with "God of the armies of Israel" shows that it did not mean the same as the latter. So also Ps. xxiv. 8 (cf. with 10) proves that "the Lord mighty in battle" was a different and lower conception to "the Lord of hosts." Nor are the "hosts" to be understood of the creation generally. The appellation comes from the "heavenly hosts," including both the stars and the angels, and calls attention to the position of Jehovah above both classes; hence the folly of star-worship, so common in the countries surrounding Israel. The stars are mere lights (Gen. i. 14), created for a definite purpose (Ps. civ. 19), although in their way eloquent of Jehovah's praise (Ps. viii. 3, xix. 1). Above them far is Jehovah, who made them, and rules them. Similar is the case respecting angels. They constitute the upper congregation of worshippers (Ps. cxlviii. 2, cl. 1), who praise God for his wonders of providence and grace (Ps. xxix. 9, lxxxix. 6 sqq.). They also are the messengers of God and the witnesses of his mighty acts. When God is styled "Jehovah Sabaoth," his superiority to angels is set forth; hence the epithet rebukes star-worship, and other forms of idolatry; represents him as the absolute ruler of the world, and at the same time as ready to put down every opposition to the people of his choice.

OEHLER.

SABAS, St., b. at Mutalasca, or Mutala, a village in Cappadocia, 439; d. near Jerusalem, about 531. When he was only eight years old, he gave up all his wealth, and retired into a monastery, whence he ten years afterwards went to Palestine, and settled as a hermit, and pupil of Euthymius, in the desert near Jerusalem. As his fame for sanctity increased, many Christians joined him, and a laura was formed under the rule of St. Basil. In 481 Bishop Sallustius of Jerusalem ordained him a priest, and made him abbot of an order of monks he had founded, and which was called, after him, the Sabasites. He introduced a very severe discipline, was a zealous defender of the synod of Chalcedon, founded several monasteries, and enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the Emperor Anastasius. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Dec. 5. The existing convent of Mar Saba, on the western shore of the Dead Sea, was founded by him. — Two other saints of the same name, both of whom suffered martyrdom, — the one in Rome (272), the other in Wallachia (372), — are commemorated respectively on the 24th and the 12th of April. — Finally it may be noticed that the hermit Julian of Edessa also is surnamed Sabas. SABBATARIANS. See SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

SABBATH (Heb. shabbath; Gr., to sabbaton, or ta sabbata), the seventh day, regarded among the Israelites as holy, and a day of rest. It is of divine origin, its type being the seventh day, on which God rested from all his work. Moses introduced the sabbath first in connection with the manna (Exod. xvi. 5, 22–30), in such a manner as indicated that the sabbath was as yet unknown to the people. The people by observing the sabbath, having experienced its blessing, received then the commandment concerning that day on Sinai. The expression in Exod. xx. 8, “Remember the sabbath day,” is not intended to remind of the sabbath as an ancient institution, but it rather means that the people should always remember the now existing order of the sabbath. The signification of the sabbath can only be known from the Old Testament (cf. Gen. ii. 3; Exod. xx. 11, xxxi. 13–17), which is as follows: God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh day: he therefore blessed and sanctified this day of completing his work. In like manner, the people which he had sanctified unto himself, and which acknowledged the Creator and Lord of the world as their God, was to sanctify, after every six days of labor, the seventh day as a day of rest; and this was to be a sign of the covenant between God and his people. These sentences convey the following ideas. (1) Like God, so is man to work and to rest. The life of man is to become a likeness of the divine: especially are the people, called to be the organ of establishing a divine order of life upon earth, to be known as the people of the living God by the change of labor and rest, corresponding to the rhythm of the divine life. (2) In blessed rest the divine work is finished: because the creating God rests satisfied in the contemplation of his works, his creation itself is finished. In short, “the seventh day is not the negation of hexahemerum, but the blessing and sanctification of the same.” Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed harmony of existence. In the same manner, also, the whole history of men was to complete itself in an harmonious order of God, as is already guaranteed in the sabbath of the creation, and prefigured in the sabbath seasons. The rest of God on the seventh day of creation, which is without an evening, moves over the whole course of the world to receive it at last in itself. The whole fourth chapter in the Epistle to the Hebrews bears upon this; viz., that the rest in God is to become also a rest for men.

But we get the full object of the sabbath idea by combining it with the dominion of sin and death which have entered into the development of the human society. After the divine curse had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined to work for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing interruption, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest returning regularly, this order became a thankful feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is said (Deut. v. 15), “And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt,” etc. But there is yet another point. The sabbath has only its significance as the seventh day, which is preceded by six work-days. The first part of the commandment concerning the sabbath, which is a commandment itself (Exod. xx. 9), reads, “Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God.” Only in consequence of preceding labor the sabbath is to follow, as work and creation completes itself in God in blessed rest. The word in Gen. iii. 19 retains its force, only that the sabbath becomes “a corrective for the injuries inflicted on men living under the curse of sin, by the heavy and oppressing work, and at the same time detracting from God.” We need not dwell here on the humane character of the Mosaic law, which in its enactments provides also for the rest of the servant and stranger as well as for the cattle (Exod. xx. 19, xxiii. 12). From what has been said, we see that the sabbath is a divine institution, a divine gift sanctifying the people (Ezek. xx. 12). The day was celebrated by rest from labor (Exod. xxxiv. 21; Num. xv. 32), and by a special burnt offering presented in the temple in addition to the usual daily offering, which was doubled on this day (Num. xxviii. 9). In the holy place of the temple the show-bread was renewed (Lev. xxiv. 8). Deliberate profanation of this day was punished with death (Exod. xxxi. 14 sq., xxxv. 2), which was inflicted by stoning (Num. xv. 32 sq.). The Israelites had to bake and cook their food for the sabbath on the preceding day (Exod. xvi. 23), to which undoubtedly refers the injunction in xxxv. 3. They were also forbidden to leave the camp on the sabbath day (Exod. xvi. 29), and, with reference to this, travelling on the sabbath was afterwards also forbidden. Marketing and public trade ceased on the sabbath (Neh. x. 31, xiii. 15, 16), and it was merely an auxiliary police regulation of Nehemiah to close the gates on that day (Neh. xiii. 19). But the passages in Nehemiah, especially x. 31, show that at that time a strict observance of the sabbath had not yet been customary among the people. The measures, however, which Nehemiah took for the sake of a more quiet sabbath contain nothing of that micrological casuistry which prevailed in later times; and when the Chasidim suffered their enemies to cut them down, rather than to arm on the sabbath (1 Macc. ii. 32 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 11), Mattathias, apprehending the great danger which would accrue to the Jews, laid down the injunction that it was permitted to take defensive measures against the enemy, and to abstain from offensive operations (1 Macc. ii. 41; 2 Macc. viii.

26). This principle prevailed afterwards (Jos., Ant. XIV. 4, 2), but not always (Jos., War. II. 19, 2). The inventive spirit of later times laid down the minutest and strictest sabbath regulations, which are contained in the Talmud, and a whole Talmud treatise is devoted to this subject. That this micrology had already been developed in the time of Christ, we know from such passages as Matt. xii. 2, John v. 10 sq. In spite of these minute injunctions which were hedged about the sabbath, this day was to be regarded as a day of joy. The meals for the sabbath were prescribed, every one was to eat three meals; and the Talmud Shabbath (fol. 118, col. 1) says, "Whoever observes the three meals on the sabbath will be saved from the birth-pains of Messiah, the judgment of hell, and the war of Gog and Magog." SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY (Acts i. 12). From the injunction in Exod. xvi. 29 the scribes laid down the rule that an Israelite must not go two thousand yards beyond the limits of his abode. The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the ark and the tents. Whilst the rab-bis on the one hand regulated the walking on the sabbath days by allowing only a certain space, yet on the other hand they also contrived certain means whereby the sabbath-day's walk could be exceeded, without transgressing the law, by the so-called mixtio terminorum, or connection of distances. They ordained that all those who wished to join their social gatherings on the sabbath were to deposit on Friday afternoon some article of food in a certain place at the end of the sabbath-day's journey, that it might thereby be constituted a domicile, and thus another sabbath-day's journey could be undertaken from the first terminus. Not only does an entire Talmudic treatise (Eruvin) treat on this "connection of distances," but rabbinism has also invented a prayer for that purpose, "Blessed art thou, Jehovah, who hast commanded (!) us the erub" (i.e., connection of distances). SABBATHARIANS, or NEW ISRAELITES, is the name of a religious sect founded by Joanna Southcott (b. about 1750, at Gittisham in Devonshire), who regarded herself as the bride of the Lamb, and declared herself, when sixty four years of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the "Second Shiloh," whom she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and sabbath. A costly cradle was kept in readiness for the reception of the Messiah, and for a long time she waited for his birth. At last a supposititious child was declared to be he. But the fraud was detected, and those who participated in it were led around with the picture of Southcott in the public street. Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1814; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish sabbath and the ceremonials of the law in order to receive the hoped-for Messiah in a worthy manner. Her writings number sixty separate publications, of which the best known is the Book of Wonders, London, 1813-14, 5 parts. Comp. BLUNT: Dictionary of Sects, s.v. "Southcottians;" MATTHIAS: *J. SABBATHICAL YEAR AND YEAR OF JUBILEE. (1.) The Sabbatical Year.—The laws respecting the sabbatical year embrace three main enactments,—rest for the soil, care for the poor and for animals, and remission of debts. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 5-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Dent. xv. 1-3) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release of the seventh year was final, or merely lasted through the year. The former is in general the Jewish view (cf. Mishna Shebi'ith, x. 1), and was also Luther's view. Seven such sabbatical years closed with (H.) The Year of Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8-11), which is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year. It was to be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month. Like the sabbatical year, it was to be celebrated by (1) giving rest to the soil (Lev. xxv. 11, 12). While the law enjoins, that, as on the sabbatical year, the land should be fallow, and that there be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year, yet the Israelites were permitted to gather the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay it up in their store-houses. Another law connected with this festival was (2) manumission of those Israelites who had become slaves (Lev. xxv. 39-54), and (3) reversion of landed property (Lev. xxv. 13-34, xxvii. 16-21). Houses which were not surrounded by walls were treated like landed property, and were subject to the law of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 31), whilst such as were built in walled cities, in case they had not been redeemed within a year after the sale, became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv. 29, 30), and the jubilee year had no influence upon it. The houses of the Levites in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-8) were exempt from this general law of house-property. The only exceptions to the general rule were the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilee, instead of reverting to their original proprietors, they at the jubilee became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxvii. 20, 21).

As to the design of the sabbatical and jubilee year, we may say that the spirit of this law is the same as that of the weekly sabbath. Both have a beneficent tendency, limiting the rights, and checking the sense of property: the one puts in God's claims on time; the other, on the land. The land shall "keep a sabbath unto the Lord" (Lev. xxv. 2). This is the main idea. Man, by withdrawing his hand from the cultivation of the soil, and putting it at the disposal of Jehovah's blessing, hereby actually acknowledges the exclusively divine right of possession. At the same time, the land pays a debt to Jehovah (cf. Lev. xxvi. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21), and thus returns, in a certain sense, to that condition which it had before the words of Gen. iii. 17 were pronounced: yea, more, the sabbatical year points typically to that time when the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). The jubilee year, in which the sabbath cycle completes itself, takes up in itself the idea of the sabbatical year, but has its special significance in the idea of the redeeming restitution, and of bringing back the theocracy to the original divine order, where all are free as servants of God, and where every one enjoys the fruits of his inalienable possession. God, who once redeemed his people from Egypt's bondage, appears here again as their Redeemer, by giving liberty not only to the slave, but also by providing for the poor a certain portion of the heritage of his people, since there was to be no poor among the covenant people (Deut. xv. 4). To bring about such a year of grace, sins had to be forgiven: therefore the year of jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement. As the year in which the restitution of all things will take place, the year of jubilee in the prophecy of Isa. lxi. 1-3 (fulfilled in Christ, Luke iv. 21) is taken as a type for the messianic time of salvation, in which, after all the battles of the kingdom of God have been victoriously fought, the dissonances of the history of mankind will be lost in the harmony of the divine life, and, with the rest that remaineth for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9), the acts of history will be closed.

As to the practicability of the system of these institutions, it was possible, provided the people were willing to sacrifice all selfish interests to the divine will. In how far this order was executed in the post-Mosaic period, we know not; but that the sabbatical year was not celebrated in the last centuries before the exile, we know from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. After the exile, the people took it upon themselves to observe the sabbatical year (Neh. x. 31); and from that time on it seems to have been observed (cf. 1 Mace. vi. 49, 53; Joseph, Ant. XII. 8, 1, XIV. 10, 6, XV. 1, 2; War. I. 2, 4). As for the year of jubilee, its laws seem not to have been carried out; yet there might have existed an era according to jubilee periods.

The rabbinic laws concerning the sabbatical year are contained in the Mishna treatise Shebiith; but these laws had only reference to Palestine itself, because it is said (Lev. xxv. 2), "When ye come into the land." Outside of Palestine there was no sabbatical year. Comp. the arts. OEHLER. (B. PICK).

SABBATIER, Pierre, b. at Poitiers, 1683; d. at Rheims, March 22, 1742. He entered the Benedictine order in 1700, and is famous for his edition of the Itala version, Bibliorum sacrorum Latine versiones antiquæ, seu Vetus Italica (Rheims, 1743-49), which was published under the supervision of Ballard and Vincent de la Rue.

SABBATIUS, a converted Jew, who was ordained priest by the Novatian bishop of Constantinople, Marcan, but afterwards, in the last years of the fourth century, caused a schism in the Novatian sect. By the synod of Paz in Phrygia, it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated at the same time as the Jewish passover; and this decree was accepted by Sabbatius, who at the same time commenced to aspire to the episcopal dignity, and to form a party in Constantinople. Meanwhile the Novatian bishops of Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, etc., convened a synod at Sangarum in Bithynia, by which the difference as to the celebration of Easter was declared an adiaphoron; but Sabbatius was by oaths compelled to renounce his aspirations of episcopal consecration. He, nevertheless, continued his intrigues, and was actually consecrated by some country bishops, but was then banished to Rhodes, where he died. His bones were afterwards brought to Constantinople; and by his followers, the Sabbatians (see NOVATIANS), he was honored as a martyr.

SABELLIUS is the most pronounced and most influential representative of the Jewish monotheism within the pale of the Christian Church. He knows only one divine substance; and he also knows only one divine person, or one hypostasis. The two ideas of substance and person, or substance and hypostasis, are to him identical; and he designates them with the same name, — the monad. This monad, he acknowledges, does not remain a mute unity. It develops into a triad; but the triad is not the unity of three persons, such as is the teaching of the orthodox church, but simply three different manners in which the one uniform substance is revealed, three different points of view from which it may be looked upon, three different relations in which God places himself to the world. As an illustration, Sabellius reminds his pupils of the round globe of the sun (the Father), his power of light (the Son), and his power of heat (the Spirit). The three links of his triads appear in other places to be merely three stages in the divine self-evolution; and, as soon as the whole course of that self-evolution has been perfected, the triad returns to, and becomes fully absorbed by, the motionless monad. Of the writings of Sabellius, only a few fragments have come down to us in HIPPOLYTUS (Philos., IX., 11), EPIPHANIUS (Har., 62), and ATHANA-

SUS (Contra Arian oratio), [collected in RUTH: Reliquie Sacree]. Of his life also very little is known. He was a presbyter, and seems to have been a Libyan by birth, from the Pentapolis. He spent some time in Rome in the beginning of the third century. His doctrine found adherents both in Rome and in his native country, and in 260 or 261 he was excommunicated by Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria. But his influence, or rather the influence of the view he represented, reaches down to Schleiermacher [and Bushnell. See the art. ANTI-TRINITARIANISM, and SCHAEFF: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed. (1883), vol. ii. pp. 580 seq.].

TRECISEL.

SABIANS. The name occurs for the first time in the Koran (Sur. 2, 59; 5, 73; 22, 17). Its place in the enumeration—Moslems, Jews, Sabians, Christians, Magians, and Polytheists—shows that it there denotes a monotheistic people: it, no doubt, refers to the Mendaans; which article see. How it afterwards came to be applied to a Pagan people settled in Northern Mesopotamia, more especially in Harrân, has been told us by an Arabic writer from the ninth century,—en-Nedim, a Christian. The caliph el-Mamûn (813-833) passed through that region on one of his expeditions against the Byzantine emperor, and all the peoples gathered to salute him. By their long hair and peculiar dress the people of Harrân attracted his attention; and he asked them whether they were Jews, or Christians, or Magians. As they could give no satisfactory answer, he allowed them to consider the matter until his return, when they would have to conform to one of the religions recognized by the Koran. They were thrown into great consternation by this resolution. Some of them adopted Islam, others Judaism, others, again, Christianity; but most of them clung to their old Paganism, concealing the fact by assuming the name of the Sabians. The caliph, however, never returned, and the question was dropped. But the name was continued.

Those Sabians of Harrân were Syrians by descent: but, since the time of Alexander the Great, numerous Greek colonists had lived among them; and, through its close contact with Greek mythology and philosophy, their Syrian Paganism had gradually assumed a Greek coloring. Greek names were used in their mythology, not as representing the true Greek gods, but simply as applied to similar Syrian deities; and in the same manner they had also introduced various biblical names, no doubt in order to propitiate the Mohammedans. Some of them called Hermes, others Buddha, and others again, Abraham, the founder of their religion. It was essentially a star-worship. To the sun, the moon, and the five planets—Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn—temples of angular shape were erected, and suitable sacrifices (in pre-Mohammedan times also of human beings) were offered. To each of these heavenly bodies a peculiar metal was ascribed,—gold to the sun, silver to the moon, etc.,—and the days of the week were called after them. But, besides those angular star-temples, round-shaped temples were built for the worship of certain deities representing abstract ideas,—the first cause, necessity, the soul, etc.; and finally, also, genii and demons were worshipped. SABINA, one of the most celebrated martyrs and saints of the Roman-Catholic Church; lived as a widow of distinguished social position in Rome, or in some city of Umbria, in the middle of the second century, and was instructed in Christianity by Serapia, a young girl from Antioch, and probably a slave. Both suffered martyrdom, and are commemorated on Aug. 29. In 430 their remains were entombed in the church in Rome erected in honor of them. See Act. Sanct. Aug. 29.

SABINIANS, Pope (Sept. 13, 604-Feb. 22, 605); succeeded Gregory the Great, as whose apocrisiarius he had acted in Constantinople, and is said to have introduced the announcement of the canonical hours by bells. He was succeeded by Boniface III.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, b. in Wiltshire, about 1672; d. in London, June 5, 1721; was graduated at Oxford, 1696, and appointed preacher at St. Saviour's, Southwark, in 1705. In 1709 he preached two sermons, which, on account of their political bearing, gave the gravest offence to the ministry and the majority of Parliament (Whigs). He was impeached for libel by the House of Commons; and in 1710 he was convicted by the peers, and suspended for three years from the ministry. He was ardently supported, however, by the Tories, the clergy, and the country squires; and the excitement caused by his trial contributed much to the defeat of the Whigs in the general election of 1710 and the downfall of Godolphin and his colleagues. In 1713 he was made rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in which position he died. See The Life of Dr. H. Sacheverell, London, 1711.

SACHS, Hans, b. in Nuremberg, Nov. 5, 1494; d. there Jan. 20, 1576; was the son of a tailor, but frequented, from 1501 to 1509, the Latin school of his native city, in which he learned "Puerilia, Grammatica, und Musica, auch Rhetorica, Arithmetica, Astronomia, Poeterey, und Philosophia." He complains, however, that he soon forgot all that he had learned; and, in spite of the comprehensive and varied reading which his writings evince, he calls himself an "unlearned man, who understood neither Greek nor Latin." In 1509 he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and in 1511 he commenced the professional wanderings which formed an important element of the education of a thorough mechanic. He visited all the principal cities of Germany, and in the guilds of his trade he studied at the same time the craft of his profession and the art of poetry. The master-singers were mechanics, and every Sunday or holiday they assembled in the afternoon in the church or in the guild hall. A "singing"-match took place; and he whose poem won the prize received a wreath of silken flowers, or a woollen string with a silver coin bearing the image of King David. Hans Sachs felt that only among the master-singers he could find what he considered enjoyment and amusement; and in 1511, in Munich, he appeared for the first time among them as a "singer" with the poem, Gloria Patri Lob und Ehr. In 1516 he returned to Nuremberg, settled there as a shoemaker, married, and, while he sustained a numerous family with the proceeds of his professional labor, he developed a literary activity which soon made him the "prince and patriarch of the master-singers." Nuremberg was at that time a free imperial city, and at the height of its prosperity. Charles V. often visited it; Luther praised it highly; among its citizens were Albrecht Dürer (d. 1528), Peter Vischer (d. 1529), Andreas Osiander (1522-49), Peter Henlein (d. 1540), Lazarus Spengler (d. 1531), and others. Among these men, — known all over Germany, some of them all over the world, — Hans Sachs took rank. He became the representative poet of his age, and by the outspoken tendency of his poetry he occupied a place in the history of the German Reformation. It was the first rule of the Nuremberger master-singers, that nothing should be written against Luther's Bible; and, when the competing poems were tested, one of the judges had the office of comparing their ideas and their language with that book.

Hans Sachs was an exceedingly prolific author, and is in this respect surpassed only by the Spanish poet, Lope de Vega. His works consist of thirty-four large volumes in folio, written with his own hand, and containing 6,636 pieces, of which several hundreds are dramas, the rest epics and lyrics. The poetical tone of these pieces is very various, — tragic and comical, humorous and sentimental, sarcastic and enthusiastic; but the æsthetic character is always the same, always didactic: the ideal contents is some moral proposition, and the tendency of this proposition points directly towards the Reformation. Among his poems, which generally were printed on fly-leaves, and in that form scattered throughout all Germany, some of the most celebrated are his transcriptions of Luther's translation of the Psalms; Die Wittenbergisch Nachtigall, in seven hundred verses, and giving an explanation of the difference between "divine truth and human lies;" Eyn wunderliche weysagung, in thirty strophes, and with a preface by Osiander, giving thirty pictures of the Pope in glory and in distress. It was forbidden, and the poet was rebuked by the magistrates; but immediately after, appeared Inhalt zweierlei Predigt: Hec dicit Dominus Deus — Sic dicit papa, etc. His dramas comprise tragedies, comedies, farces, fables, and dialogues (Schwänke and Fassnachtsspiele), and were represented by himself and his brother-mechanics in the guild-hall or in private residences on festal occasions. Among his tragedies is one on the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise, in three acts and with eleven dramatis personæ, 1553; another, on the last judgment, in seven acts and with thirty-four dramatis personæ, 1558, etc. Of his comedies, the most celebrated is Die ungleichen Kinder Eve, which he recast three times. The idea he took from Philip Melancthon: God-Father visits Eve, takes her two sons on his knees, and examines them in Luther's Catechism. — Abel answers every question correctly, Cain always goes wrong. (See Corpus Reform., iii, 653; and K. Hase: Das geistliche Schauspiel, Leipzig, 1858, pp. 217-239.) Also his Hecastus is interesting in various respects. (See K. Goedecke: Every-man, Homulus und Hecastus, Hanover, 1865.) His dramas are often dialogues between virtues and vices; and even his Schwänke and Fassnachtsspiele, — such as The devil marrying an old woman, The pious nobility which alone has the right of robbery, The man who hears his wife confessing, etc., — although they certainly have not only the intention, but also the power, of "dispelling melancholy," are, nevertheless, constructed on a strictly moral plan and for a decidedly moral purpose.

King Louis I. of Bavaria put a bust of Sachs in the Ruhmeshalle at Munich; Kaulbach put him in the foreground of his great picture, The Reformation; and in 1874 a bronze statue of the famous shoemaker was erected in the Spitalplatz at Nuremberg. [The earliest collective edition of his works appeared in Augsburg, 1570-79, 5 vols. folio, reprinted at Kempten, 1612-17, 4to; selections from his poems form vols. iv., v., vi., of GOEDECKE and TITTMANN'S Deutsche Dichter des 16. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1870-72, 3 vols., new ed., 1871. A new edition of his poems by ADALBERT v. KELLER is in the Bibliothek des literarischen Vereins zu Stuttgart, 1870 sq. (13th vol., 1883). His Fassnachtsspiele have been edited by E. GOETZE for the series Neudrucke deutscher Literaturwerke d. XVI. u. XVII. Jahrh., Halle, Nos. 26, 27 (1880), 31, 32 (1881), 39, 40 (1883), and in the same series, for the first time, Der hürnen Scufried (a tragedy in seven acts), No. 29 (1880). The majority of his works have not yet been printed.] The most comprehensive biography of Sachs is by SALOMON RANISCH, Altenburg, 1765; there is another by J. L. HOFFMANN, Nuremberg, 1847. [See F. SACK, August Friedrich Wilhelm, b. Feb. 4, 1703, at Harzgerode, in the principality of Anhalt-Bernburg; and d. in Berlin, April 23, 1786; was educated at Bernburg; studied theology at the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; visited, as tutor to a young nobleman, the universities of Leyden and Groningen; spent three years (1728-31) at Hohenleben as tutor to the young prince of Hesse-Holmurg; and was in 1731 called as third preacher to the German-Reformed congregation in Magdeburg. In 1740 he was made court-preacher in Berlin; and in this position he opposed with great energy, but also with perfect tact, the French scepticism and English deism which through many channels found their way to the court of Friedrich II. In 1745 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, and in 1750 he was made a member of the consistory. In 1748 he published his chief work, Vertheidigte Glauben der Christen, of which a second edition appeared in 1773; and from 1735 to 1764 he published six volumes of sermons, several of which were translated into Dutch, French, and English. His biography (Berlin, 1789, 2 vols.) was written by his son, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried Sack (b. in Magdeburg, Sept. 4, 1738; d. in Berlin, Oct. 2, 1817), and his successor as court-preacher and in the consistory, with the title of bishop. R. H. SACK.

SACK, Karl Heinrich, b. in Berlin, Oct. 17, 1790; d. at Poppelsdorf, Oct. 16, 1875. He was docent in the university of Berlin (1817), extraordinary professor in Bonn (1818), and ordinary professor (1832). In 1817 he was called to Magdeburg as Consistorialrath, and later made Ober-consistorialrath. He was a representative of the so-called "right" of the Schleiermacher school.

His writings are numerous. The chief are Christliche Apologetik, Hamburg, 1829, 2d ed., 1841; Christliche Polemik, 1838; Die Kirche von Schottland, Heidelberg, 1844-45, 2 parts; Die evangelische Kirche u. d. Union, Bremen, 1861; Geschichte d. Predigt von Mosheim bis Schleiermacher, Heidelberg, 1866, 2d ed., 1875; Theologische Aufsätze, Gotha, 1871.

SACK, Brethren of the (Saccati, Saccitæ, or Saccophori), often, like the monks of Grammont, the Minims, the Cathari, and Waldenses, styled boni homines, formed an ecclesiastical order somewhat similar to that of the Augustines. It was founded in France about 1200, and confirmed by the Pope in 1219. It received its name from the sack which its members used as a garment, and spread rapidly, not only in France, but also in England. In 1275, however, it was dissolved by the Council of Leyden; and in 1293 the remaining members were incorporated with other orders. In his Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzerien, i. p. 437, Walch places the Brethren of the Sack among the Encratites. They abstained from flesh and wine, held no property, went about barelegged with wooden sandals on their feet, etc.; but it was, no doubt, heretical views which caused the early dissolution of the order. Besides these fratres saccati, there was also an order of sack-bearing nuns, founded in 1261 by King Louis IX. of France, on the suggestion of his mother, Blanche. They called themselves "Penitent Daughters of Jesus," or, with reference to their garment, Saccarior, and lived in nunneries near St. Andrew's in Paris. But also this order was soon abolished, even while its founder was still living; though there was in London, as late as 1357, a nunnery whose inmates wore sacks of hemp, and walked barefooted. KLIPPEL.

SACRAMENT (from sacramentum, which in classical usage means an oath, especially a military oath, and also a gauge in money laid down in court by two contending parties) is not, strictly speaking, a scriptural term, but occurs repeatedly in the Latin Vulgate as a translation of the Greek μυστήριον, "mystery" (Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 9, v. 32; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Rev. i. 20). It came into technical ecclesiastical use with Tertullian at the close of the second century and the beginning of the third. It was first loosely employed for all sacred doctrines and ceremonies, like the Greek μυστήριον, and then more particularly for baptism and the eucharist, and a few other solemn rites connected with Christian worship. In the Greek Church they are called "mysteries." St. Augustine defines sacrament in the narrower sense to be the visible sign of an invisible grace (signum visibile gratiæ invisibilis). To this was afterward added by Protestants, as a third mark, that it must be instituted not only by the church, but by Christ himself, and enjoined upon his followers in the New Testament. Sacraments are also called signs, seals, and means of grace and of public profession. The Reformed churches emphasize the sealing character of these ordinances; the Roman Church makes them the channels of all divine grace.

The number of the sacraments is by Protestants confined to two, viz., baptism and the Lord's Supper (corresponding to circumcision and the passover in the Old Testament); because these alone are instituted by Christ, and commanded to be observed to the end of time. The Roman Catholic and the Greek churches add to them five others, viz., confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and matrimony. The number was so fixed by the schoolmen of the middle ages, who defended it by various illustrations taken from the sacredness of seven,—the seven needs of human life, the seven virtues, and seven sins or infirmities, etc. The Council of Trent anathematizes those who teach that there are more or less than seven sacraments (esse plura vel pauciora quam septem sacramenta).

As to the efficacy of the sacraments, the confessions of the Reformed churches require faith as a subjective condition; while the Roman Catholic Church teaches that the sacraments work ex opere operato, i.e., by the inherent power of the institution, or by the performance of the act, independently of the moral character of the priest and the state of the recipient. Two of the sacraments, baptism and ordination, are supposed to confer an indelible character, and cannot be repeated: once baptized, always baptized; once a priest, always a priest. This does not exclude, however, the danger of losing the benefit, and consequent excommunication and deposition.

There has been much controversy about the sacraments (especially the Lord's Supper, which is sometimes emphatically called the sacrament) between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and also between Luther, Zwingli, and their followers. Calvin occupied a mediate position between the two on the sacramental question, and his views passed into the Reformed Confessions. The Quakers reject the sacraments as external ceremonies, and hold only to internal baptism or regeneration by the Spirit, and internal communion with Christ. See STEITZ, in Herzog xiii. 261-299, and arts. on the several sacraments, especially BAPTISM and LORD'S SUPPER.

SACRIFICATI, in ecclesiastical antiquities, denote a subdivision of lapsi; those, namely, who sacrificed to the Pagan gods in order to escape persecution. In the time of Trajan the mere profession of Christianity was considered a crime against the State; but those Christians were forgiven who declared themselves willing to recant, and offer up incense before the statues of the emperor and the gods (sacrificati et thurificati). Many Christians who shrank from actually sacrificing escaped, through the avarice of the Roman officials, by buying certificates that they had complied with the law (libellatici). But even this was severely rebuked by the Church; and, at least as long as the persecutions lasted and the Church had to guard against apostasy, rigid measures were enforced against the sacrificati. See LAPSI.

SACRIFICES. See OFFERINGS.

SACRILEGE (sacrilegium) corresponds to blasphemy, as acts to words, and denotes a crime against God. Canon law, or, more especially, the Roman casuists, distinguish between sacrilegium immediatum (a crime committed against that which by itself is holy, such as unworthy participation in the Lord's Supper, robbery of a monstrance containing the consecrated wafer, etc.), and sacrilegium mediatum (a crime committed against that which is sacred because it is devoted to God, such as church-robbery, molesting or hindering a clergyman in the performance of his office, etc.). Sacrilegium mediatum is further subdivided into personale, reale, and locale, but none of these distinctions have any significance in modern legislation.

Between the Mosaic law and the Roman, there is a striking difference with respect to their conceptions of sacrilege. According to the Mosaic law, sacrilege could be committed by a Jew only; and the punishment which he incurred comprised complete restitution or compensation, a fine of one-fifth of his income, and an expiatory sacrifice (Lev. v. 15, 16, xxii. 11, 16). When the crime was committed by a non-Jew, the Lord himself was expected to avenge the deed (see 1 Sam. v. 6; the Philistines having taken the ark of the Lord, and brought it to Ashdod; Jer. i. 28, li. 11, and elsewhere). With the Romans the crime of sacrilege became only so much the more aggravated by having been committed by a foreigner, and death was always the punishment. In the older Roman law sacrilegium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacra to secular uses, but also the appropriation of objects not sacra which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See CICERO: De legibus, i. 16.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacra in a sacred place and the stealing either of res sacra in a profane place or of objects not sacred in a sacred place; only the first case was defined as sacrilegium; the two last, as simple theft (furtum). In the Christian Church the crime appeared very early; and complaints occur that clergy and laymen took away from the churches wax, oil, etc. The decrees of the Mosaic law were applied, and excommunication was added (Can. Apost., c. 72, comp. c. 73). But the crime spread, and is more and more frequently mentioned in the decrees of the synods, the writings of the Fathers, the penitentials, etc., though at the same time the penalties became heavier and heavier (REGINO: De synodalibus causis, lib. ii. c. 276 sq.). By degrees, as the Germanic element became prominent in the legislation of the nations of Central and Western Europe, the Germanic conception of sacrilege as violation of the sacredness of the church prevailed, and the Roman distinction between res sacra and non sacra was abolished (Lex Ribuariorum, tit. ix. cap. 8; Lex Alamannorum, tit. v. vii.; Lex Bajuvariorum, tit. i. cap. 3, 6; Capitulare Paderbrunnense, a. 755, c. 3, in PERTZ: Monum. German., t. iii. fol. 48). In Lex Frisionum we even find an old law concerning the sacredness of the Pagan temples applied directly to the Christian churches. Of great interest is the legislation of Charles V. on this point (1532). Here is a return to the distinctions of the Roman law, though in such a way that the appropriation of res sacra or of res non-sacra, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SACRISTY and SACRISTAN. The sacristy is sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convent, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are to take part in the service assemble. The person who has charge of that room or building is the sacristan.

SACY, Louis Isaac Le Maistre de, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Jan. 4, 1684; studied at Beauvais together with Antoine Arnauld; was ordained priest in 1648, and became in 1650 confessor and spiritual director of the recluses of Port-Royal. During the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1666, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1668, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal; but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. He is principally known by his translations of the Bible. In 1667 appeared his Le Nouveau Testament, traduit en Français, generally called Nouveau Testament de Mons, though it was printed in Amsterdam by the Elzevirs. It was vehemently attacked by several bishops, condemned by Pope Clement IX. (April 20, 1668), defended by Arnauld and Nicole, and caused a controversy which lasted twenty years. La Sainte Bible, containing the Fulgata, a translation into French, and notes (Paris, 1672, 32 vols.), was often republished, and is still widely used in France. Les Psaumes de David, also with notes, appeared in 1679. See SAINT-ÉLUC: Port-Royal, vol. ii.

SADDUCEES. All sources agree in putting Sadduceism in opposition to Pharisaism. It is not the name of a sect, but of a party which refused to adopt the exaggerations of ritualistic and ascetic formalism of Pharisaism. In a certain sense the Pharisees were the innovators. Their peculiar teachings were additions to the law, which the Sadducees regarded as sole authority; and thus only can we understand the reluctance of the latter against the traditional system, and its religious and ascetical requirements, as well as the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection. Being forced by the natural course of things to make an opposition in the field of public and social life, the Sadducees were finally entangled in political difficulties, till they thus became the opponents of the Pharisees in matters of which they had not thought at the beginning. Less favored by the people, they easily accommodated themselves to make political connections with foreigners, as the misfortunes of the nation required it, and to live in peace with a world which they could neither conquer nor with which they could assimilate themselves. They took things as they were; they went their own way, and had no sympathy with the people, which from the very start was pharisaically inclined, because the Pharisees had the appearance of greater piety, and because they hated every thing foreign. Thus the Sadducees became at last only a political coterie, and with the destruction of Jerusalem they disappear from history. From a political point of view it must be said that they were wiser and more far-seeing than the Pharisees, and that they cannot be blamed for the final catastrophe. It must be said of them that they refused to gain an influence by hypocritical demagoguery which they could not gain by straight measures; still, this also must be said, that most of them, by befriending themselves with Greeks and Romans, and serving a foreign policy, had their personal interest in view, and cared just as little for the religious interests of the nation as for the civil.

This brings us back to our assertion that the Sadducees, still less the Pharisees, formed a sect. Towards the Pharisaic Judaism they observed a cold neutrality; and it is sufficient to say that the very basis of Judaism, the idea of the theocracy, was violently shaken. The weakening of the theocratic principle naturally led to giving up other ideas connected with it: hence the messianic hope and teachings, including the dogma of resurrection, appeared to them as chimerical.

In the New Testament the Sadducees are mentioned in Matt. iii. 7. xvi. 1. 6. xxiii. 23, 31; Mark xii. 18; Luke xx. 27; Acts iv. 1. v. 17. xxiii. 6-8. From the Gospel narrative it seems to be evident that at that time these parties opposed each other more on political grounds; and this seems to be clear from the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles, where the Sadducees always opposed the Christians, while the Pharisees favored them in many respects (Acts v. 17, 31). How are we to explain this phenomenon? or are we to believe that Christianity, after the death of Jesus, had degenerated into sheer Pharisaism? The fact, however, seems to be this: the preaching of Jesus which concerned the inner life naturally brought it into conflict with the Pharisees. But the moving power and vitality of the first Christian Church was the messianic hope; and this it shared with the Pharisees, who beheld in it something which they could utilize for their special purposes; whereas the Sadducees regarded it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, if not demagogical.

Occasionally we also hear (Acts xxiii. 8) that the Sadducees believed neither in angels nor spirits, whereas the Pharisees believed in both; and this we explain best by bearing in mind, that, as political parties, one affirmed what the other denied. Passing over from the New Testament to Josephus, who has always been regarded as the main authority in this respect, we are led to the supposition that the Sadducees were a school of philosophers; and for Greek readers every thing that concerned the future life belonged to the sphere of speculation. But the Jewish historian studiously avoided giving his readers an inside view of the political party-machinery; and that the Sadducees were philosophers was the more believed, since Josephus asserted that they denied the doctrine of fatalism, but contended for the freedom of the will. And whereas we will not deny that there were some speculating spirits among the Sadducees, yet we must bear this in mind, that Josephus only mentions what serves his purposes, thus deceiving the inexperienced and inconsiderate reader. And the scanty notices which we find in the Talmud also lead us to the supposition that both Pharisees and Sadducees were nothing but parties; that in the main they both stood on the ground of the same Judaism as far as the inner relations were concerned, and that in this sphere there were no oppositions which had to lead to a rupture; for evidently both parties were represented in the Sanhedrin, where they could defend their different ideas, but always with a view of gaining a victory which would need endanger the State.

More confused are the notices which we find in the writings of the church Fathers, and especially in those of mediæval Judaism. The Sadducees, as we have seen, were friends of the foreigners; and, as they mostly belonged to the aristocracy, it cannot be remarkable, that, by their aversion to asceticism, they gave offence by their luxury and immorality. But this did not necessarily belong to the party, and was also not the cause why later Jews called them Epicureans; for the latter name in rabbinic writings denotes all kinds of heresy; and we can easily perceive, how, with the increasing narrowness of the ecclesiastical horizon, such imputations could be made, and it is also very characteristic that Christian writers should have taken this up, and made the rabbinic-Pharisaic mode of intuition their own. To this source belongs the myth concerning the origin of the Sadducees. Of a renowned teacher of the third century before Christ, Antigonus of Socho, we are told in the Mishna (Pirke Aboth, 1, 3), that he recommended to his disciples the exercise of virtue without any view of reward. In the Gemara, and later by other authorities, we are told Antigonus had two disciples, Zadok and Baithos, who, he it is alleged, or inadvertently, drew the inference from their teacher's maxim that there is no reward and no future life. This is the origin of Sadduceism. Whether and how the Sadducees and Baithosians were the same or not, no one could rightly understand any more. Yet there are still some scholars who believe in the existence of Zadok and Baithos; whereas the highest antiquity is silent concerning them, and prefers the etymological explanation of the name "Sadducees" [i.e., from Heb. for "just"]. Often the Sadducees have been identified with the Karaites, but the only relation between the two consists in the rejection of the Pharisaic-rabbinic system of tradition.

SADOLETO, Jacopo, b. at Modena in 1477; d. in Rome, Oct. 18, 1547; studied philosophy and rhetoric at Pisa, Ferrara, and Rome, and became secretary to Leo X. in 1514, and bishop of Carpentras in 1517. During the reign of Adrian VI., who had no taste for literature, Sadoleto, who was best known for the elegance of his style, and as author of some poems, lived at Carpentras; and, although Clement VII. called him to Rome as his secretary, he soon again returned to his episcopal see. During the next ten years he wrote—besides De liberis recte instituendis liber, Interpretatio in Psalmum, Miserere mei Deus, etc.—his chief work, In Pauli epistolam ad Romanos Commentarium libri tres. It gave offence in Rome on account of its Semi-Pelagian views, and Sadoleto undertook to alter it. In 1536 Paul III. again called him to Rome, made him a cardinal, and employed him frequently in diplomatical negotiations with Francis I. and Charles V. He was very active, and very successful as an administrator and diplomatist, but continued to cultivate his literary and philosophical tastes. His Phædrus sive de Philosophia appeared in 1539. The best collection of his works, including his letters and his biography by Fiordibello, was published in Verona, 1737-38, 4 vols. fol. See PÉRICAUD: Fragments biographiques sur Jacob Sadoleto, Lyons, 1849; JOTY: Étude sur Sadoleto, Caen, 1857; BALAN: Monumenta, vol. i., Innsbruck, 1855. A fresh collection of his letters, ed. SAGITTARIUS, Kaspar, b. at Luneburg, Sept. 23, 1643; d. at Jena, March 9, 1694; was educated in the gymnasium of Lübeck; studied theology and philosophy in the university of Helmstadt; was appointed rector of the school of Saalfeld in 1668, and professor of history in the university of Jena in 1671. He was possessed of an almost encyclopædic knowledge, travelled much in Germany and Denmark, examining the archives and libraries, and published a number of valuable works relating to the history of Thuringia and Saxony. In 1691 he published at Jena his Theologische Lehr- sätze von dem rechtmässigen Pietismo, in which he protested against the use of the term "pietism" as a nickname, as the religious stand-point thereby denoted was indeed the true representative of Christianity. The book was hotly attacked, especially by superintendent Johann Schwartz of Querfurt; but Sagittarius left none of his adversaries without an answer: Theses apologetice theologice (1692), Christlicher New-Jahrs-Wunsch an alle evangelische Theologos (1692). He also wrote Historia vite Georgii Spalatini (1693), and Introductio in historiam ecclesiasticam. See J. A. SCHMID: Commentarius de vita et scriptis Caspari Sagittarii, Jena, 1713. NEUDECKER.

In 1770 he entered the Jesuit college at Landsberg, and after the dissolution of the order, in 1773, he studied theology and philosophy at the university of Ingolstadt. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and appointed repetitor publicus in theology and philosophy. In 1780 he was made professor of dogmatics, and in 1781 he moved to Dillingen as professor of pastoral theology. But on Nov. 4, 1794, he was suddenly dismissed, accused of participation in secret political intrigues, and of connection with the Illuminati; and for many years he lived in retirement in Munich or at Ebersberg, developing, however, a great literary activity. His orthodoxy had long been suspected by the Ultramontanists, but the suspicion was entirely without ground. However much he at times was harassed by doubts (see his book, Der Friede, 1821), he never swerved from that which forms the essential and vital points of the Roman Catholic faith; and his opposition to the rationalism and indifference of the age was energetic and successful. Meanwhile his works—Briefe aus allen Jahrhunderten, Grundlehren der Religion, Glückseligkeitslehre (afterward entitled Moralphilosophie), Ueber Erziehung für Erzieher, Die Weisheit auf der Gasse, etc.—gathered a considerable number of disciples around him. Without forming a theological school, he wielded a great religious influence, and he received tempting offers from abroad. In 1818 the king of Prussia offered him the archiepiscopal see of Cologne. But he declined; he would not leave Bavaria. In 1821 he was made caputular at Regensburg; in 1822, coadjutor to the bishop; in 1829, bishop. A collected edition of his works, consisting of forty volumes, was commenced in 1820, but not completed until after his death. The most prominent among his disciples was Melchior Diepenbroek (q. v.). SAINT-MARTIN, Louis Claude de, le philosophe inconnu, b. at Amboise, Jan. 18, 1743; d. in Paris, Oct. 13, 1803; the only noticeable theosophist the French tongue has produced. He grew up in a devout home, was educated in an ecclesiastical institution, studied law, entered afterwards the army, and became, while a young officer in the garrison of Bordeaux, an enthusiastic adherent of Dom Martínez de Pasqualis. The papal, however, soon separated from the master, entered into connection with Cagliostro, studied Swedenborg, resigned his position in the army, wrote books which attracted much attention, — Des erreurs et de la vérité (1775), and Tableau naturel des rapports entre Dieu, l'homme, et l'univers (1782), — and travelled extensively in England, Italy, and Germany, making everywhere intimate acquaintance with the mystical spirits of the age, William Law, Best, the Galatini family, and others. From 1788 to 1791 he lived in Strassburg, his "paradise;" and while there he studied Jacob Boehme, and wrote L'homme de désir (1790), Ecce homo (1792), and Le nouvel homme (1792). The French Revolution he hailed with great enthusiasm; but he soon discovered the utter lack of moral responsibility which characterized its movements, and he sent out a word of warning, Lettre à un ami (1796), Eclair sur l'association humaine (1797), Esprit des choses (1800); but his books were not read, and his last independent work, Ministère de l'homme Esprit (1802), was completely thrown into the shade by Chateaubriand's Génie du Christianisme. In the last years of his life he was much occupied with a French translation of Jacob Boehme, which, considering the enormous difficulties, is remarkably well done. Most of his own works were translated into German and commented upon by Frantz von Baader. His life has been written by GENCE (1821), L. MOREAU (1850), SAINT-LEVE, in Causées du Lundi, vol. x., CARO (1852), SCHAULR (who published his correspondence, 1862), and MATIER (1862). A consistent theosophical system he did not give; but deep glimpses of Christian truth sparkle everywhere in his books in close proximity to singular expressions of the prejudices and the fanaticism of his time.

SAINT-SIMON DE ROUVROY, Count Claude Henri, b. in Paris, Oct. 17, 1769; d. there May 19, 1825. He was educated for the army, and fought with bravery in the American War of Independence. But from early youth his brain was busy with great social schemes. In Mexico he proposed to cut a canal through the isthmus; in Spain he proposed to connect Madrid with the sea. During the Revolution he speculated in confiscated estates, made a fortune, kept a magnificent establishment in Paris, squandered all his riches, and found himself penniless just as he had finished his great plan of a complete social reorganization, — the consummation of the Revolution. He proposed to Madame de Staël-Holstein, in order to have her as a partner in his great scheme of revolutionizing society; but she declined the offer. And from that moment till his death he often had to fight against actual starvation. His books attracted no attention, — Lettres d'un habitant de Genève, 1802; Introduction aux travaux littéraires du 19^e siècle, 1808, 2 vols.; De la réorganisation du société européenne, 1814; L'industrie, 1817, etc., — though he found enthusiastic pupils among men like Augustin Thierry and Aug. Comte. In despair, he attempted to commit suicide, but was fortunately prevented. On his bed of suffering he wrote his two best books: Catholicisme politique, 1823-24; and Nouveau Christianisme, 1825. In many respects he was far in advance of his time. He had not the prejudices of many of his contemporaries. He was aware of the part Christianity has played in the history of civilization, and he spoke with respect of the labor of the lower clergy. But his knowledge was utterly incomplete, and led him to extremely wrong views. He considered the Reformation a retrograde movement. Most influence he has exercised through his disciples, Olinde Rodrigues, Bazard, Enfantin, and others. His life was written by G. HERMARD, Paris, 1857. G. REICHENSCHUTZ.

SAINTS', Day of All. See ALL-SAINTS'-DAY.

SAINTS, Worship of the. The apostolic designation of Christians as "saints" (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2) was used down to the days of Irenæus and Tertullian. The inclination early developed itself to apply the term in a peculiar sense to such Christians as had lived exemplary lives, and had witnessed a steadfast confession in life and death, often a martyr's death. As early as the second part of the second century, congregations were celebrating the memory of martyrs. The day of their martyrdom was called the day of their birth (γενέθλιον τῶν μαρτύρων), and set apart for special services; and the place where the remains of a martyr were interred was regarded as consecrated. There the story of his sufferings and death was related once a year, and the Lord's Supper celebrated in token of the communion of saints. Eusebius (IV. 15) states that the Church of Smyrna honored the bones of Polycarp above silver and gold. In the fourth century a yearly festival of all saints and martyrs was appointed by the Eastern Church. One of Chrysostom's homilies (De martyribus totius orbis) was delivered on this festival. The Western Church did not appoint an all saints' day till the seventh century.

The respect for the memory of the saints gradually degenerated into a worship of saints and their relics. The monkish system, which began in the third century, was the occasion of exaggerated accounts of the piety and power of men who spent their lives in caves, devoting themselves to the most severe ascetic practices. Miracles were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Augustine, and others exalted their memories [in treatises and sermons on the saints called Panegyrics], and attributed to them a part in the judgment and power, by their intercessions, to become protectors of men on earth. It was taught that they not only interceded for the pardon of sins, but for the relief of physical infirmities (Ambrose: De Tobia 9). Chapels and churches were erected over their bones, and relics were carried as amulets. Their aid was sought at the inception of journeys, for ships at sea, etc. Special saints were associated with different cities, lands, and occupations. Peter and Paul are the patrons of Rome; James, of Spain; Andrew, of Greece; Gregory of Tours, of France; Luke, of painters; John and Augustine, of theologians; Ivo, of jurists; Crispin, of shoemakers, etc. Vigilantius of Barcelona protested vigorously in the fifth century against such worship as idolatry, but Jerome defended the practice with vigor.

The worship of saints was fixed in the Oriental Church by the Second Nicene Council (787), John of Damascus having before argued for the practice. The theologians of the West took up the subject, and advanced arguments in favor of the custom. Peter Lombard, Alexander of Hales, and Thomas Aquinas display much skill in this direction, but distinguished between the worship (cultus, adoratio) due to God, and the worship (venera, invocatio) due to saints. Thomas demanded for Mary an honor lower than that due God, and yet higher than that due the saints (hyperdulia). The increasing host of the saints was divided into six classes; and the Roman Breviary ordains that they shall be addressed ("Apostles, martyrs, etc., pray for us") at all other times than the high festivals. The art of the middle ages was likewise devoted to bring out the emblems and peculiarities of the saints. Peter was pictured with the keys, John with a lamb upon his arm, Paul with a sword, Bartholomew with a knife, etc. On account of the smuggling-in of martyrs, the Pope was called upon to declare who were saints; and in 993 John XV. canonized the first saint in the person of Bishop Ulrich of Augsburg.

In the eleventh century Guibert, abbot of Nogent raised his voice against the abuses of saint-worship in his work, De pignoribus Sanctorum. Wiclif ridiculed those who sought the intercession of any other than Jesus Christ. Nicolaus of Clemanges, in his De nobis celebritatibus non insituentibus, advocated a return to the practice of the early ages, when the worship of the saints did not prevail to the exclusion of the worship of God. The Reformers lifted up their voices in sternest protest against the practice of the church, and the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, condemning all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic divines endeavor in vain to find a scriptural warrant for it in Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, xx. 4; and, if they appeal to the Disciplina Arcana of the first centuries, Protestants reply by giving a different explanation of that secret discipline.

The legends of the saints form a large literature, which is full of fancies and falsehoods. Calendars and Martyrologies dating back to the eighth century are in existence. The collection most highly prized in the East is that of SIMEON METAPHRASTES of the twelfth century. The Legenda Aurea of JACOB DE VORAGINE is highly prized in the West. The most important of the later works is the Acta Sanctorum, edited by the BOLLANDISTS, [Antwerp, 1643 sqq., Paris, 1875; Mrs. JAMIESON: Sacred and Legendary Art, London, 1818, 2 vols.; Legends of the Monastic Orders, 1850; BERING-GOULD: Lives of the Saints, London, 1873-77, 15 vols.]. SALMANTICENSES. Towards the close of the sixteenth and in the beginning of the seventeenth century the hostility between the Dominicans and the Jesuits became very intense in Spain. Pope Paul V. commanded the contending parties to keep silence; but the controversy continued; and at Salamanca, the headquarters of the Dominican camp, the professors took an oath to give a pure representation of the views of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, without any Semi-Pelagian coloring. For this purpose the celebrated Collegii Salmanticensis cursus theologicus was published, Salamanca, 1631 sqq., 9 vols.; Lyons, 1679, 12 vols.; new ed., Paris, 1871 sqq., 20 vols. It was directed against Molinos. The principal authors were ANTONIUS DE OLIVERO, DOMINICUS A S. THERESIA, and JOHANNES AB ANNUNCIATIONE. ZÖCKLER.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, b. at Semur in Burgundy, April 15, 1588; d. at the baths of Spa, Sept. 3, 1653; one of the greatest scholars of his age, and famous for his Defensio regia pro Carolo I. (1649), which called forth the sharp answer of Milton. He studied at Paris and Heidelberg; was in 1632 appointed professor of classical literature and language at Leyden; and went in 1650 to Sweden, on the invitation of Queen Christine. Among his works several — De primatu papæ, De episcopis et presbyteris, De transsubstantiatione, Super Herode infanticiola, etc. — have theological interest.

SALMERON, Alphonso, b. at Toledo on Oct. 8, 1515; d. at Naples, Feb. 13, 1585. He studied at Alcalá and Paris; joined Ignatius Loyola, and became one of the founders and most active members of the Society of Jesus. Fanatical in his resistance to the Reformation, he visited almost every country in Europe, was present at the Council of Trent as papal theologian, and wrote commentaries on most of the books of the New Testament.

SALT (חֶמֶץ, hémets) plays in the Bible an important part: in the Old Testament through its use in all sacrifices (Lev. ii. 13; Mark ix. 49), and in the New Testament through its symbolical application to the position of Christians in the world (Matt. v. 13). The Mosaic injunction rests upon the Oriental custom of eating salt, on the ratification of a covenant, as the pledge of perpetual and mutual friendship between the contracting parties, because of its property of preservation; hence a lasting covenant was called "a covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron.

xiii. 5). The salt of the sacrifice symbolized the firmness of the bond between Jehovah and Israel. But salt was also strewn over a cursed place to indicate that nothing could any longer be allowed to grow there, because there can be no vegetation where the ground is saturated with salt (Deut. xxix. 23; Judg. ix. 15; Zeph. ii. 9); hence "a salt land" was a barren land (Job xxxix. 6; Jer. xvii. 6). The necessity of employing salt in cooking is expressed in Job vi. 6. Josephus (Antiq. XII. 3. 3) states, what of course would be understood, that in the temple there was always a great quantity of salt. It was also for sale in the temple-marts (MAT: Diss. de usu salis, Giessen, 1692).

The salt thus used was obtained principally from the valley of salt (2 Sam. viii. 13), south of the Dead Sea, where the soil is entirely covered with salt, left there every year on the recession of the waters; from Jebel Usdum, two or three miles south of the Dead Sea, substantially a mountain of rock-salt, about seven miles long, from a mile and a half to three miles wide, and several hundred feet high, and by evaporating Dead Sea water. According to Josephus, only "Sodomitish" salt could be used in the temple [cf. CAZOVZOV: Appar., p. 718]. The reasons of this regulation were, (1) that this salt was a witness to the terrible consequences of God's wrath, and a constant exhortation to repentance, and (2) it was a product of the Holy Land itself. But since Oriental salt contains many mineral impurities, by exposure to rain or dampness it may lose its savor; hence our Lord's expression (Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 31). Christians lose their savor by undue exposure to the sinful world. [By "salt-pits" (Zeph. ii. 9) are meant such pits as the Arabs still dig on the shore of the Dead Sea in order that they may be filled when the spring freshets cause the sea to overflow. Then, when the water has evaporated, the sides of the pits are found to be incrustated with salt an inch thick.] WILHELM PRESSEL.

SALT SEA (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3), commonly, although never in the Bible, called the Dead Sea. The Bible writers also call it the "sea of the plain" (Deut. iv. 19), the "east sea" (Joel ii. 20; Ezek. xlvii. 18; Zech. xiv. 8), and "vale of Siddim" (Gen. xiv. 3). The designation "Dead Sea" was given by early Greek writers; so the Arabs call it, more commonly, however, Bahr Lut ("Lake of Lot"). It is sixteen miles east from Jerusalem, is forty-six miles long, and ten and a third wide at the widest part, and covers nearly three hundred square miles. In shape it is oblong; on each side are mountains. The Jordan empties into it, as do also several minor streams; but the lake has no outlet; hence the water is impregnated with mineral substances, containing, on an average, twenty-five per cent of solid substances, half of which is common salt, and has extraordinary buoying qualities, and a specific gravity of from 1.021 to 1.256. From the presence of chloride of magnesium the water gets its bitter taste; from chloride of calcium, its smooth and oily touch. The lake is surrounded by "unmixed desolation." But it is not true that birds flying over it drop dead, for there are numerous varieties of birds on its shores; but no fish can live in it. The bottom of the lake is gradually sinking. See LIEUT. W. F. LYNCH: Narrative of the United States Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea, Phila., 1849, 9th ed., 1853; F. H. SALTZMANN, Friedrich Rudolph, b. at Strassburg, March 9, 1719; studied jurisprudence and history; travelled as tutor to Baron von Stein, afterwards Prussian minister of state; settled in 1776 in his native city, and began publishing a political paper, but was suspected of aristocratic tendency, and compelled to flee in 1793. After the fall of Robespierre he returned, and resumed his activity as an editor. But in the mean time a great change had taken place in his inner religious life. He had become acquainted with the French and German mystics; and though he kept aloof from the so-called spiritists, Mesmer, Cagliostro, etc., he became himself a pronounced mystic. Of his religious writings, Es wird alles neu werden (1802-10), Das christl. Erbauungsbuch (appearing from 1805 for several years), Blick in das Geheimniss des Rathschlusses Gottes (1810), Religion der Bibel (1811), found many readers on both sides of the Rhine, and even in Northern Germany. He died after 1820. MATTER.

SALVATION. See REDEMPTION.

SALVATION ARMY, The, is a body of men and women, joined together after the fashion of an army, with a general, colonels, majors, captains, and lower officers, under whom are the privates, bent, as they claim, upon presenting the gospel in a manner to attract the attention of the lowest classes. Its organizer and leader is William Booth, by baptism a member of the Church of England, but by conversion a Wesleyan, and afterwards a minister of the Methodist New Connection. In this latter capacity he had great success; but in 1861 he withdrew from the regular ministry, and devoted himself to independent evangelistic work. In 1865 he came to the east of London, and there began the movement which resulted in the organization of the "Salvation Army" in 1876. The name comes from the methods adopted and the object aimed at. The army studiously avoids, as far as may be, religious phraseology, calling its place of meeting "Salvation Warehouses" and "Salvation Stores," puts its notices in military or startling terms, and deliberately adopts peculiar posters and window placards to announce its presence and work. Its object is everywhere to make a sensation. The expenses of the army are borne by collections. Care is taken to have its pecuniary affairs as public as possible, and its expenses low. In doctrine it is broadly evangelical. It does not teach sinless perfection, but the possibility of "a heart from which the blood of Christ has been used away all unrighteousness." It does not seek to draw persons from existing churches; but it does seek to make converts among the most abandoned classes, who lie outside of religious influences. Much noise and confusion attend its operations, but these it considers necessary accompaniments. The members of the army wear a peculiar though plain uniform, parade the streets with martial drumming, banners, and singing, are obligated to go anywhere they may be sent, and exhibit courage bordering upon recklessness. In November, 1881, according to report of the army's "commissioner for the United States of America," the army had 500 stations, 1,400 officers wholly paid by the work in England. It had spread all over Great Britain, the North of Ireland, the United States of America, and had entered Sweden, France, India, Africa, and New Zealand. In the United States it had 50 stations, including 3 in California, 99 permanently engaged officers, and during 1882 and 1883 had purchased, by contributions of "those blessed through the work of the army," nine properties valued at $38,000. The War Cry, the army's organ, had a circulation of twenty thousand weekly. See All about the Salvation Army, London, 1883, 28 pp.

In 1883 the army was expelled from several cantons of Switzerland (Geneva, Bern, and Neuchâtel) as disturbers of the peace.

SALVE, a salutatory formula of great solemnity, is used as the opening word in many celebrated Latin hymns, of which we mention, Salve, caput cruciatum, one of the seven passion-hymns by St. Bernard, translated by Mrs. Charles (Christian Life in Song); "Hail, thou Head! so bruised and wounded;" by Alford (Year of Praise); "Hail! that Head with sorrows bowing;" by Baker (Hymns, Ancient and Modern); "O sacred Head, surrounded." — Salve, festa dies, toto venerabilis ævo, a resurrection-hymn by Venantius Fortunatus, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.); "Hail, festal day! ever exalted high;" in Læta Eucharistica; "Hail, festal day! forevermore adored;" in Schaff's Christ in Song; "Hail, day of days, in peals of praise." — Salvete, flores martyrum, by Prudentius, translated into English by Chandler (Hymns of the Primitive Church); "Hail, infant martyrs;" by Cuswall (Hymns and Poems); "Flowers of martyrdom." — Salve mundi salvatore, a passion-hymn, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.); "All the world's salvation, hail;" and by Kynaston (Læta Messianica); "Jesus hail! the world's salvation."

SALVIANUS, b. in Gaul, probably at Cologne [Preves], in the beginning of the fifth century; d. as presbyter, in Marseilles, after 455; was an elegant and prolific writer. Of his works are still extant, De ueritate, written about 440, first edited by Richardson, Basel, 1528, a denunciation of the avarice of the laity, in favor of the church; De gubernatione Dei, often called De providentia, written about 451, first edited by Brassicanus, Basel, 1530, a defence of divine Providence, somewhat resembling the De civitate Dei by Augustine; nine letters to different persons. Collected editions of his works were published by Pithecox (Paris, 1580), Baluzius (Paris, 1669), [C. Halm (Berlin, 1878), F. Pauly (Wien, 1883)]. There is a French translation by Grégoire and Colombet, Paris, 1831. See also F. PARRY: Die handschriftliche Uebersetzung des Salvianus, Wien, 1881 (11 pp.).

SALZBURG. From Bohemia, the Hussite movement penetrated into the diocese of Salzburg, and in 1120 Archbishop Eberhard III. was compelled to employ very severe measures in order to suppress that heresy in his countries. Apparently it succeeded. Nevertheless, the very first writings of Luther caused a singular commotion throughout the whole population; and when Stau-pitz, Paul Speratus, Stephan Agricola, and Georg Schaefer had successively preached the views of the Reformation in the country, the archbishop, Wolfgang Dietrich, found it necessary not only to silence and expel a number of preachers, but to cleanse the very flocks. In 1588 he issued a decree ordering the inhabitants of the city of Salzburg either to return to the Roman-Catholic faith, or to leave the country within a month; and in 1614 the edict was extended to the whole country, and enforced by means of a swarm of Capuchins and a troop of soldiers. Again, for some time, the country seemed on the right path, until in 1655 a priest in the Tennenregger valley discovered a whole congregation of secret Lutherans. They used the Bible, Luther's Catechismus, Spangenberg's postils, and Urban Rhegius's Seelenarzney (medicine for the soul) for their edification and instruction; and they assembled often in the dead of night for common prayer and singing. The archbishop, Maximilian Gandolph, ordered them to present their confession of faith; but, the confession being a very simple statement of purely biblical views, it was found utterly heretical; and in spite of the interference of the elector of Brandenburg and the diet of Ratisbon, the archbishop gave his subjects the option between recantation and exile. The next year, however, Gandolph died; and the question was dropped by his successor. But in 1728 Leopold Anton ascended the episcopal chair, and his principal object was to amass power and wealth for himself and his family. The heresy question seemed to him a suitable point of operation; and he declared that he would have the heretics out of the country, even though all the field should be covered with thorns and thistles. The Jesuits were let loose on the population, and chicaneries very rapidly turned into actual persecutions. The old conditions were revived, — recantation, or exile; and, in order to suit the purposes of the archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such measures were utterly at variance with the stipulations of the peace of Westphalia, complaints were made both to the emperor in Vienna, and to the diet at Ratisbon; and Prussia, Denmark, Holland, and England interfered. The archbishop charged a committee with investigating the whole matter, and placing it on a legal footing. The committee travelled from county to county to register the names of the Protestants, and hear their complaints; and as it gave golden promises of religious freedom, and justice in every respect, the Protestants were not slow in coming forward. But, when the archiepiscopal government discovered that no less than 20,678 persons wished to separate from the Roman-catholic Church, it immediately changed its policy. Austrian troops were sent for, and quartered upon the Protestant households; and a kind of dragonades was introduced. Only with great difficulty could the Protestants obtain permission to leave the country, and their children and property were retained. In this great emergency the king of Prussia came to the aid of his co-religionists. He threatened to adopt a similar policy towards his Roman-Catholic subjects, and formally invited the Salzburg Protestants to come and settle under his sceptre. The archbishop was compelled to yield, and a regular emigration was arranged. No less than 18,000 people were removed to Prussia, and Leopold Anton lived to see thorns and thistles cover large tracts of his country. See GÖCKING: *Emigrationsgeschichte der Salz. SAMARIA AND THE SAMARITANS. Samaria is the name of a city of the province. 1. City. It was, according to 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24, built by Omri, the sixth king of Israel, who, after the burning-down of his palace at Tirzah, bought a hill from a certain Shemer, on which he built a city which he called Shomron, after the former possessor. Samaria continued to be the metropolis of Israel for the remaining two centuries of that kingdom's existence; was twice besieged by the Syrians (1 Kings xx. 1; 2 Kings vi. 24-vii. 20), but without effect, till at last it was taken by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xviii. 9, 10), and the kingdom of the ten tribes was destroyed. After this capture, Samaria appears to have continued, for a time at least, the chief city of the foreigners brought to occupy the places of the departed natives. At the time of the Maccabees, Samaria was again a fortified city; for Josephus describes it as a very strong city (Ant., XIII. 10, 2). John Hyrcanus took it after a year's siege, and razed it (Joseph., Wars, i. 2, 7, Ant., XIII. 10, 2). By directions of Gabinius, Samaria and other demolished cities were rebuilt (Ibid., XIV. 5, 3); but its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, in honor of the Emperor Augustus. It was colonized by six thousand veterans and others, for whose support a district surrounding the city was appropriated. Sebaste is to-day a poor village.

2. Province. As such, Samaria is first mentioned 1 Macc. x. 30, then in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4 sq.; Acts i. 8, viii. 1, 5, ix. 31, xv. 3), and by Josephus (War, III. 3, 4). Two hours from Samaria, towards the south-east, lies Nablus, the ancient Sichem, the seat of Samaritan cult, where, for a very long time, the Samaritans, or, as they call themselves, the Shomerim, i.e., custodians of the law, lived.

3. Samaritans. When Cyrus permitted the Jews to rebuild the temple, the colonists of Samaria asked to be permitted to take part in the work of building (Ez. iv. 2). On being refused to do so, the Samaritans succeeded in preventing the erection of the temple for twenty years, and offered the same unrelenting opposition to Nehemiah, when in 445 he set about rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, which till now had lain in ruins. They welcomed with open arms any refugees from Jerusalem, who for crime, or to escape the strict Mosaic rule there established, might wish to leave their country (Jos., Ant., XI. 8, 7). No doubt the stern reforms introduced by Nehemiah on his second visit (Neh. xiii.) were highly distasteful to many who preferred the laxity which had crept in during his absence, and to these an asylum was always open at Sichem. The alienation between the two nations was finally completed when the Samaritans at last succeeded in erecting a rival temple on Gerizim, and endeavored to transfer thither the prestige of the older one of Jerusalem. The immediate occasion of the undertaking was the refusal of Manasseh, brother of Jaddua the high priest, and son-in-law to Sanballat the Samaritan governor, to dissolve his irregular marriage in obedience to the admonition of the Jewish elders. To reward him for his constancy, Sanballat exerted himself to erect a rival sanctuary, and there established him in the high priesthood. With this the separation between the Jews and Samaritans became final, and up to this day they have perpetuated their mutual hatred. On the troubled scene of politics which opened after the death of Alexander the Samaritans suffered equally with the Jews. Under Ptolemy Lagi, a colony of Jews and Samaritans was deported into Egypt. Under John Hyrcanus, their temple was destroyed about 130 B.C.; and many Samaritans emigrated to Damascus, where they built a temple. Under the Romans, they first enjoyed many liberties; but their unquiet spirit caused them often great troubles. Under Vespasian, a revolt was quelled with the loss of 11,600 persons, and Sichem received a garrison and the name Flavia Neapolis. The rest which they enjoyed under the rule of the Antonines was interrupted under Commodus, Septimius Severus, Constantine, and Constantius. Quieter times fell to their lot under Julian, Valentinian, and Valens; their fortunes varied under the later emperors. Laws unfavorably affecting their position were passed by Honorius and Theodosius II. The latter even forbade them to erect new synagogues. The hatred with which they had formerly regarded their Jewish rivals began to concentrate itself upon the Christians, now that the new faith had become that of the empire. In the year 484, while under the rule of Zeno, they attacked the church at Nablus, maimed the bishop, and murdered many of the worshippers, committing the like atrocities at Caesarea also. Under Anastasius and Justinian, fresh troubles broke out. In 529 a general revolt of the Samaritans took place against the Christians. The severity with which this was put down by Justinian, followed by the enactment of severe laws against them, completely crushed the Samaritan people. Many fled to Persia; many became Christians. In 636 they fell under Mohammedan rule. During the time of the crusades they came, in 1099, into the power of the crusaders; and, with the exception of some temporary occupations by the Saracens, remained under the Christians till 1211, when they again became subject to Mohammedan rule. Since 1517 they have been under Turkish rule. Brief notices of the Samaritans and their country appear in the works of Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century). But little was known of them till the close of the sixteenth century, when Joseph Scaliger first opened communications with them, addressing a letter to the congregations at Nablus and Cairo. Answers arrived in 1589, but not till after Scaliger's death. In 1671 Robert Huntington, bishop of Raphoe, chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, paid a visit to Nablus, procured from them a Pentateuch, and in conjunction with Thomas Marshall, rector of Lincoln's College, Oxford, carried on a correspondence with the Samaritans, which lasted, with intervals, till the latter's death, in 1685. About this time a few letters also passed between them and the celebrated Job Ludolf; and then, with the exception of one letter addressed, in 1790, to their "Samaritan brethren" in France, nothing more is heard of them till 1808, when the bishop and senator Grégoire set about making inquiries with regard to them by means of the French consular agents in Syria. These letters are of high value; and, together with notices which we find in the works of modern travellers, they give us an insight into their literary and religious state. As to their Doctrines, they are strict monotheists, and reject all images. They believe in angels and astrology. They believe in a day of retribution, when the pious will rise again, false prophets and their followers will be cast into the fire, and burned. The coming of the Messiah is to take place immediately before the day of judgment, or six thousand years after the creation of the world. As these have now elapsed, he now, though all unknown, is going about upon earth. The Samaritans expected in 1853 a great political revolution, and that in 1863 the kings of the earth would assemble the wisest out of all nations, in order, by mutual consent, to discover the true faith. From the Israelites, i.e., Samaritans, will one be sent; and he will be the Taeb. He will gain the day, lead them to Gerizim, where under the twelve stones they will find the Ten Commandments (or the whole Torah), and under the stone of Bethel the temple utensils and manna. Then will all believe in the law, and acknowledge him as their king, and Lord of all the earth. He will convert and equalize all men, live a hundred and ten years upon earth, then die, and be buried near Gerizim; for upon that pure and holy mountain, which is fifteen yards higher than Ebal, no burial can take place. Afterwards will all the earth remain some hundreds of years more, till the seven thousand are completed, and then the last judgment will come on.

Festivals.—At the present day the Samaritans celebrate seven feasts in the year; though only one, the passover, is observed with its former solemnities. [A minute and interesting account of the ceremonies of this feast is given by Stanley: History of the Jewish Church, i. pp. 131 sq., 359 sq. The Liturgy for this feast is very rich; thus every evening during the feast the "dream of the priest Abisha" is read, to hear which only the elders are permitted. This dream is contained in Cod. 1907. Add. MSS. Brit. Museum. There are passover hymns composed by the high priests Marka, Pinchas, and Abisha, given by Heidenheim: Verzeichniss, iii. 94 sq., 357 sq., 475 sq. There exists also a History of the Exodus, a so-called Pischa-Haggadah, which Dr. S. Kohn published, with a German translation, in Abhandlungen der Deutschen Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1876, No. 4.] The second feast, celebrated on the 21st of Nisan, or last day of unleavened bread, is marked by a pilgrimage to Gerizim. The third feast is Pentecost; the fourth, that of Trumpets; the fifth is the Day of Atonement. The first and eighth days of tabernacles count for the remaining feast-days. The sabbath, moreover, is kept with great strictness; the years of jubilee and release are also still observed.

The Samaritans have two more days of assembly, though they do not count them as holidays, termed Sammoth, on which the number of the congregation is taken; and, in return, every male over twenty years of age presents the priest with half a shekel, in accordance with Exod. xxx. 12–14, receiving from him a calendar for the coming six months, prepared from a table in his possession. From these offerings the priest gains his living. He may consecrate any of his family that he pleases to the priesthood, provided the candidate be twenty-five years of age, and never have suffered his hair to be cut. Like other Orientals, he never removes his turban, and thus is not easily to be distinguished from the rest of the congregation; but, in accordance with Lev. x. 6, he does not "rend his clothes" by wearing a slit on his sleeve, as other Samaritans; and, when the roll of the law is taken from the ark, he, like his assistants, places a cloth, which they call tal-lith, around his head. They wear white turbans; ordinarily they are compelled, by way of distinction from Mohammedans, to wear them of a pale-red color. They may cut their hair, or not, as they please, but not their beards, this being forbidden in Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5. Women must let their hair grow, and wear no earrings, because of them the golden calf was made. For fear of scandalizing the Mohammedans, none but the old ones venture to attend the synagogue. When a boy is born, great rejoicing is held; his circumcision always takes place on the eighth day after birth, even though it be a sabbath. Boys marry as early as fifteen or sixteen, girls at twelve. The Samaritans may marry Christian or Jewish girls, provided they become Samaritans. When a man has a childless wife, he may take a second, but, if she also be barren, not a third. Divorces, though permitted, are uncommon. The dead are prepared for burial by their own friends: the whole body is washed, but especially the hands (thrice), mouth, nose, face, ears, both inside and out (all this is Mohammedan fashion), and lastly the feet. The burial takes place, if possible, before sunset the same day, accompanied with the recitation of the law and hymns. [The following is a part of a litany for the dead:—

"Lord Jehovah, Elohim, for thy mercy and for thine own sake, and for thy name, and for thy glory, and for the sake of our lords Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and our lords Moses and Aaron and Eleazar and Ithamar and Phineas and Joshua and Caleb, and the holy angels, and the seventy elders, and the holy mountain of Gerizim, Beth El. If thou acceptest this prayer, may there go forth from before thy holy countenance a gift sent to protect the spirit of thy servant N., the son of N., of the sons of N., . . . daughter . . . from the sons of N., . . . O Lord Jehovah, in thy mercy have compassion on him (or her), and rest his (her) soul in the garden of Eden, and forgive him (or her) and all the congregations of Israel who flock to Mount Gerizim, Beth El. Amen. Through Moses the trusty. Amen. Amen. Amen."]

These readings are continued every day to the next sabbath, the women of the family watching near the grave. On the sabbath it is visited by the whole congregation, except the near relations, who eat there together, reciting part of the law, and singing hymns, finishing the recitation later in the day with the relations.

Of the Old Testament they only have passages from the present Hebrew text, often agreeing with the Septuagint. It is reprinted in the London Polyglot. [The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or luzzim, and is halved in Lev. vii. 15 (Authorized Version and Hebrew text, viii. 8). As to its critical character, there has always been a difference of opinion; and for nearly two hundred years one of the most extraordinary controversies on record was kept up. The leader in this controversy was J. Morin, who placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the received text; and in this opinion he was followed by men like Capellus and others. Others, as De Dieu, Hottinger, Buxtorf, took the opposite view; and while they maintained the superiority of the Hebrew text, yet in doubtful cases, when the Samaritan had an "unquestionably clearer" reading, they would adopt it. Here the matter rested until 1815, when Gesenius abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch by publishing his De Pent. Sam. Origine, Indole et Auctoritate. The subject was taken up again by Kirchheim, and of late by Kohn.] As to their pronunciation of the Hebrew, it differs somewhat from the usual. [According to Petermann's transcription, the first verse in Genesis would read thus: "Baräset bara eluüm it aššamem wit aäres."] Besides the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the Samaritans have also versions of the same. The most important is the Samaritan Version (published by A. Brüll, in Hebrew characters, in 1875).

The Samaritan, in Greek (or Samaqrätor), probably the same which is mentioned in the Hexapla of Origen.

The Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, made by Abu Saad in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadia. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851; Exodus and Leviticus, in 1851.

The other literature of the Samaritans is very unimportant. They have ten prayer-books for the sabbaths and feasts, besides two collections of hymns, which they call Darzin ("string of pearls") and Dofar ("book"). Of their chronicles, we mention the Samaritan Chronicle, or Book of Joshua (sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1581—it was edited by Juyboll, Leyden, 1818), the Chronicle of Abul-Fath, full of fables, and containing little useful matter (published recently by Vilmar, with the title Abul-Fath Annals Samaritanæ, etc., Götting, 1865).

Seets.—Concerning the seets, Abul-Fath's statement is as follows: A seet appeared calling themselves "Dostän," or "The Friends," which varied in many respects from the traditions of their fathers respecting many religious matters. Thus they held for impure a fountain into which a dead insect had fallen, altered the time for reckoning the purification of women and commencement of feasts, forbade the eating of eggs which had been laid, allowing those only to be eaten which were found inside a slain bird, considered dead snakes and cemeteries as unclean, and held any one whose shadow fell upon a grave as impure for seven days. They rejected the words "Blessed be our God forever," and substituted Elohim for Jehovah; denied that Gerizim had been the first sanctuary of God; upset the Samaritan reckoning for the feasts, giving thirty days to each month, rejecting the feasts and order of fasts, and the portions due to the Levites. They counted the fifty days to Pentecost from the sabbath, the day after the first day of the passover, like the Jews, not from the Sunday like the other Samaritans. Their priests, without becoming impure, could enter a house suspected of infection, as long as they did not speak. When a pure and a doubtful house stood side by side, the condition of the latter was decided by watching whether a clean or unclean bird first settled upon it. On the sabbath they might only eat and drink from earthen vessels, which, if defiled, could not be purified; they might give no food or water to their cattle; this was done on the day previous. Their high priest was a certain Zará, who had been turned out of his own community for immorality.

At a later period lived Düs-is. Being condemned to death for adultery, he was respited on the promise of sowing discussion among the Samaritans by founding a new seet. He went to Askar (near Naldüs), and formed a friendship with a Samaritan distinguished for his learning and piety. Compelled, however, to fly for his life on account of a false accusation which he had brought against his friend, he took shelter at Shuêke with a widow-woman named Aménia, in whose house he composed many writings; but, finding that a hot pursuit after him was still maintained, he retired to a cave, where he perished of hunger, and his body was eaten by dogs. Before his departure, however, he left his books with his hostess, enjoining her to let no one read them unless he first bathed in the tank hard by. Accordingly, when Levi, the high priest's nephew, arrived with seven others in search of him, they all bathed, one after the other, in the tank; and each, as he emerged from the water, exclaimed, "I believe in thee, Jehovah, and in Düs-is thy servant, and his sons and daughters;" Levi adding, when his turn came, "Wee to us if we deny Düs-is, the prophet of God!" They then took the writings of Düs-is, and found that he had made many alterations in the law, more even than Ezra. They conceded them, and on their return to Naldüs reported that Düs-is had disappeared before they arrived, they knew not whither. At the next passover, Levi had to read out Exod. xii. 22 in the synagogue; but for "hyssop" he substituted "thyme." Corrected by the congregation, he still persevered, crying, "This is right, as God hath said by his prophet Düs-is, on whom be peace! Ye are all worthy of death for denying the prophetic office of his servant Düs-is, altering the feasts, falsifying the great name of Jehovah, and persecuting the second prophet of God, whom he hath revealed from Sinai. Wee unto you that you have rejected and do not follow him!" Levi was stoned. His friends dipped a palm-leaf in his blood, and ordained that whoever would read Düs-is' writings, and see the leaf, must first fast seven days and nights. They cut off their hair, shaved their heads, and at their funerals performed many strange ceremonies. On the sabbath they would not move from their place, and kept their feasts only on this day, during which they would not remove their hands from their shoes. When one of their friends died, they would send him with a girdle, put a stick in his hand, and shoes on his feet, saying, "If we rise, he will at once get up;" believing that the dead man, as soon as he was laid in the grave, would rise and go to paradise. As to the age in which Dosis lived, it must have been long before Origen; for this Father, in his Commentary on John xiii. 27 (ed. Lommatzsch, ii. 19), tells us that a "certain Dositheus arose, and claimed to be the Messiah. His followers are called Dositheans, who have his books, and tell wonderful stories of him, as if he had not died, and is still alive somewhere." This agrees with the statement of Abul-Fath concerning Dosis. According to Origen, Dositheus must have lived long before him, probably in the first, or at least in the second century of the Christian era. That he was the teacher or pupil of Simon Magus, as some have asserted, is an untenable conjecture.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. See SAMARIA. SAMOSATA, Paul of. See MONARCHIANISM. SAMPS/EAN. See ELKESAITES.

SAMSON (i.e., the destroyer) was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (Judg. xiii. 2). His birth was announced to his mother, who had long been barren. He was to be a Nazirite from his birth. The mother was directed, accordingly, to conform her own regimen to the tenor of the Nazaritish law, and strictly abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, and from every species of impure food. Samson was born at Zorah (Josh. xv. 33, xix. 41). When he was grown up, he staid at the camp of the Danites (Judg. xiii. 25), between Zorah and Eshtaol, where "the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times." From this time his career commences, and his deeds may be divided into six parts.

1. Samson's Wedding.—Samson goes to Timnath, where he met one of the daughters of the Philistines: "it was of Jehovah." The parents object to such a union at first, but at last yield to their son's wish. On his first visit to his future bride, he slew a lion without a weapon; and on his second visit, to espouse her, he found the skeleton, denuded of the flesh by the birds and jackals, occupied by a swarm of bees (Judg. xiv. 1-8). At his wedding-feast he propounded a riddle, the solution of which referred to his obtaining a quantity of honey from the carcass of a slain lion; and the clandestine manner in which his guests got possession of the clew to the enigma cost thirty Philistines their lives (Judg. xiv. 10-20).

2. Samson's Vengeance (Judg. xv. 1-8).—The ill treatment which he had received at the hands of his father-in-law, who, upon a frivolous pretext, had given away his daughter in marriage to another man, prompted Samson to a vindictive deed, which was executed by securing a multitude of jackals, and, by tying firebrands to their tails, setting fire to the cornfields of his enemies. The indignation of the Philistines, on discovering the author of the outrage, vented itself upon the family of his father-in-law, who had been the remote occasion of it, in the burning of their house, in which both father and daughter perished. This cruelty provoked Samson, and he smote them "hip and thigh with a great slaughter."

3. The Battle Ramath-lehi, i.e., at the lifting-up of the Jablon.—Having taken his residence at Etam, he was thence dislodged by consenting to a pusillanimous arrangement on the part of his own countrymen, by which he agreed to surrender himself in bonds, provided they would not themselves fall upon him and kill him. Being brought, in this apparently helpless condition, to a place called, from the event, Lehi ("a jaw"), his preternatural potency suddenly put itself forth, and snapping the cords asunder, and snatching up the jawbone of an ass, he dealt so effectually about him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Wearied with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer, and caused a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by; and Samson gave it the name of En-hakkore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).

4. The Gates of Gaza at Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1-3). — Samson suffered himself weakly to be drawn into the company of a woman of loose character at Gaza. The inhabitants attempt to detain him at Gaza by closing the gates of the city, and making them fast; but Samson, apprised of it, rose at midnight, and breaking away bolts, bars, and hinges, departed, carrying the gates to a hilltop near Hebron.

5. The Attempted Outwitting in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. xvi. 4-11). — Here he lived with Delilah. Tempted by the bribe of the Philistines, she employs all her arts to worm from him the secret of his strength. Three times he deceived her, abasing at the same time the Philistines lying in wait.

6. Samson's Self-treachery and Death (Judg. xvi. 15-31). — At last, in a moment of weakness, Samson disclosed to Delilah the fact that his strength lay in his hair, — not that it really lay in his hair, but in the fact that it arose from his relation to God as a Nazarite. The Philistines, having deprived him of sight, at first immured him in a prison, and made him grind at a mill like a slave. In the process of time his hair recovered its growth, and Samson experienced the help of Jehovah (Judg. xvi. 28). A feast was celebrated in honor of Dagon, and Samson was ordered to be brought out to be made a laughing-stock for the immense multitude. He grasped the massive pillars; and, bowing with resistless force, the whole building fell upon the lords and upon all the people that were therein. "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life." His brethren buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the burying-place of his father.

SAMSON, Bernhardin, a Franciscan monk noted for his traffic in indulgences in Switzerland. He was a native of Milan, but the dates of his birth and death are not known. He entered Switzerland as the agent of Cardinal Forlì, who had charge of the sale in that region; but his behavior caused much scandal, and after some disastrous encounters with Zwingli and Bullinger he was recalled by Leo X. Nothing further is known of him. See HORTENBERG: Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, Zurich, 1708 (iii.).

SAMUEL was born as the son of Elkanah, an Ephraimite, at Ramathaim-zophim, in the mountain of Ephraim, and was of Levitical descent; for not only did he perform priestly functions, but his descendants also, like Heman his grandson, one of the chief singers in the Levitical choir, are counted as belonging to the Levites. His mother, Hannah, for a long time childless, sought from God the gift of a son, whom she dedicated to the Lord before his birth, to the office of a Nazarite. When the son was born, she called him Samuel, "the asked, or heard of God." As soon as he was weaned, she brought him unto the house of the Lord (1 Sam. i. 21), where he afterwards remained. He was dressed in a sacred garment, an ephod of white linen; and his mother gave him every year a little mantle reaching down to his feet. And "the child Samuel grew on, and was in favor both with the Lord, and also with men" (ii. 26).

Samuel's Call. — Times looked rather gloomy in Israel. Eli the high priest was a weak character; his sons prostituted the sanctuary; the people served idols; and the oppressive power of the Philistines was felt. Thus it was that Samuel had no idea how the Lord revealed himself to the prophets, the messengers of his word (1 Sam. iii. 1, 7). While he was sleeping, he received his first revelation, or communication, — the doom of Eli's apostate house (iii. 11-14). Other revelations speedily followed this. The frequency of God's messages to the young prophet established his fame; his words were treasured up, and Shiloh became the resort of those who came to hear him (iii. 19-21). Samuel was not only a prophet like others, but he is also the first of the regular succession of prophets (Acts iii. 24). His influence at the beginning of his career — "and the word of Samuel came to all Israel" (1 Sam. iv. 1) — paved the way for his judicial administration; and, although he was neither called nor elected to this office, yet "Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh" (vii. 6). But the zenith of his prophetic activity was the election, rejection, and second election of the theocratic king (viii.-xvi.), which was mediated by his office. After having anointed David as king (xvi. 13 sq.), he retired to his house at Ramah; and, besides his death (xxv. 1), only his apparition at Endor is recorded (xxviii.). Samuel's prophetic activity was not confined to a mere receiving and communicating the divine word, but he also founded and guided those societies which are known as the schools of the prophets. The spirit of prophecy, it seems, had in the time of Samuel gained possession of many. In order to keep away all impure elements, it was necessary to conceive and purify those of whom the Spirit had thus taken a hold by teaching and discipline; and to achieve this Samuel formed them into one congregation near Ramah, where they lived in habitations (Heb., Naioth, xix. 19 sq.). Samuel "standing appointed over them" (xix. 20), ruling and leading them by the power of his spirit.

Samuel's judicial activity was not only the outgrowth of the prophetic office, but was also constantly guided by it. We must not only suppose that he dispensed judgment with prophetic wisdom, but that he also pleaded the cause of the people as a man who had the spirit of God. Although Samuel had never drawn the sword, except in one case (1 Sam. xv. 33), yet he was a hero. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 53); and the Ebenezer-stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. As to the manner in which Samuel exercised his judicial office, we know that he annually visited, in discharge of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries, — Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh (vii. 16). At other times he lived at Ramah, and exercised his functions there (vii. 17). When he became old, he appointed his sons Joel and Abiah as judges, not to take his place, but to relieve him. They were judges at Beersheba (viii. 2). But these sons possessed not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lucre, took bribes, and perverted judgment" (viii. 3); so the elders of the people came to him and said, "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king" (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (viii. 7, x. 19, xii. 12, 16 sq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii.). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was the man after God's heart, able to build up the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-21). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."

Samuel's Priesthood. — In this direction Samuel only filled a gap out of necessity. Eli was dead, and his two sons also. The ark was taken, Shiloh was desolated. In this time of need Samuel restored the orphaned priesthood by building an altar at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17). Here, as well as at Mizpeh (vii. 5), Gilgal (xi. 15), and Bethlehem (xvi. 2 sq.), he offered sacrifices. His priestly function, however, consisted not merely in sacrificing, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned (Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1).

In reviewing the whole career of Samuel, we notice that he forms a transition period. He is the last judge, and mediates the reconstruction of the theocracy by founding the royal and prophetic offices, which again were of the greatest influence for the formation of the priestly office. Some regard Samuel as a type of John the Baptist. It cannot be denied that there are many striking parallels between both, but the Baptist's activity was not as comprehensive as Samuel's. John was nothing but a voice of one crying in the wilderness, whilst Samuel had to reform and to guide the whole religious and political life of the nation. Samuel died at Ramah (1 Sam. xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). All Israel lamented him. He was buried in his house at Ramah. See the works of KNOBEL: *Prophet d. SAMUEL, Books of, so called because he is the prominent figure in their history, not because he was their author. They originally formed one book, as the Massoretic note to 1 Sam. xviii. 21, which states that this verse is the middle of the book, incontestably proves. In the Septuagint they are called "The First and Second Book of the Kings." Daniel Bomberg was the first to introduce the division into the printed Hebrew text (Venice, 1517). The Book of Samuel links itself directly to Judges, which presents the confusion of that period by showing how the monarchy arose, and reached its height. It divides itself into three principal parts: (A) The history of Samuel, the last judge and the prophetic founder of the monarchy (1 Sam. i.-xii.); (B) The history of Saul, the first king of Israel (xiii.-xxxi.); (C) The history of David (2 Sam. i.-xxiv.). The death of David is given in 1 Kings. The book is a unit, but flows not from one source, but from several, which the author combines, without, however, being able always to disguise the fact. But the modern critics overdo the matter when they find everywhere contradictions. And they do not agree in tracing the sources. For instance, M. Duncker, Seimecke, and Reuss try to make out that the history of Saul's elevation to the monarchy rests upon three different and mutually exclusive accounts: (1) xi., which they say is the original historical account; (2) ix. 1-x. 16; (3) viii., x. 17-27. Dillmann and Wellhausen trace it to two sources: (1) ix. 1-10, 16, x. 27^a-xi. 11, 15; (2) viii. 10, 17-27, xi. 12-14. Wellhausen considers the second account as unhistorical, and of exilic or post-exilic origin. Dillmann maintains that one or the other must be false. But since the editor of the book, if he did really make up his history out of two different sources, evidently considered them of equal value, and mutually supplementary, the first question to be answered is, Was he not right? Of course, if there is no living God who regulates the future in its smallest details, and can reveal it, then both accounts are equally unhistorical. But, if there be such a God, then there is no difficulty in accepting both accounts as true, and fitting together.

It is true that in First Samuel there are told several similar stories, — Saul's inspiration (x. 10-12 and xix. 22-24), his rejection as king (xiii. 8-14 and xv. 12 sq.), his madness (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sq.), David's sparing of Saul (xxiv. and xxvi.), David's flight to the Philistines (xxi. 10-15 and xxvii. 1 sq.); but the second story is not an exact repetition of the first. The circumstances were similar: hence the same general result followed, yet they were not identical in the two. It is also true that there are genuine repetitions and breaks, formal incongruities and contradictions, transpositions, etc. Cf. vii. 12, 13 with ix. 16, x. 5, xiii., which is intelligible only on the supposition that there was a fresh attack of the Philistines (xi. 15), or that Samuel's victory was temporary. Again: in David's early history there is some confusion. In Second Samuel, otherwise more united, there are some such phenomena: e.g., 2 Sam. vii. 1, 9, speaks of David's peace resulting from the wars mentioned in the next chapter; between xiv. 27 and xviii. 18 nothing is said about Absalom's death. The present Hebrew text of the book is defective and faulty: e.g., 2 Sam. xxi. 8, Michal for Merab; the name of Goliath's brother, missing in 2 Sam. xxi. 19, is to be supplied from 1 Chron. xx. 5. But the attempts (Thenius and Wellhausen) to make up deficiencies by the aid of the LXX. are conjectural, and more or less arbitrary.

While the author of Kings regularly names his sources, the author of Samuel does this only once (2 Sam. i. 18). But it is probable that the author had recourse to the official records spoken of in 1 Chron. xxix. 29. The book contains Ps. xviii. and the "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). The time of composition was after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5), after the separation of the kingdom, but before the downfall of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 6.). Many rabbis make Jeremiah to be the author. But in truth, neither author nor definite date can be assigned to it. The author is, however, no mere compiler, but one, who, in the true prophetic spirit, made thorough use of the sources. The book takes high rank in literary and historical respects. The style is classic and graphic. The honest and impartial character of the prophetic author comes out in his statement of many things which were in plain contradiction to the Mosaic law, and in his faithful and unvarnished account of David's failings, notwithstanding his prejudice in his favor.

SANBALLAT (Heb., שַׁנְבַּלֵּט, or שַׁנְבַּלֵּט, so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Σανβαλζατ; a name, probably, of Assyro-Babylonian origin, i.e., Sin-aballit, "Sin [moon-god] bestowed life") is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible, all in the Book of Nehemiah: Neh. ii. 10, 19, iv. 1 sq. (Heb. iii. 33 sq.), iv. 7 sqq., cf. 15 (Heb. iv. 1 sqq., et. 39), vi. 1-5 sqq., 12-14, xiii. 28. He headed the opposition which Nehemiah encountered in carrying out the plan of rebuilding Jerusalem, and re-establishing there a Hebrew national life. See NEHEMIAH.

We are told that Sanballat, and Tobiah "the servant, the Ammonite," were greatly displeased at the news of Nehemiah's coming, because of his interest in "the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 19). On learning of the determination formed by the Hebrews to build the walls of the city, these two, with "Geshem the Arabian," laughed scornfully, and contemptuously accused them of a rebellious purpose against the king, Artaxerxes (ii. 1); i.e., Artaxerxes Longimanus. When, in spite of this, Sanballat found the work actually in progress, although still contemptuous, he grew very angry, and roused the hostility of "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 1 sq. = Heb. iii. 33 sq.). At length he conspired with Tobiah "and the Arabians and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites" — hostile peoples on various sides of Jerusalem — to go up and hinder the work by force (iv. 7 sqq. = Heb. iv. 1 sqq.). The plot, however, became known to Nehemiah, and was abandoned (iv. 15 = Heb. iv. 9). After the wall was finished, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem endeavored to secure the person of Nehemiah by inviting him to a conference. Four messengers in succession, followed by a letter, in which Sanballat mentioned rumors that charged Nehemiah with treason, failed to entice the latter (vi. 1-5 sqq.); and even the expedient of bribing a man to prophesy danger, and so to induce Nehemiah to shut himself up in the temple, was fruitless (vi. 12-14). After this we hear nothing more of Sanballat, except that a son of "Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest," was his son-in-law. This alliance seems to have taken place during an absence of Nehemiah from Jerusalem (et. xiii. 6), and probably betokens a scheme of Sanballat to gain influence among the Hebrews, since he could not successfully oppose them by force (cf. xiii. 4, 7, 8).

It remains to inquire who Sanballat was. He is called "the Horonite" (Heb., הֲרֹנִיטִי; LXX., ὁ ἱερεὺς καὶ τοῦ Ὀριανῶντος) (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28). We cannot be sure whether this appellation is derived from Horonaim, a city of Moab (Isa. xv. 5, etc., and Meshastone), or Beth-horon, in Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, etc.). In favor of Horonaim is the association of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian, and more particularly the fact that his daughter's marriage with the high priest's grandson is classed with the marrying of "wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab" (Neh. xiii. 28, et. 23, 29). Against Horonaim is the lack of the term "Moabite" in connection with Sanballat, although this may be due to the fact (see below) that he did not properly belong to that people. In favor of Beth-horon is Sanballat's apparent residence in the territory of Samaria, and particularly his endeavor to have a meeting with Nehemiah at Ono in Benjamin (see vi. 2 and et. xi. 31, 33), which cannot have been very far from Beth-horon. In any case his name points to Assyria or Babylonia as the original home of his family. They may have been among the colonists transported to the "western country" by Sargon or Esathaddon (see those arts.). There is no evidence that Sanballat held any official position in Samaria under the Persian king. He seems to be distinct from "the governors beyond the river" (ii. 7, 9); and a Persian official would hardly have ventured to oppose so persistently one who, like Nehemiah, brought a commission from the king. We know nothing definite about "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 2 = Heb. iii. 31); but it seems to have been personal influence, and not official authority, which he exercised over them. The Sanballat (Σανβαλζατ) whom Josephus (Jub. XI. 7, 2 sq.) names as satrap of Samaria was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. It is interesting to notice, however, that Josephus calls him a Chtharim (cf. Chtharim, Chthar, a Babylonian city, 2 Kings xvii. 24, 30), and says he gave his daughter in marriage to Manasses, brother of Jaddus, the high priest, that he might conciliate the favor of the Jewish nation. There may be here some confusion with the earlier Biblical Sanballat.

SANCHEZ, Thomas, b. at Cordova, 1550; d. at Granada, May 19, 1610; entered the Society of Jesus in 1566; studied theology, philosophy, and jurisprudence; became director of the school at Granada, and acquired great fame as a moral philosopher by his De sacramento matrimonii (Geneva, 1592), though it was severely attacked by some on account of its cynicism and rudeness. His collected works appeared in Venice, 1710, in seven volumes.

SANCHUNIATHON, an old Phœnician scholar living before the Trojan war, is mentioned by Athenæus, Porphyry, and Suidas; and Eusebius adds that Philo translated one of his works into Greek (συγγραμματα). Neither the original nor the translation is extant, but Eusebius gives some extracts, which have been collected and edited by Orelli (Leipzig, 1826) and by C. Mueller, in his Fragmenta historicorum grecorum (Paris, 1849, iii. pp. 500-575). The trustworthiness of these fragments, even the very existence of the author, has been much debated. (See LOBECK: Aglaophamus, ii. 1273.) It is now generally agreed, however, that they really contain true historical materials. See EWALD, in Abhandlungen d. Göttinger Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, 1851, vol. v.; and RENAN: Mémoire sur Sanchuniathon, Paris, 1858; BAUDISSIN: Studien, i., 1876, pp. 1-46 ("Ueber den religionsgeschichtlichen Werth der phœnicischen Geschichte Sanchuniathon's"), and his art. in HERZOG, vol. xii., pp. 364-372.

SANCROFT, William, D.D., English prelate; b. at Freshingfield, Suffolk, Jan. 13, 1616; d. there Nov. 24, 1693. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1642, which, however, he lost in 1649 for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. On leaving Cambridge he retired to the Continent; returned at the Restoration; became successively chaplain to Cosin, bishop of Durham (1660), university preacher, D.D., and master of his college (1662), dean of York (1663), dean of St. Paul's (1664), archdeacon of Canterbury (1668), and archbishop of Canterbury (1677). He attended Charles II. on his death-bed (February, 1685), and crowned James II. (May 3, 1685). He would not act on James's ecclesiastical commission, and was one of the famous seven bishops (Sancroft of Canterbury, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, Trelawny of Bristol, Ken of Bath and Wells, and Lloyd of St. Asaph) who refused to read James's Declaration of Indulgence, and in consequence were confined in the Tower, and tried, but were triumphantly acquitted. (See SANCROFT: Religion in England, new ed., vol. iv. 138-156.) Sancroft also refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, 1688, and was deprived February, 1691. He retired to his native place. His Predestinated Thief (Latin, 1651, Eng. trans., 1811), Sermons (1691), Occasional Sermons (1703), and Nineteen Familiar Letters (1757), have been published. See his life by GEORGE DOYLE (London, 1821, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1810) and by Miss AGNES STRICKLAND, in Lives of the Seven Bishops (1866, pp. 1-103).

SANCTIFICATION is, according to the Scriptures, the fundamental principle of religious morality. Its roots strike down into the holiness of God, which is the main element in the Old-Testament conception of God. Jehovah is the Holy One (Isa. vi.), who not only is free from all sin and impurity, but institutes a holy people, and develops it through the Holy Spirit. Christ addressed God as the Holy Father (John xvii. 11); and it is because God is holy that we are urged to sanctify ourselves, or become holy (Lev. xi. 41, 45; 1 Pet. i. 16). This vocation to become holy was symbolized in the arrangements and furniture of the temple, which was altogether holy, and consecrated to the Lord. Sanctification consists in withdrawal from the world, and presentation to God. Christ, who was holy from his birth, also sanctified himself for the world (John xvii. 19), completing the work by his self-sacrifice on the cross. Christians are designated "saints" (holy ones, Acts ix. 32; Rom. xv. 26), not only because they are called to become holy, but because they receive with their faith in Christ his holiness or righteousness as their own. Christ is made unto believers sanctification (1 Cor. i. 30). Sanctification is treated of, now as an act of God, or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, now as an act of man. God sanctifies (John xvii. 17), and man enters into the redeeming, justifying, sanctifying economy of God (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 15).

The Roman-Catholic Church confounds sanctification with justification. The Council of Trent (VI. 7) says that justification is not only forgiveness of sin, but the sanctification and renewal of the inner man. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, defines justification to be a forensic act, a declaration that a person is righteous. But inasmuch as this forensic act is an actual forgiveness of sins, and a reception into the new life, it is also a creative act. What the Protestant confessions insist on is the clear distinction between the instantaneous act of justification on the part of God and the continued and gradual process of sanctification. By the act of God's justification the believer is made a creature of God; in sanctification he carries on what God has begun, and realizes the Christ in his own life. Justification is the germ of our new life, a single act; sanctification is a gradual process, the development of this new life. J. P. LANGE.

SANCTION, Pragmatic (Pragmatica sanctio, or simply pragmatica), was in the later Roman imperial times a rescript of the emperor, couched in formal language, particularly one respecting the public law, issued on request of a city, province, or church (Con. Justin., l. 12, § 1 de ss. eccles., i. 2). It was called "pragmatic" because it was issued after consultation and treaty concerning the matter (επαγνα). The term through the middle age, and down to modern times, has been especially used of laws respecting weighty matters. Of pragmatic sanctions affecting the church, the chief are,—

1. That of Louis IX. of France (1268), which was the first ordinance of the thirteenth century designed as a check to the undue extension of Papal power and to the misuses of the curia, particularly to the excessive demands for titles, and to the enlargement of Papal reservations respecting benefices. It consists of six articles. It allows all prelates, patrons, and ordinary collators of benefices, the fullest exercise and unhindered preservation of their jurisdiction, and forbids simony. This sanction was the first important law on the side of "Gallican liberty." The opponents of Gallicanism have, therefore, always endeavored to show that it is a forgery (comp. R. ROSEN: Die pragmatische Sanction, welche unter dem Namen Ludwigs IX., etc., München, 1853); but, after SOLDAN's exhaustive essay (Zeitschr.

jur. hist. Theol., 1856, pp. 371-150, the attempt must be given up. See the text of the edict in MANUSC. 23, 1259.

2. That of Charles VII. of France (La pragmatique de Bourges), issued July 7, 1438, in consequence of a national council which indorsed the reform edicts of the Council of Basel, but offered certain modifications respecting the French Church. The edict consists of twenty-three articles, and enforces the decrees of the council. It asserts the superiority of œumenical councils to the Pope, and confirms the admired usages, observances, and statutes of the French Church. It forbids Papal encroachments. It was, however, an invasion of the ecclesiastical by the civil power. No account was taken of the Pope in the issuing of the edict. Accordingly, Pius II. (1458-61) declared it to be an infringement of the Papal prerogatives, and demanded of the French bishops to bring about its repeal. Charles VII. replied by an appeal to a general council. It was, indeed, repealed by Louis XI. in 1461, to get the Papal assistance in making good his claims upon Naples; but the Parliament of Paris refused to assent to the king's action; and, as he did not get the desired Papal help, he let the matter drop. In 1499 Louis XII. renewed the sanction, and it has not been since really withdrawn. See the text in DE VILERAULT: Ordonnances, 13, 267 sqq.; and comp. HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte, vii. 762; P. HINSCHUS: Kirchenrecht, 3, 109 sqq.

3. The so-called German Pragmatic Sanction of the diet of Frankfurt in 1449. The designation is misleading. It is not a law; since it was not approved by the kings present, and never proclaimed as a law of the empire; it is rather a provisional act of union between some German princes who took exception to the findings of the Council of Basel respecting certain alterations in the affairs of the German nation and its component parts. Comp. PÖCKERT: Die kurfürstliche Neutralität während des Basler Concils, Leipzig, 1855.

SANDEMAN and the SANDEMANIANS. Robert Sandeman — b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. at Danbury, Conn., America, 1771 — was a son-in-law of John Glas (see art.), and an elder of the Glasite Church in Edinburgh, but removed in 1760 to London, where he formed a congregation, and in 1761 to America, where he continued active for the propagation of his ideas. The sect, however, called "Glasites" in Scotland, and "Sandemanians" in England and America, never attained any high degree of prosperity, and at present it hardly numbers more than two thousand members. Doctrinally they distinguish themselves by defining faith as a mere assent to the teachings and workings of Christ. With respect to liturgy, ritual, and discipline, their differences are more pronounced. They celebrate the Lord's Supper once a week; hold love-feasts, which consist in a common dinner, every Sunday between morning and evening service, abstain from blood and every thing strangled; and practise a kind of communism, so far as the members hold their property subject to the call of the church. Their ideas are best learned from the writings of Sandeman: Letters on Theism and Apatism (Edinburgh, 1757); Thoughts on Christianity, Supra of the Prophet Jonah's Honor of Marriage, etc. See also PULLER:

Letters on Sandemanianism. JOHN GLASS'S Treatise on the Lord's Supper (Edinburgh, 1743) was reprinted, London, 1885.

SANDWICH (or HAWAIIAN) ISLANDS, The, a group of eight inhabited and four uninhabited islands in the Northern Pacific Ocean, were first discovered by the Spanish navigator Gaetano, 1512, and visited by Capt. Cook, 1778, and Vancouver, 1792-91. The largest island is Hawaii, one hundred by ninety miles, with two active volcanoes, Kilaua and Mauna Loa; the last eruption being in 1868. Mauna Kea, the highest mountain, rises 13,805 feet above the sea. The capital, Honolulu, situated on the Island of Oahu, is 2,100 miles from San Francisco, and has a population of about 15,000. The city has a good harbor and water-works, is well laid out, and has a number of churches and public buildings. The Hawaiians belong to the Polynesian race, and are allied to the New-Zealanders, Tongans, etc. The population was estimated by Capt. Cook at 400,000, and in 1823 at 112,000. The census of 1896 gave 108,579; of 1860, 69,700; of 1872, 56,897; of 1878, 11,088. The religion of the Hawaiians, before the arrival of the missionaries, was indistinct, but superstitious, permitting human sacrifices, the worship of idols, etc. Polygamy was universal. No word was found in the language for chastity. Infanticide was very prevalent, and Dibble calculated that two-thirds of the children were killed by their parents. The tabu system, by which things and days were set apart as sacred, and individuals were refused contact with each other, was a prominent feature of the life on the islands, and a source of great power to the reigning family and priesthood. The reigning king, Kalakaua, was elected by ballot in 1871.

The first missionaries arrived in the Sandwich Islands March 30, 1820. They were Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, both graduates of Andover Seminary, at whose ordination, at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 29, 1819, Rev. Herman Humphrey preached from Josh. xiii. 1, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." The Sandwich Islands had been before the eyes of the Christian public before this. A native, Obookiah by name (b. 1795), was brought to New Haven in 1809. He there met Samuel Mills, and became one of the first pupils at the Missionary Institute at Cornwall, to whose opening his presence had contributed. Obookiah died a Christian in 1818. Nine Hawaiians were educated in the school before its discontinuance in 1826, and some of them returned to their native land as teachers. Much to their surprise, Bingham and Thurston found that the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. They had ready access to the people, and by 1822 had reduced the language to writing. That year a printing-press was set up. Mr. Ellis, the devoted Polynesian missionary and traveller, visited the islands, and rendered the American missionaries valuable assistance in acquiring the native tongue. In 1824 the missionaries Bishop, Stewart, Richards, Ledy, and Goodrich arrived from the United States. The queen-dowager, Keoponohi, was baptized in 1824. The king and queen died, of measles, on a visit to England in 1824. The first Roman-Catholic missionaries arrived in 1827, were banished at a later time, but reinstated in 1839 by the French guns. By 1830 twenty books had been printed in the Hawaiian language. In 1831 there were 50,000 learners in the schools. The translation of the Bible was completed on Feb. 25, 1839. Revivals have swept through the island at various times. In 1853 the natives sent missionaries to the Marquesas. In 1863 the Hawaiian Evangelical Association was formed; the churches being declared independent, so far as government was concerned, of the American Board. The entire expense of the mission up to 1869, when the aid of the American churches was declared no longer necessary, was $1,220,000. The total number admitted to communion up to 1870 was 55,300. At the present time the entire population is Christian. The Roman Catholics have made some headway. The Church of England has a bishop of Honolulu and a handful of converts. The Congregational Church is still dominant. On June 15, 1870, a jubilee celebration was held in the large stone church of Honolulu; three thousand crowding into the building, and as many more unable to get admittance. The eloquent Rev. Mr. Kualea preached in Hawaiian, the king being present. Leprosy prevails upon the islands. The Island of Molokai has been set apart for them, and has a population of 800 lepers.

SANDYS, Edwin, archbishop of York; b. near Hawkhhead, Lancashire, 1519; d. at York, July 10, 1588. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; was converted to Protestantism; elected master of Catherine Hall (1547); was imprisoned in the Tower for espousing the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and then went into voluntary exile until Elizabeth's accession; was bishop of Worcester (1559), of London (1570), and archbishop of York (1576). He took part in the preparation of the Bishops' Bible, and in the revision of the Liturgy. See T. D. WHITAKER: Life of Edwin Sandys, prefaced to an edition of the Archbishop's Sermons, London, 1812; also the Sketch by JOHN AYRE, in his edition of the Sermons for the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1811.

SANDYS, George, son of an archbishop of York; b. at the palace there in 1577; d. at Bexley Abbey, Kent, March, 1641; was educated at Oxford; travelled in the East, 1610-12; was in Virginia, 1621-21, as colonial treasurer, building there "the first water-mill, the first iron-works, and the first ship;" and was for some years an attendant of Charles I., and ended life in scholarly retirement. He published a much-valued Relation of his Oriental journey, 1615; translated Oxley's Metamorphoses, partly at Jamestown, Va., and Grotius' Christ's Passion, 1610; and paraphrased the Psalms (1636), Job, Ecclesiastes, etc. (1638), and the Song of Solomon (1641). These were nearly inaccessible till H. J. TOMP issued in 1839 a Selection from them, with prefatory Life; a complete edition was prepared 1872 by R. HOORN. In James Montgomery's opinion "his psalms are incomparably the most poetical in the English language, and yet they are scarcely known." Charles I., when a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, "vastly delighted to read" them. Fragments of one or two of them may be found in some of the hymn-books. Dryden called Sandys "the best versifier of the former age," and Pope thought English poetry much indebted to his translations. F. M. BIRD.

SANHEDRIN (Matt. v. 22, xxvi. 59; Mark xiv. 55, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 15, v. 21, 27, 31, vi. 12, 15, xxii. 30, xxiii. 1, 6, 15, 20, 28, xxiv. 20) was the supreme council of the Jewish nation [in and before the time of Christ]. There were two kinds of Synedria, viz. the supreme or metropolitan Sanhedrin, called the Great Sanhedrin, and provincial councils called the Small Sanhedrin, of which we shall speak farther on. We begin with

1. Number of Members, and their Classification in the Sanhedrin. — It consisted of seventy-one members; hence it is also called the Sanhedrin of seventy-one, to distinguish it from the provincial Sanhedrin, which consisted of twenty-three. The members were in part priests (Matt. xxvii. 1; John vii. 32, xi. 47, xii. 10), in part laymen, the elders of the people, and in part scribes (Matt. xxvi. 3, 57, 59, xxvii. 41; Mark viii. 31, xi. 27, xiv. 43, 53, xv. 1; Luke ix. 22, xxi. 1, xxii. 66; Acts v. 21, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xxv. 15). The members belonged either to the Pharisees or Sadducees: the scribes probably belonged to the former (Acts v. 17, 34, xxiii. 6). Included in the seventy-one was the president, the Nasi, but not the notaries. The king was not to be president; but the high priest could be, as may be seen from Acts v. 21, 27, xxiii. 2, not, however, because of his dignity as priest. On the right hand of the president sat the ab Beth din [i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president]; on the left, the harham, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin sat to the right and to the left, in a semicircle; while the two notaries stood before them, one to the right, and the other to the left. Before them sat three rows of disciples, in places appropriate to their respective attainments. The president assembled the council through his messengers; and, when he entered with his assistants he was received with special ceremony. Qualifications for membership were, that the applicant had already been a member of the smaller council, and that he was morally and physically blameless. He had to be a father of children, good-looking, and learned.

2. Time of Sessions. — The Sanhedrin sat every day, from the termination of the daily morning sacrifice till the daily evening sacrifice, with the exception of the sabbath and festivals.

3. Place of Session. — They generally met in the Hall of Squares, which was built by Simon ben-Shetach. It was a basilica twenty-two ells long and eleven ells wide. Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the sessions of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the Halls of Purchase (Aboda Sara, fol. 8, col. 2). After the destruction, the Sanhedrin was removed to Janniah or Jalmeh; it was thence transferred to Usha [under the presidency of Gamaliel II., ben-Simon II., A.D. 80-116], conveyed back to Jabne, and again to Usha, to Shafnam [under the presidency of Simon III., ben-Gamaliel II., A.D. 116-163], to Beth-shearim and Sephoris, under the presidency of Jehudah I., the Holy [A.D. 163-193], and finally to Tiberias, under the presidency of Gamaliel III., ben-Jehudah I. [A.D. 193-220], where it became more of a consistory, [but still retaining, under the presidency of Jehudah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), the power of excommunication]; while under the presidency of Gamaliel IV., ben-Jehudah II., it dropped the appellation Sanhedrin, and the authoritative decisions were issued under the name of Beth Hamidrash. Gamaliel V. [A.D. 100-125] was the last president. With the death of this patriarch, who was executed by Theodosius II., for erecting new synagogues contrary to the imperial inhibition, the title Nasi, the last remains of the ancient Sanhedrin, became wholly extinct in the year 425.

4. Mode of Conducting Trials, Punishments, etc. — Occasional intimations in the Gospels (Matt. xxvi. 62 sq.; Mark xiv. 60 sq.; Luke xxii. 67; John vii. 51, xviii. 19 sq.; Acts iv. 7 sq., v. 27 sq., xxiii. 1), and the canons laid down in the Talmudic treatise Sanhedrin, chaps. iii.-v., give us an idea of the mode of procedure of the Sanhedrin. In capital offences, it required a majority of at least two to condemn the accused, and the verdict of guilty had to be reserved for the following day. The verdict of acquittal could be given on the same day.

5. Jurisdiction of the Great Sanhedrin. — This body had, (1) charge over all matters pertaining to religion and the different religious institutions, and (2) to give decisions in matters concerning a whole tribe [when it was accused of having departed from the living God], a high priest, a disobedient Sanhedrist, false prophets and seducers of the people, blasphemers, etc. It determined whether a war with any nation contemplated by the king was to be waged, and gave the sovereign permission to do so. It also appointed the provincial Sanhedrin, or courts of justice, and regulated the calendar. It inflicted not only bodily punishments (Acts v. 40), but also capital punishments, as stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. According to the Gospel of John, however, the Jews declare "it is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (John xiii. 31), which agrees with the remark (Sanhedrin, fol. 24, col. 2), "Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the power of inflicting capital punishment was taken away from Israel," which means, that, without the confirmation of the sentence on the part of the Roman procurator, the Jews had not the power to carry the sentence of the Sanhedrin into execution. This is not only confirmed by Josephus (Ant. XX. 9, 1), but by the appeal of Paul to the chief captain (Acts xxii. 25-30), and especially by the whole manner in which the trial of Jesus was conducted. The stoning of Stephen (vii. 51 sq.) was the illegal act of an enraged multitude.

6. Origin and Date of the Great Sanhedrin. — According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin was instituted by Moses (Sanhedrin, l. 6) when he appointed seventy elders, who, together with him as their president, were to act as magistrates and judges (Num. xi. 16). According to the Talmud (Moad Katan, 26 a), King Saul was president of the Sanhedrin in his reign, and his son Jonathan was vice-president. After the exile, the Sanhedrin, which existed even in the Babylonian captivity, was reorganized by Ezra. Whatever may be the claims of tradition, there seems to be little doubt that this supreme court, as it existed during the second temple, developed itself while the Greeks ruled over Palestine; and to this fact points the name arethraia, arethraion, by which it has come down to us, as this word belongs to the Macedonian period. It is true that Josephus does not mention the Sanhedrin before the conquest of Judaea by Pompey (B.C. 63); but the very fact that it had such power in the time of Hyrcanus II. as to summon Herod to answer for his unjust conduct (Jos.: Ant. XIV. 9, 1) shows that it must then have been a very old institution to have acquired such development and authority.

7. The Small Sanhedrin. — Any town or village which had no less than a hundred and twenty representative men had a provincial court, which consisted of twenty-three members. In Jerusalem there were two such courts. They had the power to judge such capital offences as came not within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. They sat every Monday and Thursday, being market-days, in a room adjoining the synagogue. Before the exile, these courts of justice were held in the market-place. There was no appeal to the Great Sanhedrin against the decision of this lesser Sanhedrin. Only when the opinion of the judges was divided did they themselves consult with the supreme court. The stripes to which offenders were sentenced were given in the synagogue by the sexton (cf. Mark xiii. 9 with Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34). Besides these two courts, there was also one consisting of three judges. There were in Jerusalem alone three hundred and ninety such Sanhedrins. Within the jurisdiction of this court came suits for debts, robbery, bodily injuries, compensation for damages, thefts which involved a twofold, fourfold, or fivefold value to the proprietor.

SARCERIUS, Erasmus, b. at Annaberg, 1501; d. at Magdeburg, Nov. 28, 1559; studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; was very active in introducing the Reformation in Nassau (1538-48); and was appointed pastor at Leipzig in 1549, and at Magdeburg in 1553. He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Coniciones annuar (1541, 4 vols.); Loci communes Theologici, Von einer Disziplin (1555), Pastorale (1559), etc.

SAR DIS, the magnificent capital of Lydia, stood in the rich and fertile plain watered by the Pactolos, with its acropolis built on an almost inaccessible rock, a spur of the Tmolos, and was, in the Lydian and Persian period, one of the principal cities of Western Asia in military, commercial, and industrial respects. After the conquest by Alexander the Great, it lost its prominent position, and under the Romans it began to fall into decay. During the reign of Tiberius it was almost completely destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by the aid of the emperor. Under the Mohammedan rule its ruin became complete, and it is now only a heap of débris. Jews settled early in the city (Josephus: Antiquit., 14, 10, 21), and it was the seat of a Christian congregation (Rev. i. 11, iii. 1).

SAR CON (Heb., שַׂרְקִי, better שַׂרְקִי — so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Ἀρᾶ, corrupt form, cf. Ἀρᾶντιον, Can. Ptol., Assy., Sar-akin, "He [a god] established the king"), a powerful Assyrian king, successor of Shalmaneser IV., and father of Sennacherib, who reigned B.C. 722-705, is mentioned only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1): "In the year of [the] Tartar's coming to Ashdod, when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him, and he fought against Ashdod and took it," etc. In contrast with this solitary and incidental notice, the Assyrian inscriptions dating from Sargon's reign are numerous, and our knowledge of his achievements fairly complete.

From the facts that he never calls his predecessor his father, and yet that he, his son Sennacherib, and his grandson Esarhaddon, all speak of royal ancestors, it is probable, that, while not in the direct line of descent, he belonged to a branch of the royal family. An ancient Babylonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He succeeded Shalmaneser IV. during the siege of Samaria, and it was in the first year of his reign (B.C. 722) that the city fell. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6, where nothing indicates that "the king of Assyria" is different from the one mentioned in v. 7. See SHALMANESER.) His inscriptions mention this conquest repeatedly; and in one account there seems to be a reference to the establishment of foreign colonies in the territory of Samaria, in place of the Israelites who were carried away captive (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 24). A confirmation of this appears in the Annals of Sargon, according to which, in B.C. 721 he transported inhabitants of Babylonia to the land of Hatti (properly Hittites, but under Sargon of wider application). Another inscription speaks of his sending colonists from other places to "the land of the House of Omri" (Samaria); and the Annals are authority for the further statement that still other colonists were transported to "the city of Samaria" in B.C. 715. It was in the year 721 that Sargon conquered for the first time Mero-dach-bahadan of Babylon (see the art.). 720 was a famous year for Sargon. He conquered Ja-u-bi-di of Hamath in a battle near Karkar, he overthrew Humbanigas of Elam, he defeated Seveh (So), king of Egypt, at Raphia, and took prisoner Hanno of Gaza. The years 719 and 718 were employed in successful campaigns against little known princes, — "Mitatti of Zirkirtu" and "Kiakku of Simlita." In 717 occurred a campaign against Pisiri of Gargamis (Karkemish). 716 was spent in subduing a revolt of tributary princes in Armenia. In 715 the king's attention was divided between Armenia, where disturbances continued, and Media; and in this year occurred one of the transportations of colonists, that to Samaria, referred to above. In this year, also, Sargon came for the second time in contact with the Egyptian kingdom, which in the person of its Pharaoh paid him tribute. The Arabian prince Samsieh and the Sabeen Hamar did the same. B.C. 714 found Armenia again in revolt, but the result was not successful. In 713 and 712 there were less important campaigns in the East and the West, followed in 711 by the expedition against Azuri, king of Ashdod, resulting in the fall of the city, to which Isaiah refers in the passage cited above (xx. 1). Sargon dwells on this at some length, and it was doubtless a critical campaign for his dominion in south-western Asia. The occasion of it was the refusal of Azuri to pay tribute to Assyria, backed by a league with neighboring princes. This dangerous movement called down the speedy vengeance of the Assyrian king. Azuri was dethroned, and his brother, Ahimit, made king in his place. "The men of Hatti" (the term used here also in a wide sense, see above) rejected this new ruler, and made a certain Jaman their king. Forthwith the Assyrian army came. Jaman fled to Egypt, and Ashdod was captured. We are told further that the king of Ethiopia was terrified at this success of the Assyrians so near the Egyptian frontier, and that he not only commissioned ambassadors to sue for peace for himself, but also gave up the fugitive Jaman, and even sent him in chains to Assyria. It is quite in keeping with the over-weening vanity of an Assyrian monarch, that Sargon, in this account, gives no credit to the Tartan, or general, who commanded the army before Ashdod, and narrates this conquest in the first person. But at all events his record gives us a welcome light on the relation of the fall of Ashdod to the prophecy contained in Isa. xx. 2-6. It intimates a close connection between the Philistines and Egypt at the time of the revolt of the former. It was doubtless in dependence upon help from Egypt that the revolt had been undertaken. It is probable that Ashdod had attempted to draw Jerusalem into the conspiracy, and Isaiah's prophetic act and word were designed to show the reckless folly of any such combination in view of the overwhelming power of Assyria. The Egyptian party at Jerusalem had always an uncompromising opponent in the prophet.

In the years 710, 709, Sargon's attention was called to Babylonia again by the hostilities of the ind-fatigable Merodach-baladan. The result was the second overthrow of the latter, and Sargon's assumption of the title "King of Babylon" in 709. From this year and the three years following, clay tablets are in existence bearing a double date, — "13th (11th, 15th, or 16th) year of Sargon, king of Assyria, and 1st (2d, 3d, or 4th) year (as) king of Babylon." This is very important, because the Canon of Ptolemy also gives the first year of "Ἀπύατος," king of Babylon, as 709; and we thus have one point in the Assyrian chronology fixed with absolute definiteness. Sargon's name continued to inspire terror far and wide; and we have especial record of a Cypriote embassy which waited upon him this year in Babylon, and brought him tribute. He graciously replied by the present of an inscribed block of stone, which has been discovered in the Island of Cyprus.

In B.C. 708 a campaign against Kummach (Comagene) took place, and this was followed by military expeditions of less consequence. The later years of Sargon's reign, beginning even as early as 712, were largely occupied with the building of a great city, Dur-Sarrakin ("Fortress of Sargon"), modern Khorsabad, about fifteen miles north-east from Mosul. The chief building in this city was his own magnificent palace, where most of the records of his deeds were preserved. By this splendid work he raised a monument to the enduring memory of the conqueror of Babylon.

After a reign of seventeen years he died — perhaps by violence, but we do not certainly know — in B.C. 705, and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib. (See the art.)

FRANCIS BROWN.

SARPI, Paolo, generally known as Fra Paolo, or Padre Paolo; b. at Venice, Aug. 11, 1552; d. there Jan. 15, 1623. He entered the order of the Servites in 1566, and was ordained a priest in 1571, and in 1579 elected provincial of his order. In the controversy between Venice and Pope Paul V. he took a prominent part. He excited the ire of the curia by his views of the secular government as divinely instituted, of ecclesiastical exemption as merely a privilege granted by the king, of papal excommunication as depending for its validity upon its justice, etc., which he developed in his Considerazioni sopra le censure di P. Paolo V. (Venice, 1606), Storia particolare delle cose passate fra Paolo V. e la repubblica di Venezia (Lyons, 1621), De interdicti Uniti historia (Eng. trans. by Bedell, 1626). He was summoned before the Inquisition of Rome, but refused to come. He was excommunicated, but freed from the ban by the peace between the Pope and the Republic in 1607. He was, nevertheless, persecuted as long as he lived, and attacked by assassins even in his own monastery. His most celebrated work, however, is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva, 1619, and was translated into English (1676), French, and German. It is written with pronounced opposition to the Roman system, and, if not Protestant, is at least reformatory in its fundamental principles. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1677 and often, Geneva, 1687, Naples, 1790. His life was written by BIANCHI GIOVINI (Zurich, 1836), CORNELI (Vienna, 1859), A. CAMPRELL (Florence, 1875), and GALLANO CAPASSO, in Rivista Europea, 1879-80. Besides the works mentioned above, there is an English translation of his History of the quarrels of Pope Pius V. with the state of Venice (London, 1626), History of the Inquisition (1655), and of his History of ecclesiastical benefices and revenues (Westminster, 1727).

SARTORIUS, Ernst Wilhelm Christian, an able and learned theologian of the Lutheran Church; b. at Darmstadt, May 10, 1797; d. at Königsberg, June 13, 1859. He studied theology at Göttingen, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824, and superintendent-general of the province of Prussia in 1835. His principal writings are Beitrag zur evangelischen Rechtgläubigkeit (1825), Lehre vom Christ Person (1831), Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe (1840-50), Soli deo gloria, posthumously published in 1860. He was also a steady contributor to Hengstenberg's Evangelische Kirchenzeitung.

SARUM USE, the liturgy put forth (A.D. 1087) by Osmund, bishop of Sarum, based on the Anglo-Saxon and Norman liturgies, which was gradually incorporated into the ritual books of various parts of England, more particularly in the south; "was used a good deal in France, and until quite lately in Portugal." It is supposed that the bloody opposition of the monks to the style of chanting invented by William of Fescamp, when Thurstan, abbot of Eilstonbury attempted (1085), to introduce it, called Osmund's attention to the varieties of use, and led him to revise the ritual upon the occasion of opening his new cathedral. SATURNINUS, one of the most celebrated missionaries and martyrs of the third century; was a native of Italy, and was in 215 sent as a missionary to Gaul by Pope Fabian. SATURNINUS THE GNOSTIC. See Gnosticism, p. 880.

SAUL, the first king of Israel, was a son of Kish the Benjamite (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 1), of Gibeath. Saul, i.e., the "desired," is described as "a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (ix. 2). At the desire of the people for a king, Samuel is illuminated by the Spirit of the Lord as to whom he was to anoint. Saul, who had gone out to seek the asses of his father, is advised by his servant to consult the "seer" at Ramah as to the fate of the asses. At the gate they met the seer for the first time. It was Samuel. A divine intimation had indicated to him the approach and future destiny of the youthful Benjamite. Surprised at his language, but still obeying his call, they ascended to the high place; and in the inn, at the top, they found a company, in which Saul was especially distinguished. When Saul was about to return home, Samuel poured over Saul's head the consecrated oil, and with a kiss of salutation announced to him that he was to be the ruler of the nation. From that moment on, a new life dawned upon Saul; and at every step homeward it was confirmed by the incidents, which, according to Samuel's prediction, awaited him (x. 9, 10). As only Samuel and Saul knew of what had taken place among themselves, Samuel convened an assembly at Mizpeh, and lots were cast as to who was to be king. Saul was named, and by a divine intimation found hidden in the circle of baggage around the encampment (x. 17-24). His stature at once conciliated the public feeling; and the people shouted, "God save the king!" (x. 23, 24). The murmurs of the worthless part of the community, who refused to salute him with the accustomed presents, were soon hushed by an occasion arising to justify the selection of Saul. He was on his way home, driving his herd of oxen, when tidings reached his ears of the threat issued by Nahash, king of Ammon, against Jabesh-gilead. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul," and in this emergency he had recourse to the expedient of the earlier days. He sent throughout Israel as a message the bones of two of the oxen which he was driving. All the people "came out with one consent" (xi. 7) at Bezek; and Saul, at the head of a vast multitude, totally routed the Ammonites, and obtained a higher glory by exhibiting a new instance of clemency, which those experienced who had formerly despised him. Under the direction of Samuel, Saul and the people took themselves to Gilgal, where with solemn sacrifices the victorious leader was reinstated in his kingdom (xi.). At Gilgal Samuel resigned his office as judge, and warned both the people and Saul of the danger of disobedience to the commands of God (xiii.). In the third year of his reign Saul collected a standing army of three thousand men, of whom two thousand were at Michmash with the king, and a thousand, under the command of his son Jonathan, at Gibeath. Israel's old foe, the Philistines, had again lifted up his head, and tried to regain the former supremacy. Even a Philistine officer had been stationed in Saul's own land (x. 5, xiii. 3). This officer was slain by Jonathan; and the Philistines now marched against Israel, and encamped at Michmash. The people panic-stricken fled to rocks and caverns for safety. Saul called the people together at Gilgal, and waited there for Samuel. When the seventh day had come, Saul at last ordered sacrifices to be offered. Just after the sacrifice was completed, Samuel arrived, and pronounced the first curse on his impetuous zeal (xiii. 5-14). Samuel, having announced the displeasure of Jehovah and its consequences, left him, and Saul returned to Gibeath. Meanwhile the adventurous exploit of his son brought on the crisis which ultimately drove the Philistines back to their own territory. Jonathan having assailed a garrison of the Philistines, Saul, aided by a panic of the enemy, effected a great slaughter; but by a rash and foolish denunciation he impeded his success, and, unless prevented by the more enlightened conscience of the people, would have ended with putting Jonathan to death for an act, which, being done in total ignorance, could involve no guilt. The expulsion of the Philistines at once placed Saul in a position higher than that of any previous ruler of Israel. Saul was at the zenith of his glory. He was now able not merely to act on the defensive, but to attack the neighboring tribes of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Zobah, and finally Amalek (xiv. 47). The war with Amalek is twice related,—first briefly (xiv. 48), and then at length (xv. 1-9). Its chief connection with Saul's history lies in the disobedience to the prophetic command of Samuel, shown in the sparing of the king and the retention of the spoil. This rebellion against the directions of Jehovah was now visited by that final rejection of his family from succeeding him on the throne which had before been threatened (xiii. 13, 14, xv. 23). Samuel, after having slain Agag, withdraws to Ramah, mourning for Saul (xv. 35). David, whom Samuel had secretly anointed as king, was filled with the Spirit of God, which departed from Saul to make room for an evil spirit (xvi. 14). David, who was a cunning player on the harp, is brought before the king in order to divert his melancholy. David's music had such a soothing effect upon the king that he loved him greatly. When, however, after the victory which David had gained over Goliath, the people shouted, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands," Saul's love towards David was turned into hatred,—a hatred which wished David's death under any circumstances (xix. 1). Saul would have carried out his murderous intentions, were it not for the intercession of his son Jonathan, the intimate friend of David. Indeed, Jonathan succeeded for a time in bringing about a friendly relation between his father and his friend; but this was of but a short duration. David was compelled to assume the position of an outlaw. A portion of the people were base enough to minister to the evil passions of Saul (xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1); and others, perhaps, might color their fear by the pretence of conscience (xxiii. 12). But his sparing Saul's life twice, when he was completely in his power, must have destroyed all color of right in Saul's conduct in the minds of the people, as it also did in his own conscience (xxiv. 3-7, xxvi.). At last the monarchy itself which he had raised up broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines re-entered the country. Saul, forsaken of God, who gave him no oracles, had recourse to necromancy and divination, although he had formerly executed the penalty of the law on all those who practised these things (xxviii. 5). He consults a woman living at Endor, who conjures up the spirit of Samuel. From Samuel he hears that his doom is sealed. In the battle which took place on Gilboa, Saul, after his three sons had been killed, perished by his own sword (xxxi. 1). The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped and decapitated. The armor was deposited in the temple of Astarte; the head was deposited in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron. x. 10). The corpse was removed from Bethshan by the gratitude of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who carried off the bodies, burned them, and buried them (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). After the lapse of several years, his ashes and those of Jonathan were removed by David to their ancestral sepulchre at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xvi. 11). The Old Testament says nothing about the length of Saul's reign, but Acts xiii. 21 states it as forty years. Comp. SCHLIER: Die Könige in Israel (Stuttgart, 1853), p. 35; EWALD: *Geschichte d. SAUMUR, a town of France, on the Loire, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, now famous for its manufactures of rosaries; was the seat of the celebrated Protestant academy founded in 1595 by the national synod of Montpellier, and suppressed by a royal edict of Jan. 8, 1685. The academy, which developed the first fertile school of criticism in modern theology, owed to a certain extent both its existence and its scientific character to Duplessis-Mornay, who was the governor of the place, and watched the young institution with great tenderness. The Scotchman Cameron became one of its first professors, and he brought with him that spirit of free and independent research which afterwards characterized the academy during the whole course of its life. Three of his disciples became professors there nearly at the same time, — Moysse Amyraut (Amyratus), 1633-61, Josue de la Place (Placcus), 1633-65, and Louis Cappel, 1611-58. Amyraut is the father of the system of hypothetical universalism, based upon the two propositions, that God has by an absolute and arbitrary decree excluded no one from being saved by the death of Christ, but has only made persevering and unflinching faith in the Saviour an indispensable condition of salvation. The system was denounced by Pierre de Moulin, professor of the academy of Sedan, as an attack upon the divine majesty of God; but the national synods of Alençon (1637) and Charenton (1645) supported Amyraut. Placcus maintained that original sin consists simply in that corruption to which the offspring of Adam is heir, and that the first sin of Adam is not imputed to us. The national synod of Charenton condemned those propositions; but several provincial synods held that the national synod had acted a little hastily, and refused to carry out its decree. Of still greater importance were the researches of Louis Cappel concerning the integrity of the various documents of the Old Testament. The strict Calvinists were fully aware, that, if the results of those researches were to be accepted, the doctrine of the literal inspiration of Scripture had to be given up, and a hot contest ensued. After the death of Amyraut, Placcus, and Cappel, it was apparent that the fame of the academy of Saumur had passed its zenith: still men like Etienne Gausson, Claude Pajon (the father of Pajonism), and Etienne de Brás, continued to throw lustre over the academy, and attract great numbers of students. SAURIN, Elie, b. at Ussau, in Dauphny, Aug. 28, 1639; d. at Utrecht, Easter-Day, 1703. He studied theology at Die, Nîmes, and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of Delft in 1665, and of Utrecht in 1670. He is best known on account of his controversy with Jurieu, which grew so hot that the synod of Leuwarden (1695) forbade both parties, though in vain, to write any more on the matter. His principal works are Éléments de la théologie du M. Jurieu, The Hague, 1694, 2 vols.; Défense de la véritable doctrine, Utrecht, 1697, 2 vols.; Réflexions sur les droits de la conscience, Utrecht, 1697. SAURIN, Jacques, the greatest orator of the French-Reformed Church; b. at Nîmes, Jan. 6, 1677; d. at The Hague, Dec. 30, 1730. He was educated at Geneva, served four years in a regiment of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. (1691-97), studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed pastor to the French-Reformed Congregation in London (1700) and at The Hague (1705), where he gathered immense audiences by the earnestness, energy, and eloquence with which he preached the gospel. Besides his Discours (Amsterdam, 1720), whose second volume (Amsterdam, 1728) gave occasion to some disagreeable misunderstandings, he published five volumes of Sermons (1707-25), and after his death seven more volumes were published by his son. Collected editions were several times issued. The best is that of The Hague, 1719; the latest, that of Paris, 1829-35. One volume of an English translation of his Discours appeared in London, 1723. The best English translation of his sermons is edited by BRIDGER, London, 1821, 6 vols., New York, 1860, 2 vols. SAVONAROLA, Hieronymus, often called Fra Girolamo, b. at Ferrara, Sept. 21, 1452; d. at Florence, May 23, 1498, the originator and the victim of an ecclesiastico-political reform movement, sometimes wrongly represented as an inspired prophet, and wonder-working saint, but sometimes, also, as an ambitious demagogue and deluded fanatic. He was by his parents destined to study medicine; but a steadily deepening impression of the corruption of the world in general, and the church especially, concentrated the whole force of his character on the one point, the salvation of his soul; and in 1475, in the twenty-third year of his age, he left the parental home, and sought refuge in a Dominican monastery at Bologna. The conversion was in strict harmony with the mediæval ideas of monasticism, and involved no reformatory impulse at all. He simply wanted to become a lay-brother, and do the mean work of the house; but his superiors determined that he should study theology, and in course of time he became thoroughly conversant with the Bible, — which he knew almost entirely by heart, and of which especially the Old Testament and the Revelation inspired him with passionate sympathy, — and also with the writings of Thomas Aquinas the great Dominican doctor, of St. Augustine, and others. He also began to preach, but at first without any success. Suddenly, however, at Brescia, his powerful eloquence broke forth in all its wealth; and in 1490 he was sent as lector to the Dominican monastery of San Marco in Florence.

He taught first in his cell, then in the garden of the cloister, finally in the cathedral; and immense audiences thronged to hear him expound the Revelation. "Your sins make me a prophet," he said to them; and from the depths of that stirring, brilliant, half-pagan life which the Mediceis had called forth in Florence, he conjured up a stinging sense of its emptiness and desolation. The reformer began to work. A radical, doctrinal reform, however, as was achieved by Luther and Calvin, Savonarola never dreamed of: in all essential points he agreed with the traditional system of the Church of Rome. What he wanted was simply a moral regeneration of the church, hand in hand with a political regeneration of Italy, more especially of Florence. In 1491 he was elected prior of San Marco, and Lorenzo the Magnificent soon became aware of the strong fascination the prior exercised upon the people. But Lorenzo died, April 8, 1492; and his son Pietro had neither his sagacity nor his self-control. When in August, 1494, Charles VIII. of France crossed the Apennines at the head of a powerful army, Savonarola believed that the moment for action had come. The Mediceis were expelled from the city, and the re-organization of the state after a theocratical model was intrusted to him. He seemed to succeed. With the new constitution a new spirit awakened. Love to Christ seemed to have become the predominant impulse. Deadly foes fell upon each other's bosoms. Property illegitimately held was returned. All profane amusements ceased. The monasteries filled up. The churches were thronged. "Indeed," says a contemporary writer, "the people of Florence seem to have become fools from mere love of Christ."

It was the idea of Savonarola, with Florence as a basis, to push the reform farther through all Italy, and he consequently soon began to direct his attacks against the chief seat of the corruption, Rome. In 1492 the monster Alexander VI. had ascended the Papal throne. He was afraid of the preacher, and offered him the archbishopric of Florence and a cardinal's hat, if he would keep silent; but the offer was declined. Then he changed tone, and summoned the reformer to Rome to defend himself; but the summons was not obeyed. Finally, in the fall of 1496, he issued a brief, forbidding, under penalty of excommunication, the prior of San Marco to preach, because he had undertaken to prophesy and reform without any authorization from the church. But Savonarola entered the pulpit with the Papal brief in his hand, and demonstrated, by a singular train of reasoning, that it came, not from the Pope, but from the Devil. Meanwhile, political affairs began to give trouble. The campaign of Charles VIII. proved a failure. Famine and the plague visited Florence in 1497. The jealousy of the Franciscans broke out into open opposition. The intrigues of the banished Mediceis became more and more active, and a reaction set in against the popular enthusiasm for the reformer. Alexander VI. was not slow in utilizing these difficulties. In May, 1497, he formally excommunicated Savonarola; in October of the same year he forbade all Christians to hold any kind of converse with him; and towards the close of the year he threatened to lay the interdict on the city, unless the people delivered up the seducer.

In this critical moment Savonarola challenged an ordeal. Standing on the balcony of the cathedral, with the host between his hands, he asked God to destroy him by fire, if he had preached or prophesied lies. A Franciscan monk accepted the challenge. Savonarola hesitated, but was pressed onwards by the enthusiasm of his party. On April 7, 1498, the ordeal was destined to take place. Two pyres were formed in the market-place. They were even lighted, when a quarrel between the Franciscans and Dominicans, whether the combatants should carry the cross or the host through the fire, caused some delay. A rain-storm, in the mean time, put out the fires; and the whole disappointment of the frenzied multitude of spectators fell upon Savonarola. From that moment he completely lost his power over the people, and even became an object of pity and contempt. Arrested by his enemies, and put to the torture, he confessed whatever he was demanded to confess; and, though he afterwards retracted, he was by the Papal commissioners condemned as a heretic, and surrendered to the civil authorities for punishment. He was burned at the stake, — erected in the form of a cross, — together with two of his most zealous adherents. The Dominican order, however, has since taken great pains to have him canonized. He left several works in Latin and Italian. The treatise on Ps. li., which he wrote during his imprisonment, was republished by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Compendium Revelationum, written in 1495. His principal theological work is his Trionfo della Croce, a defence of Christianity against the sceptical tendencies of the Medicean epoch, written in 1497 (English Translation, Triumph of the Cross, London, 1868). In 1882 a bust of Savonarola was placed in the Hall of the Five Hundred at Florence.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, b. at Agen, on the Garonne, Aug. 4, 1510; d. at Leyden, Jan. 21, 1609. He studied in Paris, and was in 1592 appointed professor at Leyden. He was the most learned man of his age, understood thirteen languages, and was well versed not only in philology and history, but also in philosophy, theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, etc. Most of his writings are philological; but his Thesaurus temporum (Amsterdam, 1658), the first system of chronology ever formed, and his Expositio universalis Constantini (Leyden, 1604), have considerable interest to the church historian.

SCAPEGOAT. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

SCAPULARY (from the Latin scapula, the "shoulder-blade") means a narrow shoulder-band, of various colors, and adorned with a picture of the Virgin, or a cross, which is worn by several monastic orders and religious fraternities of the Roman-Catholic Church. As a piece of dress it has no particular purpose, but it is believed to be a preservative against death by water or fire. According to the bull Sabbatina the Virgin has personally promised Pope John XXI. that any one who wears a scapulary with her image shall be delivered from purgatory on the first Saturday after death.

SCHADE, Georg, b. at Apemede in Sleswick, May 8, 1711; d. at Kiel in Holstein, April 10, 1795. He was practising as an advocate in Altona, Holstein, when in 1760 he published in Berlin and Leipzig De moralibus et eorum Religione, in which he gave strict mathematical evidence that metaphysics was the only true theoretical, and morals the only true practical, religion. Immediately after appeared a refutation of that book by Rosenstand Goisee, professor at the university of Copenhagen; but the refutation was evidently a mere trick by which to draw attention to the book. Frederik V. of Denmark, to whose dominion Holstein at that time belonged, did not relish the joke, however, but put the author in Christiansøe, the Danish Bastille, from which he was not released until 1775, under Christian VII., when he was allowed to settle as an advocate at Kiel. See J. A. BOLTES: Historische Kirchen-Nachrichten von der Stadt Altona, which also contains a full list of Schade's other writings. L. HELLER.

SCHADE, Johann Caspar, b. at Kulndorf in 1696; d. in Berlin, July 25, 1698. He studied at Leipzig, where he became an intimate friend of Francke; and was in 1699 appointed preacher at the Church of St. Nicholas, in Berlin, where Spener was provost. In 1697 he published Praxis des Bichtstuhls und Abendmahls, which occasioned a rescript from the government, according to which, private confession ceased to be obligatory in the Prussian Church.

SCHAEFFER, Charles Frederick, D.D., b. Sept. 3, 1807; d. Nov. 23, 1880; an eminent theologian of the Lutheran Church, son of Frederick David Schaeffer, D.D., pastor in Philadelphia; was a graduate of Pennsylvania University; pursued his theological studies under his father and the Rev. Dr. Denme; served, 1832 to 1855, congregations at Carlisle, Hagerstown, Red Hook (N.Y.), Easton (Penn.). From 1810 to 1815 he had charge of a professorship in the theological seminary, Columbus, O.; was in 1855 called to the German professorship in Pennsylvania College, and in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., and in 1861 to the chair of dogmatic theology in the newly established theological Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia, where he conscientiously performed his duties until 1879. He was a representative of the strictly conservative tendency, adhering to the symbols of the Lutheran Church according to their original meaning. Of his solid scholarship his publications bear witness. — historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles in the Gettysburg Evangelical Review; translation of LICHTER'S Commentary on the Acts, in Schaff's edition of LANG'S Bible-work; translations of JOHN ARND'S True Christianity, and of H. KURTZ'S Sacred History. W. J. MANN.

SCHALL, Johann Adam, b. at Cologne, 1591; d. in China, Aug. 15, 1666. He was educated in the Collegium Germanicum in Rome; entered the order of the Jesuits, and was in 1628 sent as a missionary to China, where he remained to his death. He acquired the confidence of the Chinese Government (which proved of great advantage to the mission), and translated into Chinese many mathematical treatises, interlarded with religious and Christian discussions. He also wrote Historia missionis Societatis Jesu apud Chineses, Vienna, 1665, and Ratibon, 1672. G. H. KUTTEL.

SCHAUFFLER, William Gottlieb, D.D., LL.D., missionary and Bible-translator; b. at Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, Aug. 22, 1798; d. in New York City, Friday, Jan. 26, 1883. In 1801 his father removed to Odessa, South Russia. At fifteen he was confirmed in the Lutheran Church; at twenty-two, converted. He then determined to be a missionary. But his educational advantages had been small, though diligently improved, and the way seemed hedged up. But in 1826 he met the famous missionary, Joseph Wolff, who took him to Constantinople, there to be fitted for missionary labors; and from there he went to Smyrna, where Jonas King induced him to go to America. For five years he studied at Andover, became an American citizen, and then, under the care of the American Board, went to Constantinople (1811), where, with the exception of a few years spent elsewhere, he resided and labored. He was particularly interested in the conversion of the Jews, and for their benefit revised and superintended the publication of the Old Testament, in Hebrew-Spanish, at Vienna, 1839-42. But his great work was the translation of the whole Bible into Osmanli-Turkish, the language of the educated Turks. This occupied him eighteen years. In 1867 Halle gave him the degree of D.D., in express acknowledgment of this work. In 1861 his peace-making between two high dignitaries at Constantinople was acknowledged by a decoration sent him by King William of Prussia. In 1877 he was made a doctor of laws by Princeton College. He was a remarkable linguist, being familiar with some nineteen languages, and able to preach extemporaneously in six (German, Italian, French, English, Spanish, and Turkish). He published Meditations on the Last Days of Christ (Boston, 1837, several editions).

SCHEFFLER, Johann (Angelus Silesius), b. at Breslau in 1621; d. there July 9, 1677. He studied medicine at Strassburg, Leyden (where he first became acquainted with Jacob Boehme's writings), and Padua (where he took his degree), and was in 1649 appointed body-physician to the Duke of Wurtemberg; but he remained only three years at the court of Oels. In 1653 he returned to Breslau, and embraced Romanism. In 1657 he published his two most celebrated works: Cherubische Wandersmuthen (a collection of minor poems, almost of the character of proverbs), and Geistliche Hirtensieder (a collection of hymns), both characterized by a peculiarly deep and sweet mysticism. His polemical writings show quite a different character. In 1691 he was ordained a priest; and from that time he spent the rest of his life in a series of violent, sometimes almost unseemly, attacks on the Reformers and the Reformed churches; which (thirty-nine treatises) were collected under the title Eccelesiologia, and appeared at Glatz, 1677, 1 vol. fol. See KAHLERT: Johannes Silesius, Breslau, 1853. DRYANDER.

SCHELHORN, Johann Georg, b. at Memmingen, Dec. 8, 1691; d. there March 31, 1773. He studied at Jena, and settled then in his native city as preacher and librarian. Of his writings the following have great interest to the church historian: Annuntius historica eccl. (Leipz., 1737-46, 3 vols.), Acta hist.-eccl. Saxe. XI. et XII. (Erm., 1762-61, 4 vols.), De vita Camerarii (1740, etc.).

SCHELLING, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, 1. LIT. and WRITINGS. — He was b. Jan. 27, 1775, at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, where his father was pastor; d. in Ragatz, Switzerland, Aug. 20, 1854. In his sixteenth year he entered the university of Tübingen to study theology, together with Hegel and the unfortunate poet Holderlin. Lessing, Herder, and Kant were the leaders of these young men; and especially the influence of Herder is seen in Schelling's academic dissertation, Antiquissimum de primo malorum origina philosophematis explicandi Gen. iii. tentamen criticum (1792), as well as in the essay on Myths. Historical Le-gende, and Philosophemes of the earliest times (1793). In the year 1796 he went to Leipzig to study natural science and mathematics, and began in 1798 to lecture at Jena as a colleague of Fichte, whose doctrines had so far been of the most decisive influence upon the development of his own philosophy. Here he came also in contact with Goethe and the other great men of literature. In 1801 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Würzburg, where he remained till 1806. In 1807 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences at Munich; lectured in Erlangen, 1820-26, in Munich, 1827; was called, 1841, to Berlin to lecture on mythology and revelation. His principal writings are, Idea of a Philosophy of Nature, 1797; Of the World-Soul, etc., 1798; System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800; Lectures on the Method of Academic Study, 1803; Philosophical Inquiries concerning the Nature of Human Freedom, 1809; Lectures on Mythology and Revelation, in his complete Works, published after his death.

II. SCHELLING'S DOCTRINE IN ITS GRADUAL DEVELOPMENT. 1. Schelling as a Follower of Fichte. — Schelling, in whose philosophy two great periods may be distinguished, cannot be fully understood without a precise knowledge of the preceding philosophers; and, because his first philosophical endeavors are based entirely on the ground of Kant-Fichte's idealism, it is necessary to sketch this in a few lines. Kant, who calls his own philosophy "criticism," had by a thorough scrutiny of our faculty of knowledge come to the conclusion that our knowledge of the world exterior to us is merely subjective, that we never know the "things in themselves," but only through the forms of space and time which we add to them as the only medium of our perception. But, while our faculty of knowledge is thus very limited in regard to objects of experience, we enjoy a realm of freedom as moral beings. Pure practical reason has therefore the primacy over the speculative reason. On our moral consciousness only, our convictions of freedom, of immortality, and of the existence of God, are founded. An ethical theism was thus the result of Kant's doctrine.

This idealism was carried to its furthest consequences by Fichte. He accepts the critical result of Kant, that the Ego is theoretically limited in regard to the object as the Non-Ego. But this Non-Ego has no reality without us: it is, as well as the forms (space and time) by which we perceive it, the result of the activity of the Ego, the production of an unconscious intuition. This creative Ego is not the individual, but the absolute Ego. The Non-Ego is therefore the same with the Ego, which is thus not limited by an outward reality, but by itself. Yet every limit is a contradiction to the infinite nature of the Ego, its independent, free activity; and so an infinite striving at every hindrance is revealed to us. In this striving the nature of practical reasoning consists; and the antithesis of both — the limited theoretical and the infinite practical reason — constitutes the empirical Ego, the individual. This, however, could not be understood if the true nature of the Ego was not absolute activity. Under the ground of all actions of the individual lies the activity of the absolute Ego, in which both subject and object are yet one. This pure, absolute Ego may only be comprehended by an intellectual intuition. It is, according to Fichte, the highest principle of philosophy, the moral order of the world, without personality and self-consciousness,—God. And this, the absolute, he made his point of departure in his later speculations.

With the enthusiasm of youth, Schelling accepted this ethical Pantheism in the earliest period of his thinking; but very soon we see him taking his own ways.

2. Schelling's "Philosophy of Nature" and "Transcendental Idealism," 1796-1800.—It is in this period that Schelling creates a new epoch in German philosophy, a new form of dogmatism with a creative knowledge, instead of the critical one of Kant-Fichte. To Schelling's rich mind, open to the impressions of nature, it could not remain concealed that nature took only a subordinate position in Fichte's system,—the position of an ethical medium of the individual. The great new thought which Schelling introduced now was this, that nature is a form of the revelation of the absolute Ego as well as intelligence. Nature is visible mind, and mind is invisible nature. The highest end of Nature (i.e., to reflect herself) is manifested through all nature, but is reached only in man, where she becomes wholly objective to herself. Philosophical reasoning can therefore not end with nature: it is driven to the other pole of the absolute,—to Ego, the intelligence. In his System of Transcendental Idealism, Schelling tries to give a history of the Ego, or the development of self-consciousness. Similar to that process of nature, to come to self-consciousness, there are different stages of development in the life of the Ego, the highest of which is art. Here the harmony of the conscious and unconscious is reached, and the Ego comes to the highest intuition.

The absolute identity of subject and object, which Schelling found embodied in the works of art, begins now to be the starting-point of his thinking in—

3. The Period of the System of Identity.—At the head of this system he places the notion of the absolute, and defines it as absolute reason, the total indifference of subject and object. The highest law of its existence is absolute identity ($A = A$). Every thing that exists is this absolute itself: nothing exists outside of it; and so it is the universe itself, not the cause of it. As both subject and object are contained in the absolute, and the absolute must posit itself as subject and object, there may be a preponderance of either the subject or of the object, although the absolute will always be contained in both of them. In this way he obtains mind on one side, nature on the other: the different stadia of mind and nature are potencies of the subject-object.

It is in this period, and especially in his Lectures on Aesthetic Study, that Schelling for the first time brings religion and Christianity into the realm of his system. Corresponding to the antithesis of real and ideal, of nature and history in the universe, there is a similar antithesis in history itself. The ancient world and ancient religion represent to us the preponderance of nature (polytheism); while in Christianity the ideal is revealed in mystery. In the progress of history are three periods to be distinguished,—the period of nature, which found its bloom in Greek religion and poetry; the period of faith, at the end of the ancient world; and the period of providence, which entered with Christianity. God became objective for the first time in Christ. This incarnation is not a temporal, but an eternal act. Christ sacrifices in his person the finite to enable by this the coming of the Spirit as the light of a new world. By speculative knowledge alone, Schelling expects a regeneration of esoteric Christianity and the proclamation of the absolute gospel.

Thoughts similar to these are expressed in the essay on Philosophy and Religion (1801). This and his Philosophical Inquiries concerning Human Freedom show us,

4. Schelling in the Transition to his Later Doctrine, which is characterized by his inclination to theosophic speculation and the influence of Christian mysticism, especially of Jacob Boehme.

Kant-Fichte's idealism had, according to Schelling, not given a sufficient notion of freedom, because it lacked the basis of realism. Such a realism is contained in his philosophy; because he distinguishes in God a basis, the nature in God, in which all beings, and therefore man also, have their cause. This nature in God, a dark, blind will, is an eternal yearning to produce itself, and rests also at the ground of our existence. But God produces in himself a perception of himself, which is understanding, the expression of that yearning. Both together, eternal yearning and understanding, are then in God that loving, almighty will which creates all things. In man we find both principles united,—the principle of nature, and the principle of light and understanding. As a part of that dark will, he has a will of his own: as gifted with understanding, he is an organ of the universal will. The separation of both principles is the possibility of good and evil, which presupposes human freedom. The predominance of man's particular will is the evil. The decision of man for the evil is an act, but an eternal act, because it was done before time. Only through God can the particular and the universal will be united again. And it is done by revelation, or by God's adopting of man's nature.

The philosophy of religion, which Schelling has given here in broad outlines, is finally completed in—

5. Schelling's Later Doctrine.—Schelling begins with a distinction of negative and positive philosophy. As negative philosophy he describes the philosophy of Hegel, which is unable to give us a full knowledge of reality.

Because it is the desire of human reason, as well as the object of true philosophy, to find the absolute Being, and because Schelling wants to obtain the notion of an absolute Spirit, he distinguishes three potencies in the divine essence, the possibility of being (Sein-Können), pure being (reines Sein) without the possibility of being (actus purus), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is one, or the absolute Spirit.

This absolute Spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of himself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, as causa materialis, causa efficiens, and causa finalis of the world. Only through creation, which is an act of his will, not of his nature, God comes to a full knowledge of himself.

Schelling believes that his notion of God is also the original notion of monotheism; and, based upon his theory of the three potencies in God, he develops also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The three persons of the Trinity, who proceed from the potencies by a theogenic process, are, the Father as the creator, who gives matter to the creatures; the Son, begotten of the Father, who contributes the forms; and the Spirit, who is the completion of creation. But only at the end of creation Son and Spirit become perfect personalities, yet both are in God, so that we have only one God in three personalities.

In man, as the image of God, we have the same three potencies and a similar freedom, which may separate the harmony of the potencies. The separation of the potencies has become actual in the fall of man. In order to restore the harmony, and bring the fallen world and man back to the Father, the Son himself must become man.

But the Son can at first realize this only as a natural potency, which is done in the mythological process. After having overcome here the anti-divine principle, he can act also according to his will, as the ideal potency; and this free personal acting is revelation.

It is impossible to follow Schelling here into his elaborate construction of mythology, which is rich in deep and grand thoughts.

Revelation finally broke through mythology, as it appears even in the Old Testament, by Christ's incarnation. The person of Christ is the centre of Christianity. Here the second potency divests itself of the "form of God," which it had in the mythologic consciousness (Phil. ii. 6-8), and becomes man, suffers and dies, not only to bring freedom to men, but to become by obedience one with the Father (1 Cor. xv. 28).

Schelling closes his philosophy with a glance at the history of the church. He distinguishes three great periods, and names them after the characters and names of the three apostles, — The Petrine Period, or Catholicism; The Pauline Period, or Protestantism; and The Johannine Period, or the "church of the future."

[While Schelling stands, on one side, in the most intimate connection with the great poetic and philosophic movements of the last century; while especially his earlier philosophy is but a philosophic expression of that yearning to comprehend the absolute as it appears above all in Goethe's Faust, and while his system is the highest glorification of genius as celebrated by the romantic school, — we have on the other side, in Schelling's later philosophy, the greatest endeavor of modern philosophy to construct the system of Christian doctrine. His thoughts have had great influence upon modern German theology (and upon Coleridge), especially his idea of the three ages of church history. His philosophy is an illustration of his own saying, "The German nation strives with her whole nature after religion, but, according to her peculiarity, after a religion which is connected with knowledge, and based upon science."]

SCHELWIC, Samuel, b. at Polish Lissa, March 8, 1643; d. at Danzig, Jan. 18, 1715. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Danzig in 1675. In the great Pietist controversy he sided with the orthodox Lutherans, and published a great number of violent polemical tracts, in which he actually treated Spener as a heretic. The most important are Catechismus-Reinigung (Danzig, 1684), Synopsis controversiarum (Danzig, 1701), De Novatianismo (1702), Manducatio ad August. Confess. (1711), and Mon. ad Form. Concord. (1712).

SCHEM, Alexander Jacob, b. in Wiedenbruck, Westphalia, March 16, 1826; d. at West Hoboken, N.J., May 21, 1881. He studied philology and theology at Bonn and Tübingen, 1843-46; was a priest of the Roman Church, but became a Protestant and emigrated to America, 1851; did literary work, and taught ancient and modern languages; was professor of the same at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1854-60; was regular contributor to APPLETON'S New American Cyclopædia from 1859 to 1863; to the Annual Cyclopædia, in the foreign and religious departments, from its first number (1861) to 1872; and to McCLINTOCK and STONG'S Cyclopædia, 1867-81; foreign editor of the Tribune (newspaper), 1864-66; editor of the Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon, 1869-74, 12 vols.; assistant superintendent of public schools, New-York City, 1874 till his death; with Henry Kiddle edited a Cyclopædia of Education, 1877, and the supplements, Year-Book of Education, 1878 and 1879. He also published the American Ecclesiastical Year-Book, 1860, and an Ecclesiastical Almanac, 1868 and 1869.

SCHINNER, Matthäus, b. at Müllbach, in the canton of Vaud in Switzerland, in 1470; d. in Rome, Oct. 2, 1522. He was educated at Zurich and Como, and became bishop of Sitten in 1509. Employed by Pope Leo X. in Swiss politics, he was very successful in bringing about an alliance between the Pope and the Union against France, and received as a reward the cardinal's hat, in 1511. In 1514 he went as legatus a latere to England to stir up a war between Henry VIII. and Francis I., and the latter acknowledged that Schinner had been one of his worst enemies, not only in the diplomatic, but also on the battle field. Zwingli's works give several striking descriptions of the great impression the made on the soldiers. When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland, he seemed to be in perfect harmony with the movement. He offered Luther a place of refuge and support in 1519, and continued for a long time to befriend Zwingli. But his close connection with the Church of Rome, and worldly regards, at last got the better of him, and he turned against the Reformation. When Faber met him in Rome in 1521, he agreed with him that the Reformation should be put down by force.

CARL PESTALOZZI.

SCHISM, from the Greek σχιζμα, has, according to canon law, a double sense: one, more general, simply denoting a deviation from the orthodox church, with respect to organization or discipline, such as the schisms caused by Felicissimus, Novatian, Meletius, and others; and one more special, denoting a split in the highest authority of the church, such as the great Papal schism, 1378-1429. See URBAN VI., BONIFACE IX., BENEDICT XIII., etc., and the COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE.

SCHLATTER, Michael, missionary, and founder of the synod of the German-Reformed Church in the United States; was b. of a respectable family in St. Gall, Switzerland, July 14, 1746; d. near Philadelphia, October, 1790. He studied in the gymnasium of his native town, and probably also at Helmstadt; was for some time a teacher in Holland, where he was ordained to the ministry; and in 1745 was assistant minister at Wigoldingen, in his native country. In 1746 he was commissioned by the deputies of the synod of North and South Holland a missionary to the destitute German churches of Pennsylvania, with special directions to visit the scattered settlements, to organize pastoral charges, and, if possible, to form a coetus, or synod.

Schlatter arrived in America on the 1st of August, 1746. Before the end of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church of Philadelphia. Though he accepted the call, he continued to prosecute his special mission with extraordinary energy. From the year 1747 to the beginning of 1751 he travelled, as he informs us in his Journal, a distance of not less than eight thousand miles, — not reckoning his passage across the ocean, — and preached six hundred and thirty-five times. According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors. Schlatter formed the congregations into pastoral charges; and on the 29th of September, 1747, the pastors and delegated elders met, at his instance, in Philadelphia, and organized the German-Reformed coetus, or synod.

In 1751 Schlatter went to Europe, at the request of the coetus, to solicit aid for the destitute German-Reformed churches of America. He was very successful, especially in Holland, where a fund was established from which the churches received much assistance. In 1752 he returned to America, accompanied by six young ministers. He brought with him seven hundred large Bibles for distribution to churches and families.

While Schlatter was in Europe, he published, in Dutch, a Journal of his missionary labors, containing a tender appeal in behalf of the Germans in America. It was translated into German, and published in Friesen's Pastoral Nachrichten, and also separately. Rev. David Thomson, English minister in Amsterdam, translated the book into English, and became the chief promoter in England of a movement for the establishment of schools among the Germans in America. A large sum of money (Muhlenberg says twenty thousand pounds sterling) was collected for this purpose, and placed in the hands of a Society for the Promotion of the Knowledge of God among the Germans. Unfortunately, in the effort to enlist sympathy, the picture of German destitution was greatly overdrawn, and the Germans were represented in a manner that could not fail to be painful to a high-spirited people. In 1755 Schlatter was induced to resign his church in Philadelphia, and to become superintendent of the proposed "charity schools." This was a mistake: for by this time the movement had to some extent become political. An attempt was made to use the "charity" as a means of breaking the tacit alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Quakers and the Germans, and of inducing the latter to support the favorite measures of the government party. Christopher Sauer, the celebrated German printer, exerted his immense influence in opposition to the "charity schools," which, he claimed, were intended to prepare the way for an established church. The Lutheran and Reformed ministers for a while supported Schlatter in his work; but at last the popular feeling of opposition became irresistible, and the undertaking proved an utter failure. The manner in which the charity was offered had caused it to be regarded as an insult. Seidensticker says, "Schlatter's failure was due to his connection with the cause after it had assumed this unfortunate complexion. If the affair had remained on the basis on which he had with honest zeal and decided success originally placed it, the history of these schools would have been very different."

On the failure of the school-movement, Schlatter, in 1757, accompanied an expedition to Nova Scotia against the French, as chaplain of the Royal American regiment, and was present at the taking of Louisbourg. He subsequently lived in retirement at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia. During the American Revolution he was an earnest patriot, and was for some time imprisoned for refusing to resume his position of chaplain in the British army.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, b. in Breslau, Nov. 21, 1768; d. in Berlin, Feb. 12, 1831.

L. Life. — Schleiermacher's father was chaplain of a Prussian regiment in Silesia, and belonged to the Reformed communion. To his mother, a very intelligent and pious woman (as her few letters embodied in Schleiermacher's correspondence abundantly prove), he confesses himself mainly indebted for his early training, his father being frequently absent on professional journeys. Subsequently the family removed to the country, where he lived from his tenth to his fourteenth year, mostly under the instruction of his parents.

and of a teacher who first inspired him with enthusiasm for classical literature. At that time he had already commenced the struggle against a "strange scepticism," which he calls a "peculiar thorn in the flesh," and which made him doubt the genuineness of all the ancient writings. In 1783 his parents sent him, his brother, and sister, to an excellent Moravian school at Niesky in Upper Lusatia. Two years afterward he entered the Moravian college at Barby. The childlike piety, the wise mixture of instruction and amusement, and the rural quietness of these institutions, made a deep and lasting impression on his mind. He ever remembered that time with gratitude, and kept up a familiar intercourse with the society through his sister Charlotte (who had become one of its regular members), and through his intimate friend and classmate, Von Albertini, of the Grisons, subsequently bishop of the fraternity, and a distinguished hymn-writer. The type of Moravian Christianity can be clearly traced in his enthusiastic personal devotion to the Saviour, and in the strongly christological character of his dogmatic system. In his Weltanschauung, 1803 (an imitation of the Platonic Symposium), Christ appears as the living centre of all faith and true religion. But his constitutional scepticism seriously tormented him, and led to a temporary rupture with his teachers, and even with his father. The correspondence between them is highly honorable to both. With all his filial reverence and affection, the son refused to yield to mere authority, and insisted on his right of private judgment and personal investigation. The father learned to respect the manly independence and earnest mental struggles of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. With the consent of his father, he left Barby, and entered the university of Halle in 1787. His studies were rather fragmentary. He attended the lectures of Senler, the father of German neology, and of Wolff, the celebrated Greek scholar, studied modern languages and mathematics, and read the philosophical works of Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, and Jacobi. His mind was very impressive, yet too independent to follow any one teacher or system. The age was thoroughly rationalistic, and German theology was then undergoing a revolution as radical as the political revolution of France. He left the university, after a two-years' course, without a fixed system of religious opinions, yet with the hope of "attaining, by earnest research, and patient examination of all the witnesses, to a reasonable degree of certainty, and to a knowledge of the boundaries of human science and learning." In 1790 he passed the examination for licensure, and accepted a situation as private tutor in the family of Count Dohna, where he spent three years. In 1791 he was ordained to the ministry, and became assistant to his uncle, a superannuated clergyman at Landenberg on the Warta. In 1796 he was appointed chaplain at the Charité (hospital) in Berlin, and continued in this position till 1802. During these six years he moved mostly in literary circles, and identified himself temporarily with the so-called romantic school of poetry as represented by Friedrich and Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and Novalis. In 1799 he published his first important work, the Dis- courses on Religion. It had a stirring effect upon the rising generation of theologians (as Neander and Harms from different stand-points testified from their own experience), and marks the transition of German theology from an age of cold speculation to the restoration of positive faith. He appears here as an eloquent high priest of natural religion in the outer court of Christian revelation, to convince educated unbelievers that religion, far from being incongruous with intellectual culture, as they thought, was the deepest and the most universal element in man, different from knowledge and from practice,—a sacred feeling of relation to the Infinite, which purifies and ennobles all the faculties. Beyond this he did not go at that time. His piety was strongly tinged with the pantheism of Spinoza. His Monologues followed in 1800, a self-contemplation in the face of the world, and a description of the ethical ideal which floated before his mind, and was influenced by the subjective idealism of Fichte. In 1802 he broke loose from his æsthetic and literary connections, much to his own benefit, and removed for two years to Stolpe in Pomerania, as court-præcher. There he commenced his translation of Plato, which he had projected with Friedrich Schlegel in Berlin. The completion of this great undertaking in six volumes (1804-26) gave him a place among the best Greek scholars in Germany. His searching Criticism of all Former Systems of Moral Philosophy, which opened a new path in this science, belongs to the same period (1803).

In 1804 he was elected extraordinary professor of philosophy and theology in Halle. After the temporary suspension of this university in 1806, he spent some time on the Island of Rugen, then returned to Berlin as minister of Trinity Church, and married the widow of his intimate clerical friend Willich (1809), with whom, notwithstanding the great disparity of age (he might have been her father), he lived happily to the close of his life.

He took an active part in the organization of the university of Berlin, which was founded in 1810. He was elected its first theological professor, and also pastor of Trinity Church. In this double office he continued to the close of his life, and unfolded his greatest activity to an ever-widening circle of pupils and admirers. For a quarter of a century he and his colleague and former pupil, Neander, were the most influential teachers of theology, and the chief attraction in the university of the literary metropolis of Germany. At the same time he felt a lively interest in public affairs. He roused from the pulpit the sense of national independence during the deepest humiliation of Prussia, and urged the people to the war of liberation against Napoleon. He advocated liberal political opinions after the Congress of Vienna (1815), and ran the risk of sharing exile with his friends De Wette and Moritz Arndt. He was no favorite with Frederic William III.; but a few years before his death he received from the king the order of the red eagle, which he never wore. They agreed, however, in zeal for the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, which was inaugurated in 1817, at the third tercentenary celebration of the Reformation. Schleiermacher did all he could to promote it.

He was free from all sectarian bigotry. "Christ," he said, "is the quickening centre of the church. From him comes all; to him all returns. We should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. He was one of the compilers of the new Berlin hymn-book (1829), which, with all its defects, opened the way for a hymnological reform. Notwithstanding this extraordinary activity, he mingled freely in society, and was the centre of a large number of friends at his fireside. Many of his witty sayings and charades, in verse and prose, were transmitted by oral tradition in Berlin, and are still remembered.

In the beginning of February, 1834, he was seized by a severe cold, which fell on his lungs, and in a few days terminated in death. In his last hours he summoned his family around his bed, and with clear consciousness and calm serenity celebrated the holy communion. He himself distributed the elements, and solemnly confessed his implicit faith in Christ his Saviour, and in the atoning efficacy of his death. It was a worthy close of his religious career, which began in the bosom of Moravian piety. It was felt throughout all Germany that a truly representative man, and one of the brightest luminaries of the age, had departed. The funeral-orations of Steffens (a Christian philosopher), Strauss (his colleague and court-chaplain), and Marheineke (a speculative theologian of the Hegelian school, and his antagonist), gave public expression to the universal esteem and regret. His literary remains were intrusted to his friend and pupil, Dr. Jonas. He lost his only son, Nathanael, in his early youth; and the funeral-address which he himself delivered at the grave is one of his most remarkable and touching compositions. He bases there his hope of immortality solely on Christ as the resurrection and the life.

Schleiermacher was small of stature, and slightly deformed by a humpback; but his face was noble, earnest, sharply defined, and expressive of intelligence and kindly sympathy; his eye keen, piercing, and full of fire; his movements quick and animated. In his later years his white hair made him appear like a venerable sage of olden times, yet his mind retained its youthful vitality and freshness to the close. He had perfect command over his temper, and never lost his calm composure. His philosophy and theology were violently assailed by orthodox and rationalists; but he kept aloof from personal controversy, and secured the esteem even of those who widely differed from his views. He was the Plato and Origen of Germany in the nineteenth century.

II. His Character and Works. Schleiermacher was a many-sided man, and a master in several departments of intellectual and moral activity. He was a public teacher and writer, a preacher, a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian.

As academic teacher he had that rare personal magnetism which drew the students at once into an irresistible current of thought, and roused all their mental energies. They saw the process of a great genius and scholar unfolding his ideas, and building up his system. He usually lectured two hours a day; on every branch of theology except the Old Testament and the Book of Revelation, and then, by way of recreation as it were, on every branch of philosophy in a certain order. He used brief notes, and allowed his genius to play freely under the inspiration of the lecture-room filled with attentive students. All his posthumous works are based on fragmentary notes.

As a preacher, he gathered around him in Trinity Church, every Sunday morning, the most intellectual audiences of students, professors, officers, and persons of the higher ranks of society. Wilhelm von Humboldt says that Schleiermacher's speaking far exceeded his power in writing, and that his strength consisted in the "deeply penetrative character of his words, which was free from art, and the persuasive effusion of feeling which moved in perfect unison with one of the rarest intellects." He never wrote his sermons, except the text, theme, and a few heads, but allowed them to be taken down by friends during delivery, and to be published after some revision by his pen.

As a theologian he ranks among the greatest of all ages. His influence is seen among writers of different schools; and will long continue, at least in Germany, as a suggestive and stimulating force. He was a unique combination of mysticism and criticism, of religious feeling and sceptical understanding. He believed in his heart while he doubted in his head. He was a pantheist as a philosopher, but a theist as a praying Christian. He built up as a divine what he destroyed as an historian, yet he knew somehow how to harmonize and to adjust these antagonistic tendencies. He learned from Plato, Spinoza, Calvin, Fichte, Schelling, Jacobi; but he digested all foreign elements, and worked them up into an original system of his own. He can be classed neither with rationalists, nor supernaturalists, nor mystics; but he had elements from all. He rejected the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity and Christology, of inspiration and the canon; and he taught an ultimate restoration, which he ingeniously reasoned out from the Calvinistic election theory, by an expanding process from the particular to the general. His errors are as numerous as those of Origen. He was bold and unflinching in his criticism. He dissected historic documents with the sharpest knife, and sacrificed almost all the miracles of the Gospel history as unessential to faith. Yet he ever held fast to Christ as the greatest fact in history, as the one only sinless and perfect man in whom the Divinity dwelt in its fulness, and from whom saving influences emanate from generation to generation, and from race to race. In this central idea lies Schleiermacher's chief merit in theology, and his salutary influence. He modestly declined the honor of being the founder of a school; and his best pupils, as Neander, Twisten, Nitzsch, Lucke, Bock, Ullmann, Julius Müller, went far beyond him in the direction of a positive evangelical creed. He was willing to decrease, that Christ might increase.

The works of Schleiermacher, including his posthumous publications, cover nearly all the departments of philosophy and theology, — ethics, dialectics, psychology, politics, aesthetics, pedagogy, dogmatics, Christian ethics, hermeneutics, biblical criticism, life of Jesus (posthumous lectures, exceedingly unsatisfactory), church history (likewise posthumous, and almost worthless), and a large number of philosophical, exegetical, and critical essays, and sermons. But the books which he published himself are by far the most finished and important, especially his masterly outline sketch of the course of theological study as an organic whole (1811), and his Christian Dogmatics (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's Institutes as a masterpiece of theological genius. It is an original reconstruction of the evangelical system of faith on the basis of practical experience and the consciousness of absolute dependence on God; it is in matter independent of all philosophy, yet profoundly philosophical in dialectical method and conclusive reasoning. But more of this in the next section. We only add, that it is Protestant to the backbone, yet remarkably conciliatory in spirit and tone towards diverging types of Christianity. It reduces the differences between Catholicism and Protestantism to this formula: "Catholicism makes the relation of the believer to Christ to depend on his relation to the church; Protestantism makes the relation of the believer to the church to depend on his relation to Christ." PHILIP SCHAFF.

III. Theology.—Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion was a strong word spoken to his time, and it suited the moment. At every point except one the German spirit was rallying from that debility and barrenness into which it had sunk; in every direction except one the German mind was stirring with new issues; only religion seemed to have been entirely abandoned by the educated portion of the nation as a kind of self-contradiction. But the contradiction, the book said to its readers, between piety and culture, is a lie fabricated by people who know neither the one nor the other. That which they reverence as education is not education, but simply school-pedantry; and that which they despise as religion is not religion, but its shadow, its caricature. They consider religion as a means of maintaining social order, an instrument for the inoculation of good morals, an expression of a trite and vulgar view of nature and history. But religion is no such thing. Religion is that feeling of the universe in which man discovers his own destination, that feeling of the infinite in which man discovers his own immortality, that feeling of the presence of a supreme power in which man discovers the existence of God, though he may still shrink from ascribing the forms of the human personality to that being. Religion is a part of human nature. Every one has religion, whether he knows it or not; and every one is compelled to recognize the truth of his religion, whether he will or not. So far the book is admirable. By its exposition of the true nature of religion it forces the reader out of his religious indifference. But then it undertakes an exposition of religion considered as an historical fact; for, although it admits that not every one may feel called upon to join one of the historically developed religions, development towards a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling. And here the question arises: Does this book really point in the direction of Christianity and the Christian church? It does, though not in the common sense of those words, nor in that in which the author later on came to use them, but when compared with the stand-point of the readers whom it addressed. When Schleiermacher wrote the preface to the third edition of the book, in 1821, he observed that there was at that moment more reason for addressing the bigoted than the indifferent.

To the Reden correspond the Monologen as their ethical complement. They are written in a more lyrical style, giving freer scope to a merely subjective pathos; and they have a somewhat lighter character, in spite of the profound researches they contain concerning human freedom.

From Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, as developed in his Reden and Monologen, to his systematic representation of the positive doctrines of Christianity, a transition is formed by his critico-exegetical writings, and more especially by his famous little book, Kurze Darstellung des Theologischen Studiums, 1811. It was not any remarkable grasp of historical and antiquarian materials which distinguished him as an exegete; but he was a good philologist and an excellent translator; and his marvellous power of understanding, and, so to speak, reproducing the whole mental process by which a literary monument has been produced, makes his criticism in the highest degree suggestive. For the Old Testament he had very little sympathy, and its close connection with the New Testament he did not understand. But his Sendschreiben an J. Chr. Gass, 1807, concerning the First Epistle to Timothy, is the first thorough-going examination of that remarkable document, and has led the exegetes to appreciate the intimate relation between the pastoral epistles, — a relation so intimate, indeed, that they must be accepted or rejected together. Of still greater importance was his Kritische Versuch über die Schriften des Lukas, 1821, though only the first volume of the work on the Gospel of Luke ever appeared. Not that Schleiermacher here really achieved what he intended, viz., to represent the Gospel of Luke as a mosaic of a great number of different, previously existing narratives; but he contributed much to concentrate the interest of biblical scholars on the questions of the origin and formation of the Gospels. More successful was his hypothesis concerning the testimony of Papias (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iii. 39). It has been used by many, accepted by more, and hardly neglected by any.

In the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums, the theological stand-point of Schleiermacher is clearly defined. The fundamental facts of the Christian faith he accepts, not because he feels compelled by any philosophical demonstration, but simply because he finds them as facts in the consciousness of the Christian congregation. He then goes on to give an encyclopedic survey of those facts and their reciprocal relations, dividing the theological science into philosophical (apologetics-polemics), historical (exegesis-dogmatics), and practical theology. The book is neither a mere sketch nor an elaborate picture; it is a drawing executed with consummate skill, and rich in illustration and suggestion.

The ripest fruit of Schleiermacher's genius is Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundsätzen der evangelischen Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt, 1821, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1831, revised and improved). It made an extraordinary, not altogether favorable, impression at its first appearance. But it gradually grew upon scholars; and it now stands as a monument of religious enthusiasm and philosophical reasoning which has no equal in the theological literature, after Calvin's Institutions. It consists of a series of small paragraphs connected with each other by intervening explications of a more elaborate character. The feeling from which religion springs is here further defined as a feeling of absolute dependence on God; and that feeling—not the demonstrations of a dialectical reasoning, nor the letter of a scriptural text—is made the touch-stone on which the dogma must be tried. He rejects the doctrine of the Devil and the doctrine of the fall of the angels; because, as he alleges, they do not aid in solving the problem of the existence of evil, but rather make it more difficult. He also rejects the doctrine of miracles, at least in the sense of a breach upon natural law; because, as he protests, it is not demanded by true Christian piety. It must not be understood, however, that, when he thus declines to bow before the literal evidence of Scripture, he in any way gives in to the postulates of non-religious science. By no means! Few theologians have been so successful as he in keeping the doctrines of Christian faith separate from the propositions of natural science, without either bringing them into conflict with each other, or mixing them together in an incomplete harmony. In the centre of the whole system stands Christ and that which he has done for the salvation of man. The development runs between a double christological (Eblonism and Docetism) and a double anthropological heresy (Pelagianism and Manichæism): but the power of salvation is in no way bound up with the church, which by itself is nothing but the community of the faithful; it resides solely and fully in the intimate union between the faithful and the Saviour. Thus while the idea of God is, so to speak, presupposed as given in the very feeling of absolute dependence on him, and no special regard is paid to its aberrations into deism or pantheism, the idea of Christ is developed with a completeness and minuteness which testifies to the inner passion from which it sprung. Generally the work may be characterized as a combination of syncretism and pietism. Syncretism means the overthrow of all ecclesiastical exclusiveness by a deeper conception of the doctrines in question: pietism means the careful cultivation of the religious organ in which faith manifests itself, and by which it works. Originally these two tendencies, as represented by Calixtus and Spener, touched each other but slightly; but later times came to understand that an actual combination of them was necessary, and it was accomplished by Schleiermacher: hence his practical standpoint,—though belonging to the Reformed Church, he labored for its union with the Lutheran Church; and hence his scientific character. Syncretism developed into rationalism, and pietism into supernaturalism. But Schleiermacher is neither a rationalist nor a supernaturalist: he is a union of both. The ethical complement to the work may be found in a number of exquisite minor treatises on duty, on virtue, on the highest good, etc., foreshadowed by his Kritik aller bisherigen Sittenlehre, SCHLEUSNER, Johann Friedrich, b. at Leipzig, Jan. 16, 1759; d. at Wittenberg, Feb. 21, 1831. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor at Göttingen in 1781, and at Wittenberg in 1795. His principal works are lexicographical, — Lexicon Gr.-Lat. in Nov. Test., 1792 (now superseded), and Thesaurus sive Lexicon in LXX., 1821 (still in use).

SCHMALKALD, League and Articles of. The League of Schmalkald was formed on Feb. 27, 1531, by nine princes and eleven imperial cities of Germany, under the leadership of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, for the purpose of defending Protestantism. It was soon after joined by five other princes and ten imperial cities, and comprised, indeed, the whole of Northern Germany and a large part of Central and Southern Germany. The immediate effect of the formation of the league was the religious peace of Nuremberg in 1532; but it was evident to all that the emperor, Charles V., yielded only because he was too occupied at that moment with France and the Turks to carry through his own views. The league acted in the beginning with considerable vigor. At a meeting on Dec. 24, 1535, it was determined to raise and maintain a standing army of ten thousand foot and two thousand cavalry; and at another meeting, on Feb. 15, 1537, a common confession, the so-called Articles of Schmalkald, was signed by all the members of the league. It was occasioned by the bull of Paul III., convoking a general council at Mantua, and is a vehement protest against the primacy of the Pope. It was drawn up by Luther, and became after wards one of the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. But soon internal jealousy between the princes began to weaken the actions of the league, and at Mühlberg its army was completely routed, April 21, 1547. It was Maurice of Saxony, and not the league of Schmalkald, which finally secured religious freedom by the treaty of Passau, July 31, 1552. See HORTLEDER: Kaiser Karl V. wider die Schmäl. Bundesverwandten, Frankfurt, 1617, 2 vols.

SCHMID, Christian Friedrich, b. at Bickelsberg in Württemberg, 1791; d. at Tübingen, March 28, 1852. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed regent there 1818, extraordinary professor in 1821, and ordinary in 1826, and given the degree of D.D. He lectured on exegesis and practical theology. He was a very modest scholar, and published very little. The two books by which he is widely known, his Biblische Theologie des Nuen Testaments (ed. C. Weizsäcker, Stuttgart, 1853 [4th ed. by A. Heller, 1868, Eng. trans., Biblical Theology of the New Testament, Edinburgh, 1870]), and Christliche Moral (ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, 2d ed., 1867), were published after his death. But he exercised a great and powerful influence on the side of positive Christianity, and as a counterpoise to his colleague, F. C. Baur; and through his pupils, especially Oehler and Dörner, he wields it still. Schmid's work upon the biblical theology of the New Testament is distinguished by its union of the historic sense and the thoughts of organic development with the most decided faith in the absolute revelation in Christ. It will long maintain its present high position. For further information respecting Schmid, and for a list of his own publications (only essays), see the preface to his Biblical Theology. CARL WEIZÄCKER.

SCHMID, Konrad, b. at Kussnach, in the canton of Zurich, 1476; was educated in the house of the Johannites in his native city, and became an inmate there, 1519, after studying theology at Basel. Soon after, he became acquainted with Zwingli. In 1522 he began to preach in German, and against the Pope. In 1525 he presided at the disputation of Zurich, in 1528 at that of Bern, and throughout he proved himself the true friend and co-worker of Zwingli. Like him, he fell in the second Capitul war, October, 1531. HAUGENBACH.

SCHMIDT, Oswald Gottlob, D.D., Lutheran divine, b. at Kaditz, near Dresden, Jan. 2, 1821; d. at Werdau, Saxony, Dec. 26, 1882. He studied at Leipzig; in 1842 was licensed to preach; taught in private families until 1845, when he became pastor, first at Schonfeld, then, in 1856, at Greifenhain; and in 1866 he was elected pastor and superintendent at Werdau. He wrote, besides numerous articles in newspapers and reviews, Nicolaus Hausmann, der Freund Luthers, Leipzig, 1860; Caspar Crueger (ii. 2) and Georg der Gottseliger, Fürst zu Anhalt (iv. 2), in Leben der Ältesten der lutherischen Kirche, 1861 seq.; Petrus Mosellanus. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Humanismus in Sachsen, 1866; and the lecture, Blicks in die Kirchengeschichte der Stadt Meissen im Zeitalter der Reformation, 1879; Luther's Bekanntschaft mit den alten Classikern, 1883 (ed. W. Schmidt). For his contributions to this Encyclopædia, see Analysis.

SCHMOLKE, Benjamin (more accurately SCHMOLCK), one of the sweetest and most productive of the German hymn-writers; was b. in Brauchitschdorf, Liegnitz, Dec. 21, 1672; d. at Schweidnitz, Feb. 12, 1737. In 1693 he entered the university of Leipzig; four years later became his father's assistant as pastor; and in 1702 became co-pastor at Schweidnitz, and pastor primarius in 1714. The parish was a large one, and Schmolke's position was rendered difficult by the machinations of the Jesuits. His earnestness and sweetness of disposition, however, not only won the hearts of his parishioners, but disarmed the Jesuits. In 1735 he was obliged by physical infirmities, induced by paralytic strokes, to forego active labor. Schmolke's hymns were published in small collections during his lifetime, and soon found a permanent place in German hymn-books. They are pervaded by Christian piety and fervor, and are written in a simple and dignified style. They breathe a warm, personal love to Christ, and were written without effort. [The one best known in English is My Jesus, wie du willst, translated by Miss Jane Northwick, "My Jesus, as thou wilt." She has also translated his fine lyric, "My God, I know that I must die." His Was Jesus that das ist wohlgethan has been rendered by Sir H. W. Baker (1861), "What our Father does is well."] Schmolke's works appeared at Tübingen, 1740-44, in 2 vols. A selection from his hymns and prayers has been published by Crote (2d ed., Leipzig, 1860), to which is prefixed a good memoir. DRYANDER.

SCHMUCKER, Samuel Simon, D.D., an American Lutheran divine, son of Rev. J. G. Schmucker, D.D.; b. at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 28, 1799; d. at Gettysburg, Penn., July 26, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1817, and at the Princeton theological seminary, and was admitted into the ministry by the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1820. He was pastor at New Market, Va., 1820-26. He took a leading part in the organization of the General Synod and of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, in 1826. He was chosen its first professor, and continued to be chairman of its faculty till 1861, when he retired from official activity. The degree of D.D. was given him in 1830, simultaneously by Rutgers College, New Jersey, and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1846 he visited Germany, in company with Drs. B. Kurtz and J. G. Morris, with the double purpose of establishing, if possible, some communication between the church there and the Lutherans in the United States, and of obtaining books for the library of the seminary.

His doctrinal teaching was marked by indifference to the distinctive features of symbolical Lutheranism, which he held to be non-fundamental, and by laying stress on the common doctrines and principles of Protestantism, which he called fundamental. He accepted substantially the Augsburg Confession, but disliked the Formula of Concord. His mind was strongly impressed with the importance of mutual recognition and co-operative union among the various Protestant denominations. By his Fraternal Appeal to the American churches, first published in 1838, and circulated in England as well as here, he aided in preparing the way for the organization of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended its first meeting in London, 1846.

Dr. Schmucker was for many years the theological champion of Low-Church American Lutheranism, and one of the most active and influential ministers of the General Synod of his church. He was better known outside of his denomination than any other Lutheran minister. He prepared in all more than four hundred young men for the ministry, and was highly esteemed for his personal character, self-denying labors, and Christian spirit. But some of his ablest pupils forsook his theological stand-point, and adopted a stricter type of Lutheranism, which is represented in the General Council. When he entered upon public life, he found the Lutheran Church almost exclusively German, and in a comparatively stagnant condition. He helped to revive, educate, and to Anglicize it, and prepared the way for its present advanced position.

Among his numerous publications, the following are the most important: Biblical Theology of Storr and Platt, trans. from the German, Andover, 1826, 2 vols. (reprinted in England in 1845); Elements of Popular Theology, Andover, 1831 (9th ed., Philadelphia, 1860); Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union, New York, 1838; Psychology, or Elements of a New System of Mental Philosophy, New York, 1842; Dissertation on Capital Punishment, Philadelphia, 1845; The American Lutheran Church historically, doctrinally, and practically delineated, Philadelphia, 1851; The Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles, or the Augsburg Confession illustrated and sustained by Scripture and Lutheran Theologians, Phila., 1855; The Lutheran Symbols, or Vindication of American Lutheranism, Baltimore, 1856; The Church of the Redeemer as developed within the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Baltimore, 1867; True Unity of Christ's Church, New York, 1870.

W. J. MANN.

SCHNECKENBURGER, Matthias, b. at Thalheim in Württemberg, Jan. 17, 1801; d. at Bern in Switzerland, June 13, 1848. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed preacher at Herrenberg in 1831, and professor of theology at Bern in 1834. His principal works are, Über den Zweck d. Apostelschichte, Bern, 1841; Vergleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und reformirten Lehrbegriffs, edited by Guder, Stuttgart, 1855, 2 vols.; Neutestamentliche Zeitschichte, edited by Lohm, Frankfurt-am-M., 1862; Die Lehrbegriffe der kleineren prot. Kirchenparteien, edited by Hundeshagen, 1863. The reason why his works appeared so long after his death was the eccentricity of his widow, who kept his papers under lock and key. His chief merit lies in his historical criticism, and comparative dogmatics or symbols. He most ably set forth the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions. See, for further information, the full art. by HUNDESHAGEN, in the first edition of Herzog, xiii. 609-618.

SCHÖBERLEIN, Ludwig Friedrich, b. at Kolnberg, near Ansbach, Sept. 6, 1813; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1881. He was successively regent (1841), privatdozent (1849), and ordinary professor of theology (1855, till death) in the university of Göttingen; but from 1850 to 1855 he was extraordinary professor at Heidelberg. In 1862 he was appointed Consistorialrath, and in 1878 abbot of Bursfelde. He was an orthodox Lutheran, but with a mystical tendency. His principal writings relate to liturgies; but he also produced Die Grundlehren d. Heils, entwickelt aus dem Princip der Liebe (1848), Die Geheimnisse des Glaubens (1872), Das Princip u. System der Dogmatik (1881).

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY is often identified with mediæval theology, and placed over against patristic theology as the theology of the primitive church. It is undeniable, that, with the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, Christian theology changed character; and it is perfectly correct to designate the period from that time, and down to the Reformation, as the theology of the middle ages. But it is, nevertheless, inadmissible to use the terms "scholasticism" and "mediæval theology" as synonymous; for there is a most important difference between Isidore of Seville, Bede, Aleuin, Rhabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus, and Scotus Erigena on the one side, and Anselm, Abelard, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus on the other. Scholasticism forms only one period of the theology of the middle ages, — from the close of the eleventh century to the Reformation.

The teachers of the primitive church are justly called the Fathers (patres). They produced the dogmas. Through their manifold doctrinal controversies and discussions they unfolded and developed the whole contents of the Christian faith, and by the decisions of their great œcumenical councils they formulated and fixed the dogmas. But with the close of the sixth century the theological productivity ceased. The work was done. All the materials for the formation of a doctrinal system of Christianity were present. No essential element of Christian faith was left undetined. Then there came a time, — the attempt at building up new state organizations on the ruin of the Roman Empire, the exertions of the Germanic Barbarians to adopt and assimilate the Romano-Christian civilization, — a time of confusion and chaos, — national, social, political, — during which it was the task of the theologian to gather together the doctrinal materials acquired, to sift them, to preserve them. The theologians of that time, the first period of mediæval theology, from the seventh to the eleventh century, — a Cassiodorus, an Isidore of Seville, a Bede, an Aleuin, — are not men of creative genius, but of encyclopedic knowledge, compilers, though compilers of enormous industry and deep conscientiousness. But of course the materials could not be gathered and kept together in a merely mechanical way, without any trace of individual treatment; and towards the close of the period complaints are heard, that people put more faith in Boethius — that is, in dialectics, in philosophy — than in Holy Writ. Indeed, Scotus Erigena is often mentioned as the father of scholasticism; though he was a philosopher rather than a theologian, and though he lacks one of the essential characteristics of scholasticism, — recognition of the tradition of the church as absolute authority. In reality scholasticism begins with the controversy between Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc; and Anselm is the first who fully represents its principles.

Scholastic theology is something more than a mere preservation, or arrangement, or application of the dogmas; it is an actual treatment. But the treatment is merely formal. New dogmas were not added. Even those which received a farther development under the hands of the schoolmen — such as the doctrine of the offices of Christ, or the doctrine of the sacraments — had been fully defined by the preceding ages, at least with respect to their fundamental outlines. Nor were the dogmas altered with respect to their essential contents. The problem which the schoolmen undertook to solve was simply to give each dogma a rational substructure sufficient to elevate it from a mere matter of faith to a matter of science, and to form the whole mass of dogmas into a consistent and harmonious totality, a system. They were not patres; they were only doctores et magistri. The very name "scholasticism" shows the character of the movement.

The dogma was transferred from the church to the school: the university became the hearth of scholasticism. A truly speculative conception of Christianity was not produced, however. It may be that the schoolmen really hoped to create the philosophy of Christianity; to demonstrate Christianity as rational, and the rational as Christian; to fuse faith and science, theology and philosophy, into a perfect unity. But, if so, they failed. The principles of their theology prevented them from succeeding, no less than the principles of their philosophy. Theologically the schoolmen proceeded from the supposition that the whole contents of the Christian faith, that is, each single dogma, is absolute, divine truth; and the warrant for this supposition is sought for, not in the very essence of Christianity or in the inner nature of man, but in the authority of the Church and her tradition. The fault is here not the application of the principle of authority, but the external and superficial character of the authority appealed to. Of course, an attempt is made to demonstrate and prove the absolute and divine authority of the Church. But again mere externalities are resorted to, — her miracles; and at every point this authority, rationally and philosophically so poorly established, bears the sway. Scholastic theology recognized a double rule of faith, — Scripture and tradition. Some of the schoolmen use the rules pronisuously, as, for instance, Anselm, Hugo of St. Victor, and Peter the Lombard. Others, as for instance, Abelard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus, make a distinction between the two rules, and give Scripture the precedence, but it is only theoretically, not in their practice. And how could they have done otherwise? They had not the original text of the Old and New Testament, but only the Latin translation, the Vulgate, and in their exegesis they were again fettered by the tradition, beyond which they were not allowed to make one step. To these theological principles the philosophical principles corresponded exactly. Having established the dogma on an external authority, that of the church, and made it absolutely transcendental to human reason, the schoolmen could employ philosophy only for subordinate purposes, — philosophia ancilla (handmaid) theologia, — to analyze the contents of its dogma through definitions, distinctions, and questions; to find out all the arguments pro et contra; to form by means of the syllogism a bridge from one dogma to another, and to bring them all together in a visible, schematic combination. Anselm hoped by the syllogistic method to elevate the truths of faith into true scientific knowledge. But, in accordance with its very nature, the syllogism refers only to the formal relations between two given ideas: of their inner truth and necessity it can tell us nothing.

Anselm (1033–1109) was the first who clearly set forth the principle of scholasticism, and also the first who successfully employed it. That fusion of faith and knowledge, of theology and philosophy, which was the great aim of scholasticism, he tried to accomplish in opposition, on the one side, to a faith which simply excluded reason, on the other, to a reason which forgot its own natural bounds. The former stand-point was represented by the old positive theology of the preceding age, which never dreamed of a rational demonstration of the contents of faith; the latter by Roscelin, whose nominalism seemed to point in another direction than that indicated by the church. Among the successors or continuators of Anselm, Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153) leaned towards traditionalism; and Abelard (1079–1142), towards rationalism. But though Bernard considered the speculations of Abelard to be dangerous novelties, liable to bring the tradition of the church into contempt, he was himself by no means satisfied with the pure traditionalism of the old theologi positivi. He demanded a fuller and deeper assimilation of the contents of the tradition; and he found it in the mystical contemplation, which, with its ecstasy, is an anticipation of the life to come. Abelard, on the other hand, was very far from being a rationalist in the modern sense of the word. A pupil both of the nominalist Roscelin and the realist William of Champeaux, he was also an adversary of both, and tried to form his own philosophical principle, the so-called "conceptualism." But though he complained very much of people who despised the dialectico-philosophical treatment of the dogmas, because they were liable to fall into superstition and fanaticism, and though his famous book, Sic et non, seems intended to undermine the authority of tradition, he submitted unconditionally to the verdict of the church, and that both theoretically and practically. A fine and harmonious union between the mysticism of Bernard and the dialectics of Abelard was effected by the Victorines, — Hugo of St. Victor (1097–1141), and his disciple, Richard of St. Victor. The stand-point of Anselm is still retained so far as the church and the tradition are accepted as rules of faith, and the necessity is recognized of progressing from faith to reason in order to reach certainty. But Hugo of St. Victor differs from Anselm by his distinction between necessaria, probabilia, mirabilia, and incredibilia, of which he placed the first and the last group entirely without any relation to faith; while of the two middle groups, the true domain of faith, only the probabilia, that is, the truths of the so-called natural religion, can receive any affirmation from reason; the mirabilia, or alia supra rationem, are completely inaccessible to reason. This, the first departure of scholasticism, reached its point of culmination with Peter the Lombard, the magister sententiarum (d. in 1160). He united the positive and the dialectical tendencies which he found combating each other on the theological arena, and employed dialectics as a means by which to solve such contradictions as might occur in the positive statements of the authorities. His book recommended itself by its ecclesiastical correctness and its dialectical adroitness, and it became the most used and most admired scholastic text-book ever produced. But a true reconciliation between reason and revelation, philosophy and theology, it does not give; and, indeed, it seems as if the author studiously tried to avoid touching the point. The doctrines of Scripture, tradition, and the church, he does not treat at all; he presupposes their absolute authority as an incontrovertible axiom.

Down to this time, only some of the logical writings of Aristotle were known to the West in Latin translations, but none of his works on physics and metaphysics. The more intimate intercourse, however, which sprang up between the East and the West on account of the crusades, and more especially on account of the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople in 1201, and the introduction of the Arabian philosophy to the Christian world, soon put the schoolmen in possession of the whole of Aristotle. The Arabs had not only translated and commented on all his works, but they had even developed a philosophy of their own on the basis of Aristotle and the Neo-Platonists; and, towards the end of the twelfth and in the beginning of the thirteenth century, the Christian scholars of Western Europe became acquainted with this Arabian philosophy through the Spanish Jews. At first the Aristotelian writings were looked upon with some suspicion. The heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as their true source, and the Pope repeatedly forbade the study of them (1209, 1215, 1231). But the inner affinity between scholasticism and Aristotle conquered all opposition; and the influence of the renewed study of his works soon became visible on scholastic theology. The old questions of the true relation between reason and revelation, science and faith, philosophy and theology, were deeper put, and better answered; and new questions arose, — of the true nature of Christianity in comparison with other religions; of the true character of theology, — whether a science or not, whether a theoretical or a practical science, etc. Not only ethics, but also physics, was incorporated with the doctrinal system, so that the materials gradually swelled into immensity. The form was generally that of a commentary on the Sententie, though sometimes, also, that of an independent summa, but in both cases the dialectical method was carried out in the minutest details, with its thesis et antithesis, its pro et contra, its resolutio et conclusio, etc.

The first great representative of this second departure of scholastic theology was Alexander of Hales (d. 1245); but he was completely eclipsed by Albert the Great (1193-1280), in whose works all the principal characteristics of the age are palpably present. By his enormous erudition, encompassing all sciences, he impressed people in general as a kind of magician; on account of his close imitation of Aristotle, he was by scholars often called similis Aristoteli ("the ape of Aristotle"). But, though he certainly lacked critical power, he was by no means without speculative ideas; and his definition of theology as a practical science, the science of God and his works, elaborated, not for the sake of knowledge, but for the sake of salvation, exercised a lasting influence. A complete theological system, however, he did not produce; but his fundamental ideas were taken up and developed by his pupil, Thomas Aquinas (1227-74), the greatest of the schoolmen, [and recommended by Pope Leo XIII. as the greatest of all the doctors of the church]. The contemplation of God, he teaches, is the highest good which can fall to the lot of man, the very acme of blessedness; but, on account of the incommensurability of the divine and the created, man can never reach that goal by his own natural reason. By reason man can only acquire an indirect knowledge of God, such as can be demonstrated from his works. In order to obtain any direct knowledge of God, man needs a supernatural aid, a revelation; and just as philosophy starts from the natural fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of reason, so theology starts from the revealed fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of faith. Theology and philosophy have the same method and the same goal, only the starting-points and the spheres are different. Bonaventura (1221-74), a friend of Thomas Aquinas, added, perhaps, nothing to the common stock of ideas; but the calm repose of his character and the sweet mysticism of his mind procured for his teaching a great influence; while the fantastic formalism of Raimundus Lullus (1235-1315) had no other effect than the formation of a small school, which soon died out. With Duns Scotus (1260-1308) the great controversy between Thomists and Scotists broke out. Thomas Aquinas belonged to the Dominican order, Duns Scotus, to the Franciscan; and more than once the whole controversy between their adherents has been described as caused by mere jealousy and rivalry between their orders. It is true that it contributed nothing to the further development of scholastic theology; but the scientific dissension between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus is, nevertheless, fundamental and decisive. Duns Scotus dissolved that unity between faith and science, between theology and philosophy, which was the pride of scholasticism; and in its stead he placed a positivism which has only to take one step in order to reach scepticism, — a step which Duns Scotus himself can justly be said to have taken by his peculiar quodlibet method, placing the pro and the contra over against each other without any mediation, and leaving the reader to make the decision for himself.

After Duns Scotus the decay of scholasticism begins, soon to end in complete dissolution. One of the reasons was the adoption of nominalism. Even Duns Scotus gave up the reigning realism, turning it into the so-called formalism. Durandus de Sancto Porciano (d. 1331) abandoned it altogether, and adopted nominalism; and with Occam (1280-1347) the effects of this change of principle become visible. Realism — the doctrine that the general ideas were really present in the individual things, universalia in re — was indeed the band between theology and philosophy. As soon as nominalism — the doctrine that the universalia are merely the products of the human reason, nothing but forms of reasoning, verbes, nomina — became prevalent, and was actually carried through in the system, the band snapped, and theology and philosophy separated. From that time theology reigned alone, but it ceased to be a science: it became a mere commandment. The change is painfully apparent in the writings of Occam. When he undermines the Christian dogmas from end to end by his logic, and then ostentatiously retires to the faith of the church; when from the doctrines of the church he draws logical inferences which directly run out into absurdity, or indirectly lead into self-contradictions; when he connects the most sublime ideas with scurrilous problems or ludicrous problems,—what is that all but frivolity? The invention of a double truth, or the axiom that something can be true in philosophy though it is false in religion, and vice versa, cannot be fastened on Occam, nor on any of the schoolmen in particular. Nevertheless, when Roman-Catholic historians and critics ascribe it to the anti-scholastic philosophers of the fifteenth century, and quote its condemnation by the Fifth Council of the Lateran (1513) as an argument, they are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. At all events, it became the stumbling-block of scholasticism: for, however firmly and decidedly repudiated, it is a simple and natural consequence of nominalism; and, after Occam, nominalism reigned uninterruptedly in scholastic theology. It was the principle of Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), generally styled the last of the schoolmen.

SCHOLIUM, The, occupies a middle position between the gloss or marginal note on a single passage and the commentary, or the full interpretation of the whole work. It may be defined as a string of notes made for the use of the school, and it occurs in that sense in the works of Cicero. As instances of scholia may be mentioned the commentaries of Nicholas of Lyra, the notes of Hugo Grotius, and more especially the Gnomon of J. A. Bengel (5th ed., Tübingen, 1835, 2 vols.).

SCHÖNHERR, Johann Heinrich, b. Nov. 30, 1770, at Memel; was the son of a Prussian sergeant; in his fifteenth year he was apprenticed with a merchant at Königsberg, but soon abandoned commerce, and, after preparatory studies, entered the university of that city as student of theology, 1792; turned from theology to metaphysics, and finding the views of Kant unpalatable, and unable to satisfy his eager thirst for light on the momentous themes of immortality and the destiny of man, made independent inquiries designed to harmonize nature and reason with the declarations of Holy Scripture, and published the results of his investigations in two pamphlets (Sieg der Göttlichen Offenbarung, Königsberg, 1804). He was wont to unfold his views to a small circle of friends; and the attempt to suppress their meetings as inimical to the teachings of the church, and sectarian, proved unsuccessful; for the Ministerium für Cultus declared (1814) that his notions, being clearly meant to sustain the doctrines of the Bible, were ethically not only not dangerous, but beneficial. The presentation of his unsystematic system in different German universities had but little encouragement; and after six years spent as a private tutor he returned (1800) to Königsberg, and settled there, lecturing in private on his favorite themes, and died in Spittelhof, Oct. 15, 1826. He and his philosophy were soon forgotten; but, in consequence of the Religions Saft (1835–42), the whole subject came up again, and gave rise to numerous publications, of which a fuller account is given in ERBL (q.v.). The whole literature, with full particulars of the cosmogony and peculiar teaching of this theosophist, may be seen in Faith Victorians, being an Account of the Life and Labors, and of the Times, of the Venerable Dr. Johann Ebel, etc., N.Y., 1882, by the present writer. SCHOTT, Heinrich August, b. at Leipzig, Dec. 5, 1780; d. at Jena, Dec. 29, 1835. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1805, at Wittenberg in 1809, and at Jena in 1812. His principal work is his Theorie der Beredsamkeit, Leipzig, 1815–28, 3 vols.

SCHÖTTGEN, Christian, b. at Wurzen, March 14, 1687; d. at Dresden, Dec. 15, 1751. He was school principal in Francfort (1716), Stargard (1719), and of the "Kreuzschule" at Dresden (1727). He wrote De secta Flagellantium comment., Leipzig, 1711; Vom Ursprung des Geopirius-Fests, Francfort-am-O., 1716; Horæ Ebraicæ et Talmudicæ in universum N. Testamentum, Dresden and Leipzig, 1733, 1742, 2 vols.; Jesus der wahre Messias, Leipzig, 1748 (in great part merely a German reproduction of the preceding); Norum lexicon gr.-lat. in N. T., Leipzig, 1746, last edition by Spöhl, Halle, 1819; Tribune et jallonia, Leipzig, 1763 (reprinted from FOLIO's Thesaurus).

SCHRÖCKH, Johann Matthias, a distinguished church historian; was b. of Protestant parents in Vienna, July 26, 1733; d. at Wittenberg, Aug. 2, 1808. In 1751 he entered the university of Göttingen, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. After spending several years in literary labors in connection with his uncle, Professor Karl Andreas Bell, at Leipzig, and in lecturing as docent until he was appointed professor in 1761, he left Leipzig to accept a call to the professorship of poetry at Wittenberg, from which he was transferred to the chair of church history in 1775. He gave three lectures a day in his department, and to these labors added a rare diligence of authorship. He died in consequence of a fall from a step-ladder while he was reaching up for some books in his library. His great work, a monument of immense industry (Leipzig, 1766-1812), was his Ausführliche Gesch. d. christl. Kirche (Complete History of the Christian Church), in 45 vols. The last two volumes of the ten upon the period since the Reformation were completed by Tzschirner. They cover the history of eighteen centuries. Other church historians have written in a better style, and have understood certain periods and movements more fully; but up to this time we have no other work covering such a long period, combining so many excellences. A handbook of church history (Historia relig. et eccles. Christi adumbrata in usum lectio-num) appeared in Berlin, 1777, passed through five editions (fifth, 1808) during the author's lifetime, and was issued by Marheinecke for the seventh time, 1828. He also prepared the Algemeine Biographie, 1767-91, 8 vols. See K. L. NITZSCH: Ueber J. M. Schultens's Studienweise u. Maximen, Weimar, 1809; TZSCHIRNER: Ueber Johann M. Schultens's Leben, Charakter, und Schriften, Leipzig, 1812. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SCHULTENS, Albert, the father of modern Hebrew grammar; was b. at Groningen, in 1686, and early destined to a theological career. He studied the original languages of the Bible, Hebrew and Greek, with which he afterwards combined the study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic. The first-fruit of these studies was a public disputation, which he held with Gusselinus when only eighteen years of age, and in which he maintained that the Arabic is indispensably necessary to a knowledge of Hebrew. After completing his studies, he visited Leyden and Utrecht, and became acquainted with Rhodius, who edited his Annuaire des Philologes in Joham. Utrecht, 1708. In the year 1709 he was promoted as doctor of theology, and in 1711 he took charge of the pastorate at Wassenaar, which, however, he soon exchanged for the chair of Oriental languages at the academy in Franeker. In 1729 he was called to the theological seminary at Leyden, and died there Jan. 26, 1759.

The services which Schultens rendered to philology are of great value. He was the first to overturn the notion that Hebrew is the original language given to man by God, and showed that the Hebrew was nothing but a branch of the Shemitic stem, and that Arabic was an indispensable means for the understanding of the Hebrew. Thus he opened a new path in Hebrew grammar and biblical exegesis, advancing at the same time the study of Oriental languages. Of his works which pertain to Hebrew grammar and biblical literature, we mention, Organon Hebraeum, etc., Franeker, 1724-38, 2 vols., and a preliminary work, De Axiomatibus Hebraeorum Lingua Hebraea, Franeker 1731 (new edition of both works, Leyden, 1761); Institutiones ad fundamenta linguae Hebraicae, etc., Leyden, 1737, 1756; Vetus et regiae Hebraeae, etc., Leyden, 1758 (a rejoinder to his opponents, which he carries further in Exercitulus ad caput primum eul. veteris et regiae Hebraeae, etc., Leyden, 1739); Laber Johanneum nova versione, Leyden, 1757, 2 vols.; Procerbia Salomonis, etc., Leyden, 1758, an abridgment of which was published by G. J. L. Vogel, Halle, 1769. Ten separately printed dissertations and addresses were collected and published by his son, in Opera minora, etc., Halle, 1769. In manuscript he left commentaries on different books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew lexicon, and an Aramaean grammar. Comp. SCHWARTZ, Christian Friedrich, b. at Sonnenburg, Prussia, Oct. 26, 1726; d. at Tanjore, Feb. 13, 1798; one of the most energetic and successful missionaries of the eighteenth century. He studied theology at Halle; and, having made himself master of the Tamil language, he was sent as missionary to Tranquebar in 1750 by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen. Having entered the service of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in London, in 1767, his station was in 1779 removed to Tanjore, where he remained to his death. He founded many congregations among the natives, exercised a most beneficial influence during the war of Hyder Ali, and contributed much to make the name and character of Europe respected and trusted in India. See PARSON: Memoirs of C. F. Schwartz, 1831; J. F. FENIGER: Geschichte der trankebar. Mission, Göttingen, 1845. H. GUNDELT.

SCHWARZ, Friedrich Heinrich Christian, b. at Giessen, May 30, 1766; d. at Heidelberg, April 5, 1837. He studied theology in his native city, held several pastoral charges in Hesse, and was in 1801 appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg. He took a great interest in pedagogy, founded prosperous educational institutions, and published in 1835 his Lehrbuch der Erziehungs- und Unterrichts-lehre (3 vols.), which, containing an elaborate history of pedagogy, still is a standard work on the subject. H. MESSENGER.

SCHWEBEL, Johann, b. at Pforzheim in Baden, 1790; d. at Zweibrücken, May 19, 1850. He was educated in the school of his native city, a celebrated institution; entered the order of the Holy Spirit, and was ordained a priest in 1811, but embraced the Reformation, left the order in 1819, began to preach evangelical truths, but was in 1822 compelled to flee, and seek refuge with Fautz von Sickingen. In the following year he settled at Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, where he remained for the rest of his life, active in introducing the Reformation. His Latin writings appeared at Zweibrücken, in two volumes, 1835-37; his German, also in two volumes, in 1838.

SCHWEGLER, Albert, the most distinguished representative of the Tübingen school next to Baur; was b. at Michelbach, Württemberg, Feb. 10, 1819; d. at Tübingen, Jan. 5, 1887; studied at the seminaries of Schonthal and Tübingen, devoted himself especially to the study of church history; was for nearly a year pastor at Bebenhausen; became decent in philosophy at Tübingen 1813, professor of Roman literature and antiquities in 1818, and shortly before his death professor of ancient history. He distinguished himself greatly at the university, and studied with zeal the Hegelian philosophy. In 1811 appeared his Montanism and the Christian Church in the Second Century (Der Montanismus u. d. christliche Kirche d. 2. Jahrhundert.). Through Strauss' Leben Jesu and other studies he found himself at variance with the teachings of the church, and in 1816 published (at Tübingen) his Post-Apostolic Age (D. nachapost. Zeitalter). It was written in six months, and exaggerates the Baur hypothesis of the early church, and dislocates the origin of the writings of the New Testament. The work asserts that early Christianity was pure Ebionism, and builds up the history of the early church on this foundation. The author had already declared himself for this theory in his work on Montanism. In 1847 Schweigger edited The Clementine Homilies, and in 1852 Ensebius, and published a translation and exposition of Aristotle's Metaphysics (Übersetzung und Erläuterung der aristot. Metaphysik), 1817; A History of Philosophy, 1818, [11th ed., 1882, Eng. trans. by J. H. Seelye, New York, and Stirling, London, 1872, etc.]; and a History of Rome, 3 vols., 1853-58.

SCHYN, Hermannus, b. in Amsterdam, 1662; d. there 1727. He studied medicine at Leyden and Utrecht, and began to practise at Rotterdam, but was drawn to the study of theology, and became in 1686 preacher to the Mennonites in Rotterdam, and in 1690 to the Doopsgezinden in Amsterdam. He published sermons and other edifying writings; but his principal work is his Historia Mennonitarum (Amst., 1723, 2 vols.), not a complete or pragmatic history of the movement, yet rich in valuable information. SCOTCH CONFESSION OF FAITH. It was drawn up by John Knox and his compeers at the request of the Scotch Parliament which assembled at Edinburgh in August, 1560, after the death of the queen-regent, Mary of Guise (June), and the close of the civil war. It consists of a preface and twenty-five articles on the chief doctrines of religion, which are briefly, tersely, and vigorously stated. It agrees with the other Reformed Confessions of the sixteenth century, but is more pronounced in its opposition to the Roman-Catholic Church than most of them. It was rather hastily composed in four days, twice read, article by article, in Parliament, and adopted by the same as being "based upon the infallible word of God." Only three temporal lords voted against it, for the reason that they believed as their forefathers believed. The Roman-Catholic bishops were called upon to object and refute, but kept silence. Seven years later (1567), after the abdication of Queen Mary, the Confession was re-adopted, and the Reformed Kirk of Scotland formally acknowledged and established. In 1580 the Confession was signed by King James II., and a supplementary confession (sometimes called the Second Scotch Confession) added to it. It continued to be the only doctrinal standard of Scotland recognized by the civil government till the revolution of 1688; but it was practically superseded by the Westminster Confession, which is more logical and complete, and was adopted by the Covenanters and the General Assembly during the Commonwealth. The Scotch Confession is printed in the Acts of the Scotch Parliament for 1560; in KNOX: History of the Scotch Reformation (ed. Laing, vol. ii.); in CALDERWOOD: History of the Kirk of Scotland; in DUNLOP: Collection of Scotch Confessions (vol. ii.); in NIEMEYER: Collec. Confess. Reform. (Latin only); and in SCHAFF: Hist. of the Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii. 137-185 (English and Latin); comp. vol. i. 680-696. PHILIP SCHAFF.

SCOTCH PARAPHRASES. In May, 1742, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland appointed a committee, consisting of WILLIAM ROBERTSON (father of the historian; minister of London Wall, Borthwick, and Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh; d. about 1713), ROBERT BLAIR (b. in Edinburgh, 1699; d. Feb. 4, 1716; minister of Athelstanford, East Lothian, 1731; author of The Grave, 1743), and others, to make or collect translations in verse of select passages of Scripture. Their work was sanctioned by the Assembly, 1751, and appeared as Scripture Songs, forty-five in number, and now rare. In 1775 another committee undertook the revision of these, adding twenty-two paraphrases and five hymns. The complete result was approved and printed, 1781. Among the revisers were HUGH BLAIR (author of the well-known Rhetoric, 1783, and Sermons, 1777-1800; b. in Edinburgh, April 7, 1718; d. Dec. 27, 1800; minister of the High Church, 1758; professor in the university of Edinburgh, 1762), JOHN LOGAN (b. near Edinburgh, 1718; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788; minister at Leith, 1773; author of two volumes of Sermons, etc.), JOHN MORRISON, D.D. (b. County of Aberdeen, 1719; minister of Canisbay, Caithness, 1780; d. there June 12, 1798; translated book ii. of the Æneid, 1787), and WILLIAM CAMERON (b. 1751; studied at Aberdeen; minister of Kirknewton in Midlothian, 1785; d. Nov. 17, 1811; author of sundry poems, etc.). Each of these is believed to have written one or more of the Paraphrases, but the precise authorship cannot be determined in every case. Some twenty were altered or rewritten from Watts, and three from Doddridge; one each was contributed by Dr. Blacklock, Dr. J. Ogilvie, and W. Randall; three are by W. Robertson (1712-51), and several by Morrison. Cameron's name appears chiefly as an improver of other men's verses. The most important share, both for quantity and quality, was taken from the manuscripts of MICHAEL BRUCE (1746-67; see Appendix), intrusted, after the author's death, to Logan, and by him basely used, and published as his own. The Paraphrases are marked by a dry neatness and precision of style, which excludes whatever could offend the most sober taste, and leaves little room for lyrical or devotional fire. Their eminent respectability and long service have made them household words in Scotland, and they have been constantly and largely drawn upon by English and American hymnals. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Elizabeth, the author of many once popular and useful hymns; was b. at Norwich, Eng., probably in 1708; and d. at Wethersfield, Conn., June 13, 1776. She refused the hand, but retained the friendship, of Dr. Doddridge, who introduced to her a distinguished New-Englander, Col. Elisha Williams (1691-1755, once 1726-39) rector of Yale College. Having married him in 1751, she migrated to Connecticut. In 1761 she married Hon. William Smith of New York. After his death, in 1769, she lived with relatives of her first husband at Wethersfield, Conn. Her hymns were begun at her father's suggestion, and most of them written probably before his death in 1710; but they did not see the light till much later. A few of them appeared in Dr. Dodd's Christian Magazine (1763-61), twenty-one in ASH and EVANS'S Collection (1769), and eight of them, with twelve more, in DORRILL'S New Selection (1806). Her entire poetical manuscript is in the library of Yale College. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Levi, D.D., senior bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. near Cautwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Del., Oct. 11, 1802; d. there Thursday, July 12, 1882. He was licensed, 1825, and received into the Philadelphia Conference, 1826. From 1810 to 1813 he was principal of Dickinson Grammar-School, Carlisle, Penn.; was a member of every General Conference from 1837 to 1852; in the latter year he was elected bishop, and served the church with great ability and faithfulness.

SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Elizabeth Scott, not to be confounded with his namesake the commentator; was a dissenting minister at Lowestoft in Suffolk, Ipswich (1737-71), and Hopton in Norfolk, where he d. 1775. Apart from some sermons, all his publications were poetical: the chief of them are, The Book of Job in English Verse (1771), and the meritorious and interesting volume of Lyric Poems, Devotional and Moral (1773). These are designed "to form a kind of little poetical system of piety and morals," and cover in careful order the whole ground of what he considered most important in natural and revealed religion. His opinions seem to have been semi-Arian; and his hymns have been chiefly, though by no means exclusively, used by Unitarians. The most familiar of them are, "Hasten, sinner, to be wise," and "Angels, roll the rock away." F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Braytiff, Lincolnshire, Feb. 16, 1717; d. at Aston Sandford, Buckinghamshire, April 16, 1821. He was ordained priest in 1773; and in 1781 he succeeded John Newton, who had converted him to Calvinism, as curate of Olney. In 1785 he became chaplain of the Lock Hospital, London, and in 1801 vicar of Aston Sandford. His first publication was The Force of Truth: a Marcellian Narrative of Human Life, London, 1779 (10th ed., Edinburgh, 1816), an account of his religious changes. His most important work, and that for which he is so celebrated, is A Family Bible with Notes, 1788-92, 5 vols., repeatedly re-issued and reprinted, several American editions. This has long been considered a model family Bible, and has been read more widely, perhaps, than any other. It speaks volumes for Scott's industry and skill, that without early educational advantages, oppressed by poverty, and compelled for years before his ordination to earn his living as a tumbler, he yet was able to acquire considerable learning, and to present it in so popular a way.

See ALTHORP, S. V., for bibliographical and critical remarks respecting this Commentary. Scott's Essays on the Most Important Subjects in Religion were published in 1793, 15th ed., 1811. His Works, edited by his son, appeared in 1823, 10 vols. See his Life, London, 1822. New York, 1836.

SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY has several very marked features, determined by the bones rather than by the flesh. First, It professes to proceed by the method of induction, that is, by the observation of facts. In this respect it is like the physical sciences, and differs entirely from the ancient and mediæval systems, which sought to discover truth by analysis and deduction, from the joint dogmatic and deductive method of Descartes and his school, from the critical method of Kant, and the dialectic of Hegel. Second, It observes its facts, not by the external senses, but by self-consciousness. In this respect it differs from physical science and from the materialist and physiological schools of our day. It does look at the brain and nerves (Reid and Brown, and, in our day, Calderwood, looked at these), but it is merely to aid it in investigating purely mental phenomena falling under the eye of consciousness. Third, By the observations of consciousness it discovers principles working in the mind prior to and independent of our observation of them or of our experience: these it calls reason in the first degree as distinguished from reasoning, intuition, common sense (Reid), fundamental laws of thought (Stewart). This is its important characteristic, distinguishing it from Locke, and from empiricists who discover nothing higher than the generalization of a gathered experience; whereas the Scottish school discover principles above experience, and regulating experience. Mental philosophy is in a sense inductive, as it is by induction we discover fundamental laws and their mode of operation; but these laws exist prior to induction, and guide to and guarantee primitive truth.

The influential philosophy, when the Scottish school arose, was that of Locke, whose Essay on Human Understanding was published in 1690. The early Scottish metaphysicians express their great obligations to Locke, and never differ from him without expressing a regret that they are obliged to do so. But, in order to keep his experiential philosophy from drifting into scepticism, they call in certain primitive principles.

Francis Hutcheson (1694-1716), an Irishman of Scottish descent, and professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, is entitled to be regarded as the founder of the school. In his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), and in An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations of the Moral Sense (1728), he calls in a moral sense, after the manner of Shaftesbury, to oppose the defective ethical theory of Locke.

David Hume appeared in the mean time (1711-76). As Berkeley had denied the existence of matter as a substance, so Hume denies the existence of mind as a substance, and reduces every thing to sensation and ideas, with relations discovered between them; that of cause and effect being merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence. (See his Treatise of Human Nature, 1739.) In An Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals he represented virtue as consisting in the agreeable and useful. The Scottish metaphysicians had now to defend truth from the scepticism of their countryman.

Thomas Reid (1710-96) may be regarded as the fittest representative of the school. He was a professor, first in Aberdeen, and then in Glasgow. He published An Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense, in 1761, followed by Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, in 1785, and Essays on the Active Powers, in 1788. In these works he opposes vigorously Locke's views as to idea, which had culminated in the Idealism of Berkeley, and shows that there is in the mind a reason in the first degree, or a common sense, which gives as a foundation of truth and morality. A number of other writers appeared in Scotland about the same time, such as James Beattie (1735-1802), author of Essay on Truth, and George Campbell (1710-96), author of Philosophy of Rhetoric, — all attacking Hume, and defending the truth on much the same principles as Reid.

Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) was the most illustrious disciple of Reid, and sought to establish what he called the "fundamental laws of human belief." By his clear exposition and his elegant style he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillæ, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed, religion.

Thomas Brown (1778-1820) rebelled against the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles. He was influenced to some extent by Destutt de Tracy, and the ideologists of France. He allowed to Hume that the relation of cause and effect was merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence, but argued, in opposition to Hume, that the relation was discovered intuitively. He thus kept up his relationship to the genuine Scottish school, and defended the great truths of natural religion. In his lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, published posthumously, he discoursed brilliantly on suggestion and on the emotions.

Thomas Chalmers was a devoted adherent of the philosophy of his country. He expounded with great eloquence the views of Butler as to the nature and supremacy of conscience. None of the Scottish metaphysicians opposed religion — Hume did not belong to the school; but Chalmers was the first who brought the philosophy of Scotland into harmony with the evangelical faith of the nation. He argued from the moral power in man, as Kant did, the existence of God and of man's responsibility and immortality, and, from the nature of the moral law, the corruption of man's nature and the need of an atonement.

Sir William Hamilton is, always with Reid, the most noted philosopher of the Scottish school. As Reid was distinguished for his observation and shrewd sense, Hamilton was for his erudition and his logical power. While he belongs to the Scottish school, he sought to combine with it some of the principles of the philosophy of Kant. In Note A, a dissertation appended to Reid's Collected Works, he shows that common sense, by which he means our primary beliefs, has been held by all the most profound thinkers of ancient and modern times. In his Logic he sought to restore the old system, but sought, after the manner of Kant, to improve it, especially by insisting on the universal quantification of the predicate. In his Metaphysics he has a good classification of the faculties of the mind. Some members of the school do not approve of his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge and the negative doctrines of causation and infinity expounded in his Discussions.

The Scottish school has several excellent qualities in its relation to religion. All its members seek to unfold with care the properties and laws of the mind, and thus furnish the best antidotes against materialism. They find in the mind itself grand laws or principles which guarantee truth, such as the necessary principle of cause and effect, implying the existence of God, and the moral power implying an indelible distinction between right and wrong. While thus furnishing an introduction to religion, and aiding it, it does not seek to absorb it, as do the idealism of Schelling and the dialectic of Hegel. The Scottish metaphysicians have always been somewhat suspicious of the higher speculations of certain German philosophers. Hamilton, in his Discussions, cuts down the idea of the absolute as defended by Schelling and Cousin, by showing that it involves contradictions. (For accounts and criticisms, see Dissertations on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy by DUGALD STEWART, Ecole Ecossaise by COUSIN, and especially The Scottish Philosophy Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton, by JAMES McCOSH.)

JAMES McCOSH.

SCOTUS ERIGENA, John. The date and place of his birth cannot be made out with certainty, but it is probable that he was born in Ireland between 800 and 815. He came to the court of Charles the Bald as a man of mature age; and he made there the acquaintance of Prudentius, who left the court in 847. He came from Ireland, in one of whose flourishing cloistral schools he had been educated; and his surname, Scotus or Scoti-gena, applied to him by his contemporaries, — Pope Nicholas I., in his letter to Charles the Bald; Prudentius, in his De Prædestinatione; the synod of Langres (859), etc., — yields no argument against his being a native of that country, as its original Latin name was Scotia Major. His other surname, first occurring in the oldest manuscripts of his translation of Dionysius Areopagita, points directly to Ireland in both of its derivations, — Irigena, from the Greek ἱρῶν ("born in the island of the saints"), and Erigena, from "Erin," the old native name of the country.

Similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the place, date, and circumstances of his death. Ingulf, in his Historia Abbatie Croylandensis, Sinceo of Durlam, in his De Regibus Anglorum et Danorum, William of Malmesbury, and others, tell us that he was invited to England by Alfred the Great, probably shortly after the death of Charles the Bald, about 883; that he was appointed teacher at the school of Oxford, and afterwards abbot of Malmesbury; and that he finally, probably about 891, was killed by his own pupils, and in the church. Mabillon, in Act. Sanct. Ord., S. Bened., Natalis Alexander, in his Hist. Eccl. Sæc., ix., the Histoire Litt. de la France, v., and others, reject this report as fabulous; because it seems impossible to them that a man who had been condemned by a pope and a synod for holding heretical opinions should afterwards be made an abbot; but the argument is not of any great weight.

At the court of Charles the Bald he was received with great honor. He enjoyed the particular favor of the king, was made director of the palatial school, and became intimately acquainted with all the scholars of the court, — a Hincmar, a Lupus, an Usuard, a Ratramnus, and others. He appears to have held no ecclesiastical office in France; nor is it probable that he belonged to any of the monastic orders, though he may have received priestly ordination. In France he wrote most, perhaps all, of his works. The translation of Dionysius Areopagita, which became the bridge across which Neo-Platonism penetrated into Western Europe, he undertook on the express request of the king. It gave him a great fame for learning among people in general, but it also made him suspected in the eyes of the Pope. His principal work is his De Divisione Naturæ, a kind of natural philosophy or speculative theology, which, starting from the supposition of the unity of philosophy and theology, ends as a system of idealistic pantheism; philosophy having, in the course of the development, entirely absorbed theology.

It cannot be made out with certainty what part Erigena took in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper which had broken out between Paschasius Radbertus, Rabanus Maurus, Ratramnus, and others, before his arrival in France. It is certain that the book De Eucharistia, which for a long time was ascribed to him, belongs to Ratramnus; but it is as certain that he stood entirely on the side of the latter. From some newly discovered fragments of his commentary on the Gospel of John, and from some notices in Hincmar's De Predestinatione (c. 31), it is evident that he considered the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper as mere symbols of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, — a view which is in perfect harmony with his whole system, in which the Lord's Supper is left almost unnoticed. The only thing doubtful is, whether he has written an independent treatise on the subject, or whether he has merely touched it incidentally in his other writings.

Clearer and more important is his participation in the controversy of Gottschalk concerning predestination. When Prudentius, Ratramnus, Servatus Lupus, Remigius, and others took the side of Gottschalk, at least partially, Hincmar summoned Erigena, the celebrated dialectician, to his aid; and Erigena obeyed the summons so much the more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of developing one of the fundamental ideas of his system, — his idea of evil. In 851, or between the first and the second synod of Chiersy (849 and 854), he wrote his book De Predestinatione, in which he teaches that there is only one predestination, namely, that to eternal bliss. With respect to evil and its punishment, he says there is no predestination, even not a prescience; for evil is a nothing, and has no real existence; it is only a lack, a fault in the realization of good. Of course Hincmar was rather frightened by an auxiliary of this character. Soon remonstrances and refutations began to pour in. Venilo, archbishop of Sens, wrote against Erigena; also Prudentius, Florus, and others. The second synod of Chiersy (853) partially indorsed the views of Erigena; but the synod of Valence (855) absolutely condemned them, and the condemnation was confirmed by the synod of Langres (859) and Pope Nicholas. It is not known, however, that the audacious philosopher was subjected to any direct persecution.

LIT. — The collected works of Erigena are found in MIGNE: Patrol. Latine, vol. 122. SCOTUS, Marianus, b. in Ireland, 1028; d. in the monastery of St. Martin, Mayence, 1083. He left Ireland in 1052, studied in Cologne and Fulda, and was ordained a priest at Würzburg in 1059, but was in the same year shut up in the monastery of Fulda to do penance for sins committed. In 1069 he was released, and removed to Mayence, but was again imprisoned for the same reason. He wrote a Chronicle in three books, — I. The World's History till the Birth of Christ; II. The History of Christ and the Apostles; III. The History of the Church till 1082. Edited by G. SCRIBES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The name "scribes," which already occurs in Jer. viii. 8, Ez. vii. 6, 11, is mentioned very often in the New Testament, either in a good, ideal sense (Matt. xiii. 52, xxiii. 34), or, what is more frequently the case, in a bad sense (Matt. ii. 1, v. 29, vii. 29, xii. 38, etc.), and designates those scribes who at the time of Christ, having themselves lost the true knowledge of the law and the prophets, became blind leaders of the people (Luke xi. 52; Matt. xv. 14). The scribes (sophrim, or sofinim) were originally merely writers or copyists of the law; but eventually they became the doctors of the law, and interpreters of the scriptures. According to the Talmud, these teachers were called "sophrim," because they counted every letter, and classified every precept of the law.

The period of the scribes begins with the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Though there were popular teachers of the law during the Babylonian captivity, as is evident from Ez. viii. 16, yet the altered state after the return required new enactments, and demanded that an authoritative body of teachers should so regulate the religious life as to adapt it to present circumstances. Hence Ezra, who re-organized the new state, also organized such a body of interpreters, of which he was the chief. It is for this reason, that beside the appellation "the priest" he is also called "the scribe" (Ez. vii. 6, 11, 12). The scribes in the law, both from among the tribe of Aaron and the laity, who with Ezra and after his death thus interpreted and fixed the law, were denominated "sopherim," or "scribes." In synagogues, which probably at this time were built here and there, they expounded the law, either on festival and sabbath days, or on Monday and Thursday, the market-days. The most famous teachers were not only members of the Sanhedrin, but formed also kind of spiritual college, the so-called "Great Synagogue," the last member of which was Simeon the Just. It is characteristic of the scribes of the earlier period, that, with the exception of Ezra and Zadok (Neh. xiii. 13), and of Simeon, we have no record of their names; and Jost is probably correct in ascribing this silence to the fact that the one aim of these early scribes was to promote reverence for the law, to make it the groundwork of the people's life. They would write nothing of their own, lest less worthy words should be raised to a level with those of the oracles of God (Judenthum und s. Sitten, i. 42). They devoted themselves to the exposition and careful study of the law; and, when interpretation was needed, their teaching was orally only. As these decisions, or halachoth, could not be traced to any certain author, they were called the precepts of the scribes, also of the elders, or ages (παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, Matt. xii. 5, xv. 3 sq.; Mark vii. 2 sq.; also παράδοσις παπαστέρων, Gal. i. 14). The scribes of this period probably fixed the canon of the Old Testament and the textus receptus. Thus they became the bearers of the theocratic tradition, as were the prophets in the pre-exile period, but with this difference, that the former, perhaps with the exception of Ezra and those who were with him, represented the letter, which killeth; while the latter were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Aboth, i. 1: "Be cautious in judging, train many disciples, and set a fence about the law." They wished to make the law of Moses the rule of life. But, as the infinite variety of life presents cases which the law has not contemplated, expansions of the old, and additions of new, decisions came in vogue, till finally the "words of the scribes" were honored above the law, and it was a greater crime to offend against them than against the law. Side by side with development of the halachoth, another development took place. The sacred books were not studied as a code of laws only. To search into their meaning had from the first belonged to the ideal office of the scribe. But here also the book suggested thoughts which could not logically be deduced from it; and, where the literal interpretation could not help, recourse was taken to an interpretation which was the reverse of the literal. The fruit of this effort to find what was not there appears in the Midrashim; and the process by which the meaning, moral or mystical, was elicited, was known as Hagadah, i.e., saying, opinion. Room being once left to speculation, mysticism and fanciful speculations, which culminated in the Cabala, developed themselves. Side by side with this esoteric, gnostic, dogmatic tendency of the Hagadah, we also find an ethical, popular one, as is best represented in Ecclesiastical. The later scribes, better known as the Tannaim, or "teachers of the law," fixed and formularized the views and expositions of their predecessors, and as they accumulated they had to be compiled and classified. A new code grew out of them, a second corpus juris, the Mishna (διδασκαλία, Epiph., Hier., 13, 1; 15, 2). In this time, when the successive ascendancy of the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans over Palestine, greatly influenced the habits and conduct of the Jewish people, different views, which finally branched out into different parties, were advanced as to how the law could and should be kept most carefully, and how every thing foreign which was in opposition to it could be eliminated. In the Books of the Maccabees frequent allusions are made to this tendency, which was especially represented in the Chasidim (Ἀσδαίμοι, 1 Macc. i., 62, ii. 29, 42, vii. 12 sq.; 2 Macc. xiv. 6). To the Chasidim belonged two scribes, — Jose ben-Joezer of Zereda and Jose ben-Jochanan, — both disciples of Antigonus of Soho (about 190 B.C.), himself a disciple of Simeon the Just (Pirke Aboth, i. 1). These two are the first of the five pairs of teachers of the law, who, as propagators of the orthodox tradition, distinguished themselves in the last centuries before Christ. They were succeeded by the two contemporaries of John Hyrcanus, — Joshua ben-Perachja and Nithai of Arbela (between 140 and 110 B.C.), in whose doctrinal views the opposition to Sadduceism first shows itself. To them succeeded, in the time of Alexander Jannæus and Alexandra, Simon ben-Shetach, a hero of Pharisaism, who twice broke the influence of the Sadducees in the Sanhedrin, and Judah ben-Tabai. In the time of the last Maccabaans, and in the first years of the Idumean rule, the two great doctors of the law were the two sons of proselytes, Shemaja (Sameas, Joseph., Ant., XIV. 9, 4) and Abtalion (Pollio, Joseph., Ant., XV. 1, 10, 4), the two magnates of their day. The last pair was presented by Hillel and Shammai.

The most famous scribes at the time of Christ and the apostles were, besides Nicodemus (John iii.), Simon, the son of Hillel; Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel; Jochanan ben-Zaccai; and Jonathan, the son of Uzziel, the Chaldean paraphrast. From Mark iii. 22, vii. 1, John vii. 15, we learn that a celebrated high school of the scribes existed at Jerusalem in the time of Christ. The questions which often brought about a conflict between Christ and the scribes and Pharisees, such as concerning divorce, oath, the sabbath, etc., were the same which occupied the scribes, more especially the license to teach and the introduction of new academical degrees. The scribe, who already occupied a high position over and against the unlearned, and even the priests, now rose to greater prominence since the introduction of the ordination, or promotion as teacher of the law, and member of the court. The candidate, having passed through a certain curriculum in the school of famous teachers, was licensed and set apart by ordination; the presiding rabbi giving to him as the symbol of his work tablets on which he was to note down the sayings of the wise, and the "key of knowledge" (comp. Luke xi. 52), with which he was to open or to shut the treasures of divine wisdom. So admitted, he took his place as a chaber, or member of the fraternity. This state of things created not only a fondness for titles (Matt. xxiii. 7), but, above all, a spiritual hierarchy, to which the people had to succumb. The scribes gave the people a new spiritual country, a kingdom of heaven, which was not limited by space. But to give them a kingdom of heaven in which Moses and the prophets are fulfilled was beyond their powers; and, because they did not enter therein themselves, they prevented the people also from entering therein (Matt. xxiii. 13). The influence of the scribes was very far-reaching. They were found in the court-room, in the colleges, but more especially in the synagogues. In the latter places they occupied the uppermost seats (Matt. xxiii. 6), read and explained the law. They were also not wanting in the feasts (Abel); in short, they were everywhere; and it was a very easy thing to influence by their own opposition the people against Jesus. For a long time they tried in vain to get hold of him (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xiii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 7, x. 25, xi. 54, xv. 2, xx. 19 sq.); but they accomplished at last his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 57, xxvii. 41). The essence and character of rabbinism were such that it necessarily came in conflict with Jesus. The scribes could not bear to hear the truth out of his mouth, and thus was fulfilled what is written in Isa. xxix. 10-11. That there were also exceptional cases among the scribes, we see in "Zenias the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13).

SCRIVER, Christian, an author of devotional works; was b. at Rendsburg, Holstein, Jan. 2, 1629; d. at Quedlinburg, April 5, 1693. In 1647 he entered the university of Rostock; in 1653 was made archdeacon of Stendal, and, fourteen years later, pastor of St. James's Church, Magdeburg. Here he continued to labor, in spite of calls to Berlin and to Stockholm, as court-preacher, until a short time before his death, when, at Spener's suggestion, he was appointed first court-preacher at Quedlinburg. Scriver is known as author of some useful works of devotion, as the Sachschatz (1675), Gottthold's zufällige Andachten, [1671, Eng. trans., Gottthold's Emblems, by Menzies, Edinburgh, 1863], which consists of four hundred parables and meditations, and Sach u. Sache, in which are recorded the experience of his own sick-bed and God's goodness. Printed from his papers Wittentrost. SCUDDER, John, M.D., missionary of the Reformed Dutch Church in India; b. at Freehold, N.J., Sept. 13, 1793; d. at Wynberg, South Africa, Jan. 13, 1855. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1811, and at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New-York City, 1815; and practised medicine until 1819, being meanwhile a most earnest and devoted Christian. In the latter year, while in professional attendance upon a lady, he took up in the anteroom a tract entitled The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, and the Ability and Duty of the Churches respecting Them. His thoughts were turned more strongly than ever upon his personal duty toward the heathen, and as the result of his deliberations he gave his life to missionary labor. After licensure by the classis of New York, he sailed, June 8, 1819; went first to Ceylon, where he arrived February, 1820; was ordained there May 15, 1821, by clergymen of the Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist denominations; established a hospital at Jaffnapatnam; in 1822 was foremost in organizing a college there, and in 1824 was blessed by an extensive revival. In 1836 he and Miron Winslow were transferred to Madras, India, in order that there he might print Scriptures and tracts in Tamil. In the first year they printed six million pages. Dr. Scudder fixed his residence at Chintadrepettah, near Madras, and thus, under his surveillance, there grew up the Arcot mission, which was received under the care of the American Board in 1852, and of the Reformed Dutch Church the next year. From 1812 to 1816 Dr. Scudder was in America, busily engaged, however, in arousing interest in foreign missions. In 1819 he was in the Madura mission; but with this exception he gave his energies to the Arcot mission, and after the death of his wife and son Samuel (1819), wrought with redoubled zeal, as if called upon to make good their loss. Under this pressure his health gave way in 1851, and by medical advice he went to the Cape of Good Hope. Much benefited by the voyage, he was upon the point of returning to India when he was stricken down by apoplexy.

Dr. Scudder is one of the heroes of foreign missions. He was tall, strong, and well-proportioned; slender in youth, he became portly in later years; originally of sound health, he ruined it by unsparing labor. He was a vigorous thinker, decided in his views, though without bigotry. Endowed with great perseverance, he carried through his project at whatever cost. Convinced that he was doing Christ's work, he cared nothing for the opposition of men. He endured hardness, and even severe pain, without complaint. His piety was carefully cultivated. Every Friday till noon he spent in fasting and prayer. The Bible constituted well-nigh his sole reading. He went about doing good to body and soul, like his Master. He preached in almost every large town in south-eastern Hindostan. It was his ambition "to be one of the inner circle around Jesus in heaven."

SCULPTURE, Christian. A marked decline in art, both technically and with respect to its subject-matter, made itself manifest in the ancient world long before the conquest of Corinth by Mummius (B.C. 116). The subjugation of Greece by Alexander the Great signalized the first prostitution of art from the noble ends of patriotism and religious faith to those of ostentation and personal egotism. The degrading of its inspirations seems to have gone hand in hand with its technical decline; and when Greece, which in the Periclean age was the mistress of the world in art and all other cultures, came under the Roman yoke, the spirit of creative genius had perished, and the great masterpieces, which in their extant relics have taught the world through all subsequent centuries, became almost forgotten monuments of the past.

In considering, then, the almost puerile achievements of art in the departments both of sculpture and painting in the early Christian age, its long antecedent decline must not be left out of the account. Irrespective of other causes, presently to be specified, Christian art in Rome, where it had its cradle-life (we can scarcely say its birth-place), lacked both masters and models fitted to cultivate it on a high plane.

Two other causes combined to render the Christian Church in the primitive age, not only indifferent, but absolutely antagonistic, to art-culture.

The first of these, and the most important, was the prostitution of the art of ancient Paganism to idolatry. The Mosaic institutes and traditions, however modified by the early church with respect to many of the elements of a cumbersome ceremonialism, were literally interpreted in their relation to art, especially, it may be added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorrence of the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the earliest Christian Church. The substitution, then, of materialism for the spiritual worship of the one invisible God was the one thing which primitive Christianity dreaded; and any compromise with this was regarded with jealousy, and any concession to its demands excited the bitterest intolerance.

We have only to consider, in the second place, the prostitution of contemporary Roman art to the lowest passions of human nature—a fact evidencing itself with the most loathsome details in the relics both of painting and sculpture in Herculaneum and Pompeii—in order to find another powerful influence in the same direction. It is not surprising, that in the welfare of the soul for the subjugation of the body, with its lusts and appetites—the primal end of life according to the teachings of Christ—the early disciples could find little or nothing in contemporary Pagan art which they could contemplate with complacency; and it seems, in the circumstances, only strange, that, at so early a period in the history of the Christian Church, art in any form could have come to be regarded as a possible auxiliary to a pure spiritual faith and worship. Tertullian (d. A.D. 220) went so far as to declare the fine arts, more especially sculpture, to be the invention of the Devil. While this extreme judgment cannot be regarded as literally expressing the universal sentiment of the early church, it nevertheless represented a very prevalent antipathy.

The earliest decided concession is found in the memorials of the dead, sarcophagi, and sepulchral slabs and monuments, on which were carved in relief the simple emblems of Christian faith and the scenes of biblical history, many of which were intentionally employed as symbols of Christian doctrine, especially that of the resurrection of the body.

Of single extant statues representing sacred personages, Dr. Ullrich specifies but four important ones in the whole range of early Christian art down to the tenth century. These are the statue of Bishop Hippolytus, who suffered martyrdom in the first half of the third century, the entire upper portion of which is a modern restoration; the famous bronze image of St. Peter, in the great Roman basilica named after him, a work probably executed in Constantinople in the fifth century; and two marble statues representing Christ as the Good Shepherd, whose date he places in the fifth or sixth century. A certain school of modern German criticism has sought to prove that the form of these latter was borrowed from the Mercury Criophoros (or ram-bearer), well known in the sculpture of ancient Greece. But a careful comparison of the Pagan and the Christian conception scarcely justifies this conclusion. To mention no other considerations, it is to be remarked that the Pagan statue, so far as we are acquainted with it, was always undraped, a characteristic quite unknown in any extant Christian sculpture representing the Pastor Bonus. If some suggestion as regards form might have been derived from Pagan statues with which the early Christians were familiar, there can be no doubt that the statues of the Good Shepherd, a large number of which doubtless existed in the primitive church, were original and deliberate endeavors to give a visible paraphrase of the Twenty-third Psalm, the parable of the lost sheep, and the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Of the sepulchral reliefs of early Christian art which have been conserved to the present time, the most important is the famous sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (prefect of Rome, d. A.D. 359), now in the crypt of St. Peter's Church in Rome. It was probably executed in the fourth century, and contains five subjects from the Old and New Testaments. Other examples of kindred character are found in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and in the crypt of the Cathedral of Ancona. Many ancient altar-tablets are found in the churches of Italy, especially at Ravenna (Cathedral, S. Apollinari in Classe, S. Vitale, S. Francesco, etc.).

A remarkable sarcophagus, though of much ruder workmanship than that of Junius Bassus, is in the Church of St. Ambrose in Milan; its principal relief representing Christ teaching, surrounded by his disciples.

In the representation of the scenes of biblical history by means of sepulchral reliefs, the Roman Catacombs furnished the most numerous examples. Most of these have been removed to the Lateran Museum. Both the Old and the New Testaments contributed the materials for these subterranean galleries of early Christian art; and many of the sculptures, for example, those having for their subjects the histories of Noah and Jonah, are so puerile as artistic performances to border on the grotesque.

All, however, have a high and noble moral significance, and were doubtless intended to symholy great cardinal doctrines of evangelical faith.

Only second to these in importance are the sepulchral reliefs found in the Catacombs of Naples and Syracuse.

The sculptural ornamentation of ecclesiastical furniture, sacramental shins, crucifixes, episcopal chairs (a fine example is the chair of Archbishop Maximilian in the cathedral at Ravenna), goblets, diptychs, and ivory carvings for movable altars, and the covers of prayer-books and the Sacred Scriptures, constitutes an extensive though subordinate feature in the later art of this first period of Christian sculpture, which we may extend in general limitation over ten centuries.

Some of the most precious of these treasures, containing in the aggregate great wealth in the precious metals, fell a prey to the barbarian invasions of Italy, and are lost beyond recovery. Prominent examples of this vandalism, which robbed the world of some of the most costly relics of early Christian sculpture, were the plundering of the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome by the Saracens (A.D. 846) and of the churches of Constantinople in the conquest of that city by the Latins (A.D. 1204).

What is called the Romanesque period of Christian sculpture may be said to begin with the eleventh century; and we remark in this period the most striking contrast between its magnificent architectural creations and its limited fruitage in the departments both of sculpture and painting. The beginning of this period produced neither masters nor masterpieces of great importance. In subordinate departments of sculpture we may cite the famous reliefs in Hildesheim,—the bronze door of its cathedral with its sixteen reliefs, and the pillars standing before them, containing scenes from the life of Christ. These works, and others of kindred character (e.g., the magnificent bronze candlesticks in the Magdalene Church at Hildesheim), are ascribed conjecturally to Bishop Bernard (d. 1023).

The magnificent portal of the cathedral at Freiberg in Saxony ("the golden door," so called, with its fine reliefs, taken from a former edifice on the same site, is one of the most important works of this early period. Of similar works in France, the sculptured portals of the cathedrals of Arles, Bourges, and Chartres, must be mentioned.

Italy, however, gave to the church in the thirteenth century a great sculptor, who in technical excellence caught something of the lost spirit of the antique. This was Nicola Pisano, who between 1260 and 1278 executed a series of works which may justly be regarded as forerunners of the Renaissance age. Foremost of these are the famous reliefs on the pulpit of the baptistery at Pisa, representing the Birth of Christ, the Adoration of the Three Kings, the Presentation in the Temple, the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment.

A modern German critic naively, but with some justice, observes that the figure of the Virgin in the Nativity reminds one of the Sleeping Ariadne in ancient Roman sculpture.

It need scarcely be said, that in the Gothic period, next following the Romanesque, architecture was the one interest in art which overshadowed all others, and that almost all the sculpture of this age was simply an accessory of architecture. In Northern Europe the earnest spirit of the Romanesque period still prevailed, though the names of no great masters have come down to us through their works.

The noble reliefs in the Strassburg Cathedral, representing the death and coronation of the Virgin, with the allegorical figures of the Christian Church, are worthy of especial mention as being ascribed to Sabina von Steinbach, the reputed daughter of the architect of this magnificent Gothic temple. In Italy the spirit of Nicola Pisano, the great master of the Romanesque age, was conserved in his son Giovanni (circa 1240–1321) and his pupil Andrea Pisano (1275–1349).

The names of Giotto and Orcagna, among the sculptors of this period, must not be omitted, albeit painting was the art in which both excelled, and in connection with which their fame has been perpetuated. The high-altar at Arezzo, and the façade of the cathedral at Orvieto, may be cited as the chief works of Giovanni Pisano. On the southern door of the baptistery at Florence there is a series of panels representing the life of John the Baptist, which show Andrea Pisano to have been a worthy scholar of the great Nicola. The figure of Apelles, on the bell-tower of the Florence Cathedral, is a curiosity, from the fact of its having originated with Giotto, the father of painting in the Gothic age.

It is customary with historians to divide the golden age of art, which in general terms may be said to include the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, into the Early and the High Renaissance. For the purposes of the present article, however, we may include both of these—the quattrocento and the cinquecento—in the third great period of Christian sculpture. As applied both to literature and art, the term "renaissance" signifies the revival of the antique; and Italy was the grand theatre of its development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century but few of the sculptures of antiquity had been unearthed in Rome; but the good work, which was carried to full activity under Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, and which has exercised such a mighty moulding influence on all subsequent art, even down to the present day, had already commenced; and there is manifest, even in the early masters of this wonderful age, a loyalty to nature and truth, as distinguished from tradition and conventionalism, which sets them utterly apart from the sculptors of the middle ages.

The great master of what may be called the Early Renaissance was Lorenzo Ghiberti of Florence (1378–1455), who between the years 1403 and 1427 was employed on the north bronze doors of the Florence Baptistery, whose reliefs plainly evidence some of the medieval spirit yet lingering in art. The eastern doors of the same edifice, which he completed in 1502, whose panels contain representations of biblical history, form one of the greatest masterpieces of sculpture which any age has produced. It has been, perhaps, justly criticised as intruding too much upon the province of painting in attempting perspective effects.

Other eminent masters in this period were Donatello of Florence (1386–1466), his pupil, Andrea Verrocchio (1432–88), and Luca della Robbia (1400–82), whose terra-cotta reliefs, representing biblical scenes chiefly, are found in the museums and in several of the churches of Florence. Luca della Robbia wrought likewise in marble and bronze; and his famous marble frieze, representing singing and dancing children, originally executed for the organ-gallery of the Florence Cathedral, and now preserved in the Uffizi Collection, is pronounced by Burckhardt to be one of the finest works of sculpture produced in the fifteenth century.

Among the sculptors of Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the names of Sansovino (Baptism of Christ, in the Florence Baptistery), Lombardi, and Leonardo da Vinci, deserve mention, albeit no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

It need scarcely be said that the one name which glorifies the history of Christian sculpture in the sixteenth century is Michel Angelo Buonarroti, who was born on the 6th of March, 1475, in the vicinity of Arezzo, and died in Rome on the 17th of February, 1564. His earliest important sculptural work was the well-known Pieta, now in St. Peter's Church in Rome, which he executed at the age of twenty-five. Then followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, which occupied the great master during a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, but which was never fully carried out.

Besides the two figures of the Captives, now in the museum of the Louvre in Paris, the colossal Moses, in the Church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in Rome, is the one great feature of this famous sepulchre, and is, without doubt, the grandest creation of modern sculpture. The Medici monuments in Florence are among the noblest works of memorial sculpture in the world. His statue of Christ, in the Church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, executed about 1527, is perhaps the least successful of all the sculptural works of this Titan of art. The sculptors contemporary with Michel Angelo, of whom Giovanni da Bologna (1521-1608) and Benvenuto Cellini (1500-70) were the most eminent, occupied themselves more with mythological than with Christian themes. Christian sculpture in Germany during the sixteenth century bears worthy comparison with that of Italy, chiefly through the name and works of Peter Vischer (d. 1529). The great work which has immortalized him is the noble group of bronze statues and reliefs on the monument of St. Sebald in Nuremberg.

Adam Krafft, famous for his reliefs in Nuremberg, representing the sufferings of Christ, and Veit Stoss, the father of wood-carving in the Renaissance age, deserve mention as German masters of only secondary rank.

Various names have been employed to designate that widespread degradation of sculpture in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from truth to mannerism and ostentation, of which Lorenzo Bernini (1598-1680) was the pioneer and the foremost representative. It is not necessary to specify these names in technical language. Let it suffice to observe, that the same thing which we often witness in the history of literature and oratory, when a numerous horde of feeble aspirants set themselves to the task of imitating a great writer or speaker with extravagant epithets, startling metaphors, and wild gesticulation, came to pass in the domain of art, particularly of sculpture, through the influence of Michel Angelo, when a whole generation of copyists, with large conceit and small faculty, ordained themselves apostles of a new age of pomp and sensationalism. Chiefly through this, among other causes, we look almost in vain, either in the seventeenth or the eighteenth century, for any really great work of Christian sculpture.

The nineteenth century has witnessed, both in Italy and Northern Europe, a revival of Christian sculpture with somewhat of the spirit of its golden age; and the names of Antonio Canova (1779-1822), Bertel Thorvaldsen (1770-1811), and Christian Rauch (1777-1857), representing both extremes of the European Continent, are the glory of modern sculpture, both secular and Christian. With this illustrious trio the name of Ernst Rietchel, the designer of the great Luther Monument at Worms, deserves to be associated, as well as that of his most gifted pupil, Professor Adolf Donnerdort of Stuttgart, still living, who, after the death of his master, completed some of the most important figures of the Luther memorial; e.g., Savonarola, Peter Waldo, and the Mourning Magdeburg. Professor Donnerdort has executed some of the finest sepulchral memorials in Germany, and has likewise won an enviable fame in America by the beautiful bronze drinking-fountain in Union Square, New York, which he finished about two years since, to the order of Mr. D. Willis James, who presented it to the city of his adoption.

SCULTETUS, Abraham, b. at Grunenberg, Silesia, Aug. 21, 1566; d. at Emden, Oct. 24, 1624. He studied at Gorlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, and was appointed court-preacher in Heidelberg in 1598, and professor of theology in 1618. Entangled in the misfortunes of the Elector Friedrich V., he lost his position after the battle on the White Mountain, 1620, but was appointed preacher at Emden in 1622. He was one of the most distinguished theologians of his time in the Reformed Church. His principal works are, Medulla theologiae patrum, 1605-13, 4 vols.; a history of the Reformation, of which, however, only the two first decades (1516-36) appeared, Heidelberg, 1618-20; and De curiculo ritæ, etc., a kind of self-defence, published after his death, Emden, 1625.

SEABURY, Samuel, b. in Groton, Conn., Nov. 30, 1729; d. at New London, Feb. 25, 1796. He was a graduate of Yale College before he was nineteen years of age, and soon after began the study of medicine. In 1752, though he had already devoted himself to the clerical calling, he went to Edinburgh to complete his medical studies, and there became acquainted with a remnant of the ancient Church of Scotland, which, though interdicted by the law, continued to maintain its worship in garrets and out-of-the-way nooks and corners. He was ordained deacon by Bishop

Thomas of Lincoln, ministering on behalf of the aged Sherlock of London, to whose jurisdiction the colonial missions pertained; and two days afterwards the Bishop of Carlisle (Osbaldiston) advanced him to the priesthood (Dec. 23, 1753). He was appointed missionary to New Brunswick, N.J., and arrived there May 25, 1754. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, L.I., influenced partly by a desire to be near his father, who was rector of St. George's, at Hempstead. But shortly after this, his father dying, he became rector of St. Peter's, Westchester. And now, the spirit of the Colonies being roused by the policy of the king's ministers and the provincial governors, the clergy of the Anglican Church were placed in a very trying situation. Seabury and most of his brethren were missionaries deriving their support from England. They had also, at their ordinations and inductions repeatedly taken the oath of allegiance to the sovereign personally; and how could these obligations be slighted without perjury? There was room for honest difference of opinion, in view of the constitutional revolution of 1688 and the conditional character which was thereby imparted to this oath, in the judgment of many jurists and learned men. But Seabury's habits of thought inclined him to a different opinion; and the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 were yet fresh in the memory of all, as a practical warning. He ardently resisted, therefore, what he considered a rebellion against lawful authority; and he was not the man to adopt such views of the case with passive principle only. He sustained what he supposed to be truth and right very vigorously by word and deed; and The Letters of a Westchester Farmer, which called forth the efforts of Hamilton for their refutation, are commonly ascribed to him. In consequence, he was seized by a company of armed men, on the 22d of November, at his home in Westchester, and with violence and insult was taken into Connecticut, where he remained a prisoner till after Christmas. It was impossible for him, however, to continue his ministrations in Westchester; and he soon made his escape to Long Island. His church was desecrated, and his parishioners reduced to great privations. It is needless to say that Seabury maintained his loyalty to the close of the struggle, and continued his sacred ministrations as well as he could, though forced to maintain himself, in large measure, by his skill as a physician. The acknowledgment of the Colonies as independent States by the king himself absolved him from his oath, and he now entered upon a new and more happy period of his life and labors. He was elected by the clergy of Connecticut to be their bishop, on the 25th of March, 1783, in anticipation of the actual peace, and sailed for England soon after the preliminaries had been signed, arriving in London on the 7th of July. The appeal of his diocese to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which had been made for his ordination to the episcopate, was unsuccessful, however, because somewhat premature in its political bearings; one of the difficulties being a natural fear on the part of the government that such a measure might be regarded as an interference with States now independent of the British crown. The archbishop could not proceed to the consecration without an act dispensing with the oath of allegiance; and this gave a civil aspect to the matter, with which the ministry was not prepared to be concerned. In this dilemma, recourse was had to the bishops in Scotland not yet relieved of their restraints by the death of the Pretender, but tolerated in view of that approaching event and in consideration of their long and patient sufferings. It was on Sunday, the 11th of November, 1781, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's residence in Aberdeen, that Seabury received the episcopate at the hands of three "nonjuring" prelates, and became the first bishop of the American succession. He always regarded it as an advantage that he was thus consecrated in a primitive and "purely ecclesiastical" manner, as he expressed it, because it assured his countrymen that his future labors had no dependence upon the crown of England, and that he held his order and office without any favor of Prince or Parliament. Before leaving Scotland he signed a Concordat with the Scottish Bishops, by which he agreed to promote, so far as in him lay, those restorations of the (Eucharistic) Liturgy, which have accordingly become the characteristic feature of the American Prayer-Book as compared with that of the Church of England.

It has been necessary to give with some detail so much of Seabury's history as is essential to an explanation of his position and influence in the organization of the Protestant-Episcopal Church; but, referring our readers to the lately published memoir (by Dr. Beardsley, 1881) for a full account of his life and labors, it is sufficient to add a brief outline of his episcopate. After a voyage of three months he reached his diocese June 27, 1785, and on the 2d of August following, at Middletown, was received by his clergy with due solemnity. He held his first ordination on the following day. The subsequent consecration of three bishops in England, and the formation of a constitution for the church thus rendered independent and autonomous, occasioned much negotiation and correspondence, before the diocese of Connecticut became duly incorporated under this constitution, with the dioceses south of New England; and in all these agitating preliminaries the learning, piety, and moderation of Seabury, impressed a deep respect for his character upon all his brethren, with the exception of a few whose political prejudices had survived the conflicts of the war. The Johannean qualities of Bishop White were precisely such as were requisite as a complement to the Petrine spirit of Seabury, and to their sincere mutual regard and wise co-operation was largely due the good understanding that soon followed. The episcopate of Bishop Seabury was cordially recognized, and he united with his three brother-bishops of the Anglican line in consecrating the first bishop of Maryland (Dr. Laggett); and consequently no bishop has ever been consecrated in this church without deriving his commission in part through the Scottish line of ecclesiastical ancestry. The bishop's life and labors in Connecticut have left a deep mark on the religious history of the State, and not less deeply has his influence been felt in the entire community in which he was so conspicuous as an organizer and doctor. Two volumes of his sermons have been collected and published, and others have appeared in a fragmentary shape; but valuable manuscripts remain as yet unedited. They evince a vigorous mind, and intrepid devotion to the doctrinal standards of ancient catholicity.

The writer of this brief notice was active in promoting the final deposit of Bishop Seabury's remains, in 1819, under the new and substantial church in New London, where they now rest; and on that occasion he had the solemn office, in connection with Bishop Williams, now the successor of Seabury, of laying his venerable relics in the place of their ultimate repose. A physician who attended to identify these relics when disinterred remarked on the massive proportions of the skull; and the well-worn mitre preserved in Trinity College, Hartford, corresponds with these proportions so remarkably as to furnish in itself a striking evidence of the fidelity of the half-length portrait of the bishop, from the pencil of Duché, which adorns the library of that college, and from which many popular engravings have been derived.

BISHOP A. CLEVELAND COXE.

SEAGRAVE, Robert, an earnest evangelical minister and co-worker with Whitefield; was b. Nov. 22, 1693, at Twyford in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. Having vainly endeavored to bring the Church of England to his position, he left her, or at least worked outside her pale. Besides sundry sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1860. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." He was living as late as 1759.

SEAMAN, Lazarus, D.D., a learned English divine; b. at Leicester; d. in 1675. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. In the civil war he took the Parliamentary side, and in reward of his services was appointed master of Peter House, Cambridge, a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and rector of Allhallows, London, from which living he was ejected in 1662. He was noted for his knowledge of church polity and controversial divinity. Besides sermons, he published A vindication of the judgment of the Reformed Churches and Protestant divines from misrepresentation concerning ordination and laying on of hands, London, 1637. His was the first, or one of the first, libraries disposed of in England by auction (1676), and brought seven hundred pounds. Portions of the catalogue are reprinted in DIBBIN'S Bibliomania, ed. 1812, 301-306 n. See NAL: Hist. of the Puritans, COOPER; Biographical Dictionary; ALLIBONE: Dictionary of Authors.

SEAMEN, Missions to. Rev. John Flavel (England, 1627-91) and English contemporaries (Ryder, Janeway, et al.), as also a few clergymen of the established and dissenting churches in England in the eighteenth century, preached occasional sermons, special and serial, some of which were printed, on behalf of seamen; but the second half of the eighteenth century witnessed the first united efforts for their evangelization. An association, styled at first The Bible Society, was organized in London in 1789, to supply English troops in Hyde Park with the Holy Scriptures, whose field of labor was speedily enlarged to embrace seamen in the British navy. The first ship furnished with Bibles by this society was "The Royal George," sunk off Spithead, Eng.,

Aug. 29, 1782. The society's name was soon changed, becoming The Naval and Military Bible Society. It is still in operation, confines itself to its original specific object, the diffusion of the word of God, and has been of immense service to the army and navy of Great Britain. This society had its influence in originating the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the work of the latter led eventually to the formation of the American Bible Society. (Cf. art. "Bible Societies," Encyc. Brit., 9th ed. vol. iii. p. 649.)

The need for Christian exertion among sailors was urgent. Destitute, as a class, of any access to the Bible, to preaching, or to any service, instruction, or consolations of the church, their lives passed, for the most part, without access to the gospel of Christ. "It would be difficult," says a well-informed writer, "to conceive of a deeper moral night than that which for centuries had settled upon the sea."

Early efforts made in England to furnish sailors with the gospel, however, met with serious opposition from Christian people, as well as from unchristian officers in the royal navy. So late as 1828 the king was petitioned to abrogate an order, then recently issued by the lord high admiral, prohibiting the free circulation of tracts in the navy. But in 1814 the pioneers of the movement for this end, Rev. GEORGE CHARLES SMITH, a dissenting clergyman, once a sailor, and ZEBULON ROGERS, a shoemaker of the Methodist persuasion, established prayer-meetings for seamen, on the Thames, at London; the first being held on the brig "Friendship," June 22 of that year, by Mr. Rogers. These were multiplied and sustained upon the shipping in the river. March 23, 1817, the first bethel flag was unfurled on the "Zephyr," Capt. Hindulph of South Shields, Eng.

The Port of London Society was organized March 18, 1818, to provide for the continuous preaching of the gospel to seamen in London, upon a floating chapel (ship) of three hundred tons' burden, and Rev. Mr. Smith ministered upon it with success during the ensuing year. Nov. 12, 1819, The Bethel Union Society was formed at London, which, in addition to the maintenance of religious meetings on the Thames, established correspondence with local societies that had been started by Mr. Smith's exertions in various parts of the kingdom. These two societies were subsequently united to form what is now known as The British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

The Sailor's Magazine (London) merged, after publication for seven years by Rev. Mr. Smith, into the New Sailor's Magazine, also issued by him, was established in 1826. The monthly magazine now issued by The British and Foreign Sailors' Society is Chart and Compass (pp. 32), established in January, 1879. It has presented the facts, and discussed questions connected with the evangelization of seamen, with fervency and force. Up to April, 1883, Chart and Compass had circulated 128,000 copies.

In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Riverman's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore, Rev. Mr. Smith becoming pastor. This church was for years the centre of an extensive system of labor, including a sabbath school, bethel prayer-meetings, tract and book distribution, magazine publishing, and open-air preaching to seamen on the wharves. Rev. Mr. Smith died at Penzance, Cornwall, Eng., in January, 1863.

Existing seamen's missionary societies in the empire of Great Britain, distinct from local organizations which limit the prosecution of work to their own ports, are, (1) The British and Foreign Sailors' Society at Sailor's Institute, Shadwell, London, L., with receipts from April 1, 1881, to April 1, 1882, of £10,123 18s. 8d., and expenditures for the same period of £9,510 3s. 7d., which in its sixty-fifth annual report (1882-83) names the ports of Rotterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, Genoa, Naples, and Malta, outside England, and London, Milford-Haven, Falmouth, and Barrow-in-Furness (English), as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen. (2) The London Missions to Seamen (Established English Church), whose operations are, for the most part, carried on afloat. Its chaplains are at twenty English and three foreign, its Scripture-readers at twenty-nine English and four foreign seaports. Local English societies for seamen are at Liverpool (formed in 1821), Glasgow, and other ports.

Evangelical Lutheran missions to seamen are prosecuted with vigor by societies with headquarters in the Scandinavian countries, whence come, in our day, the larger number of sailors for the world's mercantile marine. The Norwegian society — Föreningen til Evangeliskt Farkypelse för Skandinaviske Sjømand i fremmede Havne, or, in English, The Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Harbors — was organized at Bergen, Norway, Aug. 31, 1861, and now (1883) has stations at Leith, Scotland; North Shields, London, Cardiff, Eng.; at Antwerp, Belgium; Havre, France; Amsterdam, Holland; New York, U.S.A.; Quebec, Can.; and at Pensacola, Fla., U.S.A.

Mission-work for seamen is also carried on by this society at Montrose, Scotland. Its aggregate working force consists of eleven ordained pastors, with five or six assistant missionaries, morned, and the society owns churches at all its stations, and publishes a monthly paper, Bad og Helsen, now in its eighteenth year of issue. Receipts in 1881-82 were 103,855 kroner; expenditures, 58,297 kroner. The Danish seamen's mission society — Dansk Förening til Evangeliskt Farkypelse för Skandinaviske Sjømand i fremmede Havne, or, in English, The Danish Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Ports — has its stations at Hull and Grimsby, London, Newcastle, and Harthpool (Eng.), and at New-York City, U.S.A., with an aggregate of four ordained pastors. Three other ordained pastors perform some labor for sailors at Frederickstadt and Christianstadt (St. Croix, W.I.), and at St. Thomas and St. Jan, W.I. The same society supports a seamen's pastor at Madras, India; and at Brisbane, Australia, an ordained pastor gives a portion of his time to the interests of Scandinavian sailors. Its bi-monthly paper is Havnen, published at Copenhagen, Denmark. Receipts in 1882, 22,031 kroner; expenditures, 10,121 kroner.

The Swedish society for home and foreign missions — Fatherlandstiftelsen — has sustained missionary work for seamen since 1869, and has the following stations where such labor is performed by its agents, — Constantinople, Turkey; Alexandria, Egypt; Liverpool, Grimsby, and Gloucester, Eng.; Boston, Mass., U.S.A.; Marseilles, France; St. Ues, Portugal, — with five ordained pastors. The State Church in Sweden has three ordained pastors laboring for seamen, at London and Harthpool (Eng.), and at Kiel in Prussia. The Finland seamen's mission society, Föreningen för Beredande af Själward at Finska Sjöman i Utländska Hamnar, organized in 1880, has a station at London, Eng., with one ordained pastor in charge, and is about to establish another at Grimsby and Hull, Eng. The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod in America has a station for Scandinavian seamen, with one ordained pastor, at Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A. The synod for the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has a mission in Australia, with one ordained pastor. The total of stations occupied by the Scandinavian (Lutheran) societies is thirty-three, with twenty-nine ordained pastors and six morned pastors as laborers.

No organizations exist in North or South America, outside the United States, for the sole purpose of prosecuting religious labor among seamen. At Boston, Mass., the first society for this object was formed in May, 1812, but soon suspended operations. The first religious meeting on behalf of sailors in New-York City (N.Y.) is believed to have been held in the summer of 1816, at the corner of Front Street and Old Slip. The Marine Bible Society of New-York City was organized March 11, 1817, to furnish sailors with the Holy Scriptures. The Society for promoting the Gospel among Seamen in the Port of New York, commonly known as The New-York Port Society, a local organization, was formed June 5, 1818. This society laid the foundations of the first mariner's church ever erected, in Roosevelt Street, near the East River, which was dedicated June 4, 1820, Rev. WARD STAFFORD preacher and pastor. In 1823 The New-York Port Society set at work in that city the first missionary to seamen, Rev. HENRY CHASE. This society now sustains a church at Madison and Catharine Streets in New York, and a reading-room for sailors in the same edifice, employing in the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, nine missionaries. Receipts for 1882 were $11,667.01; expenditures, $10,682.07. The New-York Bethel Union, for the establishment and maintenance of religious meetings on vessels in the port (organized June 3, 1824), had but a brief existence.

The movements noted — that at Boston, Mass., issuing in the formation of the earliest society of its kind in the world — led to similar action for the performance of local work for seamen at Charleston, S.C. (1819), Philadelphia, Penn. (1819), Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La. (1823), at New Bedford, Mass. (1825), and elsewhere. In the latter year there were in the United States seventy bethel unions, thirty-three marine Bible societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. There had been many conversions to Christ among sailors, and their evangelization was recognized as among the most prominent and important of Christian enterprises.

Accordingly, after its formal establishment in the city of New York (Jan. 11, 1826), succeeded by a new organization in its board of trustees (May 5, 1828, from which time its birth is dated), The American Seamen's Friend Society (80 Wall Street, New York, N.Y.), unquestionably the most widely operative and efficient of existing missionary societies for seamen, came into being. Its first President was Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, then secretary of the United States navy; Rev. C. P. McILVINE, afterwards Protestant-Episcopal bishop of Ohio, was its Corresponding Secretary; and Rev. JOSHUA LEAVITT its General Agent. Article II. of its constitution provides:—

"The object of this society shall be to improve the social and moral condition of seamen by uniting the efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port boarding-houses of good character, savings-banks, register-offices, libraries, museums, reading-rooms, and schools, and also the ministrations of the gospel, and other religious blessings."

Its first foreign chaplain was Rev. DAVID ABEL, who reached his field of labor at Whampoa, the anchorage for ships trading at Canton, China, Feb. 16, 1830. In its fortieth year (1867-68) its laborers (chaplains and sailor missionaries) were stationed at twenty foreign, and thirteen domestic, seaports, as follows: at Caribou Island on the Labrador coast, N.A.; at St. John, N.B.; in Norway, at Christiansand, Kragero, and Porsgrund; in Denmark, at Copenhagen and Odense; in Sweden, at Gottenberg, Warberg and Wedige, Wernersberg, and Stockholm; in Belgium, at Antwerp; in France, at Havre and Marseilles; in the Hawaiian Islands, at Honolulu and Hilo; at the Chincha Islands in Peru, at Valparaiso and at Buenos Ayres, S.A.; and in the United States, at the following seaports: San Francisco, Cal., Norfolk and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., Boston and Gloucester, Mass., and at New York, N.Y. Its missionary work was prosecuted in 1882-83 on the Labrador coast of North America, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, at Hamburg in Germany, at Antwerp in Belgium, in France at Marseilles and Havre, at Genoa and Naples in Italy, at Yokohama in Japan, in the Sandwich and Madeira Islands, at Valparaiso, S.A., and, in the United States, at Portland, Ore., and on the waters of Puget Sound; also in the ports of Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, La., Pensacola, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Wilmington, N.C., Norfolk, Va., and at Boston, Mass., as well as in the cities and vicinities of New York, Jersey City (N.J.), and Brooklyn (N.Y.), including the United States Navy-Yard, numbering forty-two laborers at thirty-one seaports (eighteen foreign and thirteen domestic) supported in whole or in part by the society.

Its receipts in the first decade of its existence were, in round numbers, $91,000; in the second decade, $165,000; in the third, $229,000; in the fourth, $375,000; in the fifth, $655,000. Receipts for the year ending March 31, 1883, with small balance from previous year, $80,762.60; expenditures for same, $79,155.55 inclusive of an investment of a legacy for permanent fund.

The Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City of New York (Protestant-Episcopal), in its Thirty-Ninth Annual Report (1882-83), states that the society sustains, as heretofore, two chapels, three mission-houses, with reading and lecture rooms, oversight being in the hands of three clergymen, with the assistance of a colporteur at each station. Its total services for the year were 628; visits to reading-rooms, 5,622; seamen supplied with Bibles, 204, with Testaments, 613, with the Book of Common Prayer, 621. The bishop of the diocese is its president.

Besides the employment of chaplains, residents at seaports, and serving as Christian ministers, of Bible and tract distributors, Scripture-readers, colportors, and helpers, whose titles declare their functions, the missionary societies for seamen have usually wrought for their welfare by establishing, and in part sustaining (temporarily), Sailors' Homes in various ports. In them are resident missionaries, who, besides their services in religious meetings, devote portions of their time to spiritual and charitable visitation among sailors on shipboard and shore, at sailor boarding-houses, and in hospitals, and, in some cases, to such service for the families of seamen. The Wells Street Sailors' Home at London (Eng.) Docks was established by Mr. George Greene in 1830, was opened in 1835, enlarged in 1865. In one year it admitted 5,444 boarders, who, besides a home, had evening instruction, the use of a savings-bank, etc. The Liverpool (Eng.) Sailors' Homes were opened in 1844. The Sailors' Home at 190 Cherry Street, New York, is the property and is under the direction of the American Seamen's Friend Society. It was opened in 1842, reconstructed, refurnished, and re-opened in 1880, and is now unsurpassed by any sailors' home in the world. During the year 1882-83 it accommodated 2,003 boarders. The whole number of boarders since the Home was established is 102,713, and the amount saved by it to seamen and their relatives during the forty-one years since its establishment has been more than $1,500,000. The systematic supply of carefully selected libraries, to be loaned to vessels for use at sea, by their officers and crews, is now largely carried on by these organizations, especially by the American Seamen's Friend Society. Its shipments of such libraries from 1858-59 to March 31, 1883, were 7,764, and the re-shipments of the same, 8,100; the total shipments aggregating 15,864. The number of volumes was 419,120, accessible by original shipment to 301,425 seamen. Of the whole number sent out, 943 libraries with 33,948 volumes were placed upon United States naval vessels and in naval hospitals, and have been accessible to 107,995 men; 106 libraries were in 106 stations of the United States Life-saving Service, containing 3,816 volumes, accessible to 742 keepers and surfmen.

The Sailors' Magazine (32 pp., monthly), organ of the American Seamen's Friend Society, is now the eldest of the periodicals issued on behalf of seamen. It was established in September, 1828, is in its fifty-fifth volume; and of its issues for 1882-83, 81,000 copies were printed and distributed. In the same twelvemonth 18,000 copies of The Seaman's Friend (4 pp., annually), established in 1858, were issued by this society, for sailors; and 115,000 copies of the Life-Boat (4 pp., monthly) for the use of sabbath schools.

Varied help is habitually extended to shipwrecked and destitute sailors by all these organizations. The establishment of savings-banks for seamen has ordinarily been due to their influence. The Seamen's Savings-Bank in New-York City (78 Wall Street) went into operation May 11, 1829. Sailors' asylums, orphanages, and "Rests" (houses of entertainment conducted upon temperance principles) are open in many seaports as the fruit of their existence. Miss Agnes Weston, from her "Rest" at Devonport, Eng., was distributing, gratis, by voluntary contribution, in 1882, 15,000 monthly Blue Books (8 pp. temperance and religious tracts) in the English tongue; and these were regularly translated into Dutch and German for the navies of Holland and Germany.

It is impracticable to present detailed statistics as to results of Christian labor for seamen: the best general estimate fixes the number of Christianized sailors at not far from thirty thousand. But to say that during the last half-century these men have been gathered into the church of Christ by thousands, that as a class sailors are now manifestly being lifted out of the ignorance and degradation in which they lived at the opening of the nineteenth century, and to attribute these changes, realized and still progressing, to the exertions of these societies, is to speak with truthful moderation. The corporate and individual efforts of persons connected with them have often originated and made effective beneficent public legislation, in the interest of sailors, in Great Britain and in the United States. It is in place to add, that, with few exceptions, all seamen's missionary societies are administered upon a non-denominational basis.

SEARS, Barnas, distinguished as an educator: b. at Sandisfield, Mass., Nov. 19, 1802; d. at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., July 6, 1880. He was converted at the age of thirteen, joining the Baptist Church. Of independent spirit, he entered at fifteen on self-support, and at sixteen began teaching school. He was graduated from Brown University in 1825, and from Newton Theological Seminary in 1828. For a short time he was pastor of the First Baptist Church of Hartford, Conn. In 1829 he became professor of ancient languages in Hamilton (N.Y.) Literary and Theological Institution, now Madison University; and in this position he showed enthusiasm, learning, and power. He also served as pastor of the Baptist Church in Hamilton. In 1833 he went to Europe, spending two years in study in Halle, Leipzig, and Berlin, under Neander, Tholuck, and other great teachers of that period. He stands connected with an important chapter in Baptist history: for in 1831, in the Elbe at Hamburg, he baptized the Rev. J. G. Oncken and six others, forming the first German Baptist Church in communion with the Baptists of England and America. To avoid arrest and imprisonment, the baptism was by night; and from this beginning, through many and severe persecutions, the German-Baptist communion has increased, till it numbers more than a hundred and twenty churches with upwards of twenty-five thousand members. He returned to Hamilton in 1835, but in 1836 became professor of theology in Newton Theological Seminary, where he remained twelve years, being for the last nine years president of the institution. His teaching was broad, comprehensive, scriptural, incisive, suggestive, and apposite. For several years he was the editor of the Christian Review. Deeply interested in general education, he was appointed by Gov. Briggs a member of the Massachusetts Board of Education; and on the resignation of Horace Mann, in 1818, he was made secretary of the board, resigning his position at Newton. In this new service he continued seven years, his energy and enthusiasm, with his dignity, tact, and genial manner, giving him power and popularity with teachers and citizens. In 1855 he succeeded Dr. Wayland in the presidency of Brown University, which position he held for twelve years. In 1867 he was made general agent of the Peabody Educational Fund; and having removed his residence to Staunton, Va., he remained till his death in the successful discharge of the important duties of this position. He was revered and admired by his pupils, honored by his associates, and held in highest regard by all who in any way came into acquaintance with him. He received the degree of D.D. from Harvard in 1841, and that of LL.D. from Yale in 1862.

In addition to many review articles, reports, addresses, etc., he published a Life of Luther (1850), an edition of Regis's Thesaurus (1851), with several translations, compilations, etc. NORMAN FOX.

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, D.D., b. at Sandisfield, Berkshire County, Mass., 1810; d. at Weston, Mass., Jan. 11, 1876; graduated at Union College, 1831, and at Cambridge Divinity School, 1837; was pastor at Wayland, Mass., 1838-40 and 1847-65, at Lancaster, Mass., 1840-47, and at Weston, 1865-76. Though connected with the Unitarian body, he held Swedenborgian opinions, and often professed his belief in the absolute divinity of our Lord. He wrote largely for the Monthly Religious Magazine, and with Rufus Ellis edited it, 1859-71. He published Regeneration (1851), Pictures of the Olden Time (1857), Alphazusa, or Parables of Immortality (1858), The Fourth Gospel the Heart of Christ (1872), and Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life (1875). His writings are noted for their great spiritual power and beauty; and his two exquisite Christmas-hymns, "Calm on the listening ear of night," and "It came upon the midnight clear" (1831 and 1819 or 1850), are universally known. F. M. BURD.

SEBALDUS, a Roman-Catholic saint; d., according to some, in 801, to others, in 901 or even later. The son of a Danish king or a peasant, he began his studies in Paris at fifteen. He married the daughter of King Dagobert, but the day after the ceremony was released from his marriage-vow; spent ten years in the practice of an ascetic life, and was commissioned by Gregory II. as a preacher of the gospel in Germany. He is said to have founded many churches in Bavaria, and at last to have settled down at Nurnberg, where the St. Sebaldus Church still preserves his memory. The city has chosen him as its patron, and celebrates his memory Aug. 19. On account of the miracles performed by him alive and by his relics, he was canonized by Martin V., 1425. NEUDECKER.

SEBASTIAN, a Catholic saint, and protecting patron against the plague; was b. in the third century, in Narbonne, and educated at Milan. Eager to render help to the persecuted Christians under Diocletian, he entered the ranks of the army as a secret Christian, and was appointed by Diocletian to a high position. When it became known that he was a Christian, he was condemned to death, and pierced with many arrows. Left for dead, a Christian, Irene, who was about to bury him, found him alive. He got well, but was again condemned, and flogged to death. A church was built to his memory at Rome, and was followed by the discontinuance of the plague. His day in the Roman calendar is Jan. 20; in the Greek, Dec. 18. Baronius, Tillemont, and others lay particular emphasis on the Acta S. Sebastiani. NEUDECKER.

SECKENDORF, Veit Ludwig von, b. Dec. 20, 1626, at Herzog-aurach, near Erlangen; d. at Halle, Dec. 18, 1692. He was educated at the court of Gotha; studied law and philosophy at Strassburg, and held high positions in the service, first, of Duke Ernst of Gotha, then of Maurice of Saxony, and finally of the elector of Brandenburg. His Compendium historiarum ecclesiasticarum (Gotha, 1660-64, 2 vols.) was translated into German, and often reprinted. His principal work, however, is his De Lutherismo (Leipzig, 1688), written against Maimbourg's Histoire de Lutheranisme. His life was written by SCHREIBER, Leipzig, 1737. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SECKER, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Sibthorpe, Nottinghamshire, 1693; d. in London, Aug. 3, 1768. He was graduated M.D. at Leyden, 1721, but then entered Exeter College, Oxford; was ordained priest, 1723, rector of Houghton-le-Spring, 1721, of St. James's, London, 1733; appointed chaplain to the king, 1732; consecrated bishop of Bristol, Jan. 19, 1735; transferred to Oxford, May, 1737, to which see was added the deanery of St. Paul's, 1750; and finally he was enthroned archbishop of Canterbury, April 21, 1758. He was a popular preacher and a faithful bishop. See Bishop PORTEUS' Review of his life, prefixed to his edition of his Works, London, 1770, 12 vols.

SECULAR CLERGY. See CLERGY, p. 499.

SECULARIZATION means the conversion of an ecclesiastical institution and its property into a secular institution with a secular purpose, or the transformation of a State organization with an ecclesiastical head into a State organization with a secular head, or the legal absolution from ecclesiastical vows. Secularizations of the first kind have occurred from time to time,—in the last days of the reign of the Merovingian dynasty in France, under Henry II. in Germany, during the Reformation in various countries, etc.,—though always under the protest of the Church. The first instance of a secularization of the second kind was probably the transference of the Duchy of Prussia from the possession of the Knights of the Teutonic Order to the dominion of a prince of the German Empire (1525). But on a still greater scale secularization of this kind was carried on during the Napoleonic wars, especially by the Peace of Campo Formio (1797) and that of Luneville (1801). The word was first used by the French delegates during the negotiations preceding the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Secularization of the third kind is a Papal prerogative.

SECUNDUS, a gnostic of the school of Valentinus; differed (by teaching, besides the thirty aons, a double tetrad,—one to the right, and one to the left; one of light, and one of darkness) so materially from his master, that he formed a school of his own,—the Secundians. But the notices of him which have come down to us through Irenaeus (Hær., i. 11. 2), Hippolytus (Ref., vi. 38), Tertullian (Præscript., 49), Epiphanius (Hær., 32), and others, do not enable us to form any complete idea of his system. W. MÖLLER.

SEDES VACANS, a term of canon law,—properly speaking applicable only to the papal or to an episcopal see, because sedes (θρόνος) originally was used only in connection with the predicate apostolica, though its use has gradually been extended to abbots and other high dignities of church,—denotes the interval between the decease or deposition on translation or resignation of the occupant to the full legal instalment of his successor. During such an interval the administration of an episcopal diocese was originally confided to the presbytery, afterwards to an intercessor, interventor, or visitor, and finally to the cathedral chapter. If the vacancy is not absolute, but only partial, as, for instance, on account of the sickness of the occupant, the term sedes impedita (hindered) is applied, and a coadjutor is appointed. H. F. JACOBSON.

SEDGWICK, Daniel, the father of English hymnology; b. in London, 1813; d. there March 10, 1879; was originally a shoemaker, of humble birth and limited education. Being fond of hymns, he bought the old books containing them one by one, and about 1840 began the systematic collection and study of texts and editions. He gradually acquired a unique library, and a knowledge of the subject long unrivalled. The popularity of Sir R. Palmer's (now Lord Selborne) Book of Praise, 1865, and the care Mr. Sedgwick had bestowed in making it a model of accuracy in texts, dates, and ascriptions of authorship, established his reputation; and thenceforth the compilers of nearly every prominent English hymnal, of whatever creed or connection, required his help. His shop in Sun Street, Bishopsgate, was the chief source of hymnologic information for England and America. He published from 1859 to 1865, and usually at pecuniary loss, the only collection of Ryland's hymns, and the only reliable one of Toplady's, besides reprints of Mason and Shepherd's, Steele, W. Williams, Seagrave, Grigg, and several more. His six catalogues, and Comprehensive Index of names and authors, 1863, are valuable for reference. F. M. BIRD.

SEDGWICK, Obadiah, English Presbyterian; b. in parish of St. Peter, Marlborough, Wiltshire, 1600; d. at Marlborough, January, 1657. He was graduated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; entered holy orders; was chaplain to Sir Horatio Vere, baron of Tilbury; returned to Oxford, where in 1629 he became "reader of the sentences." Soon after, he began to preach at St. Mildred's, Breadstreet, London, and until 1655, with the exception of two years (1639-41) when he was at Coggeshall, Essex, he preached in London, — in Breadstreet until 1646, and afterwards at St. Paul's, Covent Garden. His ministry was popular and fruitful. He zealously defended the Presbyterian cause. He was one of the licensers of the press, and a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. In 1653 he was appointed by Parliament one of the "tryers" (examiners of the qualifications of ministers), and in 1651 assistant to the commissioners of London for the ejection of "scandalous and ignorant" ministers and schoolmasters. He was succeeded in his parish by his son-in-law, Thomas Manton. Besides numerous printed sermons (enumerated by Wood), he was the author of The doubting Christian resolved, London, 1653; The humbled sinner resolved what he should do to be saved, 1656; The Shepherd of Israel, 1658 (an exposition of the Twenty-third Psalm); Synopsis of Christianity; Anatomy of secret sins, 1660; The bowels of tender mercy sealed in the everlasting covenant, 1661; A short catechism. See Wood: Ath. Oxon., ed. Bliss, iii. 441-444.

SEDULIUS, Cajus Cælius, or Cæcilius, a Christian poet and priest of the fifth century; lived during the reign of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. Of his life nothing is known with certainty; but his Carmina paschale, written in hexameters, was printed in 1473, and again in 1499 and 1502. There are also later editions by Gallandi, 1773, and Arevalo, 1791.

SEDULIUS SCOTUS, or SEDULIUS JUNIOR, was a Christian author of the eighth century, who wrote Collectanea in omnes epistolas S. Pauli, found in Bibl. Mar. Lugd., vi.; commentaries on the first three Gospels, edited by A. Mai, in Script. vet. Coll. nova, ix.; and a politico-religious treatise, De rectioribus Christianis, edited by A. Mai, in Sprell. Romanum.

SEEING GOD. It belongs to the deepest endeavors of all religions to make sure of the nearness of the Deity; hence those places are especially sacred where he is said to reveal himself, and the persons are holy who are found worthy of that nearness, or have that higher faculty to bring others in a near relationship to the Deity. The highest degree of that desire is to see the Deity in essential reality. In the Bible also we find such a desire expressed, which is one of the most deeply rooted instincts of the religious man. This instinct is satisfied (even the sensual part of man may partake of it), but the mode of seeing changes itself in the same degree as the manner in which God appears. In this respect we find, especially in the Old Testament, the prevalence of popular views. Thus the main idea is this, that the common man (i.e., one whom no special holiness protects) must die when he sees God in the form peculiar to him. This form shows itself at first in the fiery appearances in heaven. Lot's wife dies, because she curiously sees the fiery judgment of Jehovah (Gen. xix. 26). Gideon and Manoah expect death, because they have seen the angel of the Lord in the fire (Judg. vi. 23, xiii. 22). For the same reason the people removed from Mount Sinai when they saw God in the cloud, smoke, and lightning (Exod. xx. 18, 19; Deut. xvi. 16). The explanation of that incapacity which makes it impossible for man to behold God when he shows himself in his power, lies in the fact of man's frail strength: he is flesh (Deut. v. 26). But the deeper knowledge of the divine will overcomes this hinderance. God will give blessing and grace. His appearances become by degrees the sign of this heavenly grace. The transition is made in the examples of Gideon, Manoah, and Hagar; since that God who promises blessing and salvation cannot let the guiltless die. Yea, it is one of the strongest proofs of the grace of God in the theocratic covenant, that Jehovah himself leads his people in the pillar of fire and smoke: it is a clear proof of Israel's religious superiority above all other nations, that it saw God in his peculiar glory, without dying (Deut. iv. 33, v. 24), or, as it is so emphatically expressed by Moses, "The Lord talked with you face to face" (Deut. v. 4). But the behavior of the people caused a limitation in the seeing of God. The stranger, or unclean, who approached the holy place, must die, as well as the Israelite who entered the sanctuary. Only God's elected, like those seventy elders who saw God (Exod. xxiv. 9, 10), may see God. But the circle becomes smaller still: only the patriarch Israel has seen God face to face (Gen. xxxii. 30); only Moses, the mediator and man of God, speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiii. 11). And, because none else has experienced such fullness of grace, Moses is also the highest prophet. Whereas others see God in visions and dreams, he sees God from face to face, and sees the similitude of the Lord (Num. xii. 8). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye, — a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxii. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxxiii. 12-xxiv. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxxiii. 20); in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses hears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mercy and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible. And thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xlii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xix. 26), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience his helpful grace visibly, not in the other life, but in this life; thus, also, Ezekiel (Isa. xxxviii. 11). The highest fulfillment of all religious wishes involves Ps. xi. 7: "His countenance doth behold the upright." Especially interesting and much disputed is the passage Ps. xvii. 15: "I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Here, as in Num. xii. 8, the similitude of God appears as the object of the seeing of God, but only in so far as the strict carrying-out of the image makes it necessary, because it concerns here the real communion with the highest source of blessing. The awakening has no reference to the sleep of death, but is the symbol of the grace of God, which is new every morning. Among the prophets the seeing of God is already so much divested of its externality, that in a free manner it is used to express prophetic vision. In Ps. xviii. the theophany is the mediation for the singer's salvation; but in Isa. vi., Ezek. i. 26, Dan. vii. 9, it connects itself with the illumination of the prophet and his call. The image of the sovereign occupies the foreground; but in Isaiah and Ezekiel it is surrounded by the original appearances of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah we also perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is "a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips." Human unworthiness is here reduced, not to the fact that man is flesh, but to the idea of uncleanness, which, however, by that addition, receives another signification. The lips mediate the word which comes out of the heart: hence it refers to the sins of the heart and to sins committed by word; they make the presence of Jehovah sitting on his throne, so long intolerable to men, until holy fire has purged him.

By combining this idea with Ps. xi. 7 we approach the word of Christ, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. v. 8); with this the hope of the fulfilment of the highest religious desire, the deepest knowledge of God with the richest enjoyment of grace and blessedness, is given to them, only these goods receive a fuller and more particular meaning in the kingdom of Christ. With this corresponds what John regarded as the highest Christian goal: "For we shall see him as he is" (1 John iii. 2), for only like perceives like (1 Cor. ii. 14). Therefore, also, 1 John iv. 12, 20 makes the real seeing of God impossible: it is a seeing mediated through love; the seeing refers to the Son whom God hath sent. In him we see the Father (John xiv. 9), because in him grace and glory have been personified (John i. 18). Yea, the Son himself is on the Father's bosom; he alone has seen the Father (John vi. 46); what the Father does, he does also; the Father himself shows him the works which he should do. But that seeing of God in the old sense is not predicated even of the only-begotten Son, since the entire sphere of this conception is taken up into the higher spiritual realm. With this also correspond the familiar expressions concerning the invisibility of God (1 Tim. vi. 16; Rom. i. 20).

SEGNERI, Paolo, Italian Jesuit; b. at Nettuno in the Campagna di Roma, March 21, 1624; d. at Rome, Dec. 6, 1694. He entered the Society of Jesus in his thirteenth (1638), was ordained priest in his twenty-ninth year; and from then until 1665 he taught in a Jesuit school at Pestoia. From 1665 to 1692 he spent half the year in retirement, and the rest in travelling as a missionary throughout Northern Italy. He became the "foremost preacher among the Jesuits in Italy;" and in power over the multitudes who thronged about him, and who fairly worshipped him, he was like Savonarola. He has been styled the "restorer of Italian eloquence." His sermons were modelled upon Chrysostom's, but without servility. They are, however, frequently marred by trivial remarks and stories. When the Jesuits at Rome perceived that Quietism (see art. MOLINOS) was slowly undermining Romanism, and particularly Jesuitism, they sent him "a bundle of Quietistic books with directions to prepare an antidote to them." So in 1680 he published at Florence a small volume with the title, Concordia tra la fatica e la Quietà ("harmony between effort and Quiet"), in which, without naming Molinos, or depreciating the contemplative life, he endeavored to show that the successful prosecution of Quietism was possible only to a few. "He insists that the state of contemplation can never be a fixed or permanent state, and objects therefore to closing the middle way;" i.e., now meditation, now contemplation. His book raised, however, a storm of opposition from the then powerful Quietists, and was put into the Index. He prudently remained away from Rome. In 1692 Pope Innocent XII. called him to Rome as his preacher-in-ordinary, and theologian of the penitentiary.

SEIR, or LAND OF SEIR (Gen. xxxiii. 3), also MOUNT SEIR (Gen. xxxvi. 8), is the name of the mountain ridge extending along the west side of the valley of the Arabah, from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf. The southern part of this range now bears the appellation esh-Sherah. The height of the ridge is from between three thousand and four thousand feet, and the length from the north towards the south about twenty miles, and the breadth from three to four miles. One of the highest points of the eastern range is Hor, with Aaron's tomb (Num. xxxiii. 38). Wadis break frequently through these mountains, and water fertile valleys, especially in the north-eastern part. The western part, bordering on the Arabah, is rather a desert. Mount Seir was originally inhabited by the Horites, or Trogolodites, who were dispossessed, and apparently annihilated, by the posterity of Esau, who "dwelt in their stead" (Deut. ii. 12). Though the country was afterwards called Edom, yet the older name, Seir, did not pass away (1 Chron. iv. 42; 2 Chron. xx. 10; Ezek. xxxv.). In the post-exile period the country was taken by the Nabatheans, who again were subdued by the Mohammedans in the year 629 A.D. Now the country is inhabited by the Bedawin. In the fertile valleys, peasants, Fellahin, cultivate the land, and sell their produce to the pilgrims. The pilgrimage route from Damascus to Mecca runs on the eastern border of the country. LEYRER.

SE'LA, or SE'LAH (rock: so in Greek form, Petra, "rock"), a city of Edom, literally hewn out of the rock, filling a valley three-quarters of a mile long, and two hundred and fifty to five hundred yards wide. It is now entirely deserted, but its ruins amply attest its former grandeur. It is situated halfway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, in a deep cleft of the Mount-Seir range, near the foot of Mount Hor. It is approached through a narrow defile on the east, a mile and a half long, called the Sik ("cleft") of Wadi Mûsa, because the Arabs believe it was made by Moses' rod when he brought the stream through into the valley beyond (Num. xx. 8). The rock of red sandstone towers to a height of from one hundred to three hundred feet above the traveller's head as he rides along upon his camel, and in places the way is so narrow that he can almost touch the sides on either hand. Once the way was paved, and bits of the pavement can be seen. Abruptly the traveller comes upon the so-called Khaznet Fir'aun ("treasury of Pharaoh"), really a temple cut from the living rock, with a façade eighty-five feet high, beautifully sculptured, and in remarkable preservation. Two hundred yards farther along the valley, which widens considerably at this point, is the amphitheatre, also entirely from the rock, thirty-nine yards in diameter, and with thirty-three tiers of seats, accommodating from three thousand to four thousand spectators. Farther on there are curious tombs, some very elaborate, other temples, chief of which is the Kasr Fir'aun ("palace of Pharaoh"), and a triumphal arch. But upon the city rests the curse of God (Jer. xlix. 16-18), and the place is desolate.

Selah is only twice directly mentioned in the Bible, — in 2 Kings xiv. 7, as captured by Amaziah, and called Joktheel ("subdued of God"), and in Isa. xvi. 1: "Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land from Sela to the wilderness, unto the mount of the daughter of Zion;" although in several other passages the word "rock" with more or less probability referred to it (Judg. i. 36; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12; Isa. xlii. 11; Jer. xlix. 16-18; Obad. 3). The first wife of Herod Antipas, whom he divorced to marry Herodias (Luke iii. 19), was the daughter of Aretas, king of Petra. In King Amaziah's day, Selah was the capital of Edom; but, after his capture and destruction of it, the headship passed to Bozrah. In this way its striking omission in the Bible is accounted for. But in the fourth century B.C. the Nabatheans pushed their way eastwards, occupied the Arabah, and made Selah, under its Greek form Petra, their capital. The city rose into prominence, being upon the high-road between Arabia and Syria. The Seleucids made vain attempts to take it. Pompey captured the whole region called by Greek writers Arabia Petraea; i.e., Arabia whose capital is Petra. In Petra, Hyrcanus II. and his son Herod, afterwards Herod the Great, found a hiding-place (Joseph. Antiquities, XIV. 1, 4; War, I. 6, 2; 13, 8). In the first Christian centuries Petra was the capital of a Roman province, and it is from this period that the ruins date. It became an episcopal see, and its bishops are mentioned as late as A.D. 536. But it apparently was destroyed by some desert horde shortly after this date; for it sank completely out of notice until Setzen, in 1807, visited it, and gave the world the wondrous tale. Burckhardt followed him in 1812; Irby and Mangles, in 1818. It is now frequently visited. See the works of the travellers mentioned; ROBINSON: Researches, ii. 512; PALMER: Desert of the Exodus, pp. 366 sqq.; RIDGWAY: The Lord's Land, pp. 139 sqq.; and the guide-books of MURRAY (Porter) and BAKER (Socin).

SELAH, a musical term which occurs seventy-four times in the Bible (seventy-one times in thirty-nine Psalms, and also in Hab. iii. 3, 9, 13), and has been variously interpreted. In the Targum upon the Psalms it is four times rendered "forever," so also Aquila; while in the Septuagint the word used is ἀειπαῖον, — itself ambiguous. The rabbins followed the Targum, and explained "Selah" by "forever." Modern scholars are much divided. Gesenius interprets it as denoting a pause in the song while the music of the Levites went on. Hengstenberg also renders it "pause," but refers it to the contents of the psalm, — pause to reflect upon what has been sung. Ewald, and, after him, Perowne, render it "strike up," — a direction to the musician to strike up in a louder strain. Others, again, refer the elevation, not to the music, but to the voice. Alexander thinks it is a pious ejaculation to express the writer's feelings, and to warn the readers to reflect. (See WRIGHT's art. in SMITH'S Dict. of the Bible.)

SELDEN, John, an erudite writer on law and Hebrew antiquities; was b. at Salvington, Sussex, Dec. 16, 1581; d. at White Friars, Nov. 30, 1651. At the age of fourteen he entered Hart College Oxford, where he took his degree in 1602 and entered Christ Church Inn, and in 1604 the Inner Temple for the study of law. He attained singular learning in this department, and published several scholarly works upon legal subjects, as Englands Epitomis and Jura Anglorum facies altera (both 1610). Another fruit of his earlier studies was the Analecton Anglo-Britannicum, relating to the history of England before the Norman Conquest, which was finished in 1606, but not published till nine years later. In 1617 he published his great work, De Diti Syris, which established his reputation on the Continent, and was republished at Leyden (with additions by Le Dieu and Hensius), 1627, and Leipzig, 1662, 1680. In 1618 appeared the History of Titles, which denied the divine right of the system, and called forth the wrath of the king, so that the author was obliged to revoke his positions. Selden sustained an intimate relation with the political movements for thirty years. In 1621 he was called by the House of Commons to give his opinion concerning the dispute between it and the Crown, and strongly advised the Commons to insist upon its proper rights. In consequence of this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1624 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1634 without surety. He succeeded in allaying the king's anger by his Mare clausum (1635); and ever after that he seemed to have refused to enter heartily into any measures against royalty, and voted against the majority which condemned the Earl of Stafford. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His funeral sermon was at his request preached by his old friend, Archbishop Usher.

Selden was a man of immense learning and a prolific author. A tablet at Oxford calls him the corymphaeus in antiquarian studies (antiquariorum corymphaeus). Two of his greatest works were written during the years of his imprisonment (1629-34). — De jure naturali et Gentium juxta disciplinam Hebræorum, in seven books, and De successione in Pontificatu Hebræorum. His last work was De synodis et prefectoris jurisdictione ceterum Hebræorum, in three books. Among Selden's other works were the Duella, or Single Combat (1610), Tells of Honor (1611), an elaborate account of king, duke, and other titles. His Table-Talk, which was published thirty-five years after his death, by Milward, who professes to have been his amanuensis for twenty years, is perhaps the best known of Selden's works outside of theological circles. The statement in Selden's will may be taken to indicate his faith. "With all humility of heart," he says, "and with true repentance of my manifold sins and offences, I commend my soul and self into the gracious protection and preservation of my Creator, Redeemer, and Saviour, from and through whom only, with fulness of assurance, I expect and hope for eternal bliss and happiness in the world to come." Lord Clarendon says, "Selden was of so stupendous learning in all kinds and in all languages (as may appear in his excellent and transcendent writings), that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant amongst books, and had never spent an hour but in reading and writing; yet his humanity, courtesy, and affability were such that he would have been thought to have been bred in courts. . . . In his conversation he was the most clear discourses, and had the best faculty of making hard things easy, and presenting them to the understanding of any man that hath been known." His motto was, "Liberty concerning all things" (περι παντων την ελευθεριαν).

A splendid edition of Selden's complete works, furnished with elaborate indexes, was issued by DAVID WILKINS, London, 1726, 3 vols. (the first two containing the Latin writings, the third, the English). For the biography of Selden, see the Life (in Latin) prefixed to this edition; and JOHN Aikin, D.D.: The Lives of John Selden, Esq., and Archbishop Usher, London, 1812.

SELEUCIA (with the surname ad Mare, "on the sea," 1 Macc. xi. 3), a city of Syria, stood on the Mediterranean shore, north of the mouth of the Orontes. It was built by Seleucus Nicator in 300 B.C., and was especially celebrated on account of its excellent harbor, from which Paul set out for Cyprus on his first missionary tour (Acts xiii. 4). There were in ancient days ten other cities of the name "Seleucia," of which, especially, Seleucia Kt-sion, between the Euphrates and the Tigris, at one time was a very flourishing place.

SELNECCER, Nicolaus, b. Dec. 6, 1530, at Hersbruck, near Nuremberg; d. at Hildesheim, May 21, 1592. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was successively court-preacher at Dresden, professor at Jena, pastor in Leipzig, and superintendent of Hildesheim, but suffered much from the Crypto-Calvinists on the one side, and the Flacians on the other. He was a very prolific writer; but only a few of his works have any interest now,—his Commentary on the Psalms (Nuremberg, 1564, 2 vols.), and his Christliche Psalmen (Leipzig, 1587). SELWYN, George Augustus, D.D., English prelate; b. at Richmond in 1809; d. at Lichfield, April 11, 1878. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge. While curate at Windsor in 1841, he was appointed first bishop of the Anglican Church in New Zealand. At his farewell sermon before leaving England, John Coleridge Patteson, then a youth of fourteen, was present. Besides attending to the spiritual wants of his colonial diocese, he extended his operations to the South Sea Islands, navigating his own vessel, the "Southern Cross," for this purpose. He brought youths from Melanesia to New Zealand, who, after receiving instruction, returned to enlighten their countrymen. In 1855 this branch of work was intrusted to Bishop Patteson. In 1857 he obtained the division of his diocese, and ten years later became bishop of Lichfield. His administration of this new and trying sphere, which comprised the so-called "Black Country," was very vigorous. His son has succeeded Bishop Patteson in Melanesia. See his Memoir by Rev. H. W. Tucker, London, 1879, 2 vols.

SEMI-ARIANS. This name occurs for the first time as the name of a party in the period when the decided Arianism of Aetius and Eunomius asserted itself, and such men as Cræcilius, Valens, and Eudoxius of Antioch, who were influential with Constantius, favored a modified form of Arianism. At this time men like Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Macedonius of Constantinople, arose, opposing Arianism by declaring the generation of the Son to be a distinct conception from creation, and affirming that the Son resembled the Father in his essence (ὁμοὺς κατ' οὐσίαν). In essential particulars this was the view which Eusebius of Cæsarea had represented at Nicea. The Logos is God of god, and Light of light, but at the same time only the brightness of the first light, the image of the first substance, and different from it. The Son was not absolutely eternal (ἀΐδιος ἄδιότος), for his existence presupposes the existence of the Father. In fact, the conception of Eusebius was a re-announcement of the subordination view of Origen. After the Council of Nicea this mediate view prevailed in the East, which refused to accept either Arianism or the Nicene definition. Attempts were made by this party to formulate the doctrine of the sonship of Christ in such a way as to unite all the parties. The statement of the synods of Antioch (340), Philippopolis, and the first synod of Sirmium (351), condemn, on the one hand, the Nicene definition as leading to Sabellianism, and, on the other hand, the Arian doctrine of the creation of the Son as unscriptural. According to the synod of Antioch, God the Father alone has absolute being, and the Son, though begotten before all time, was begotten by the free will of the Father, and not by virtue of necessity, and is subordinate to him. At the second synod of Sirmium, Eusebius and Valens sought — by the suppression of the words in dispute (οὐσία, ὑπόστασις, ὁμοούσιος), the definition that the Son is like the Father, and the statement that the manner of his conception is inexplicable — to put a stop to the controversy. Eudoxius at a synod in Antioch explained this decree in an Arian sense, but all the more positively did the Semi-Arian synod of Ancyra (358) oppose Eudoxius. Constantius wished to settle the dispute by summoning a general council. Dissuaded from this plan, the two synods of Ariminum in Italy, and Seleucia in Isauria, were held, in which the Orientals and Occidentals were kept apart. It was hoped both synods would agree to the so-called third Sirmian formula, which had been agreed to in 358 by Eusebius and Valens on the one hand, and Basil of Ancyra, and Georgius of Laodicea on the other, at the court at Sirmium. Both councils were ready to declare in favor of the Nicene formula, the Seleucian synod, however, excepting the word ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance). But they finally gave way to the court party, and accepted the Sirmian formula. The court influence understood how to render the Semi-Arians harmless, and Eudoxius was raised to the see of Constantinople. The Semi-Arians gradually approached the advocates of the Nicene doctrine; and Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Gregory of Nyssa, contributed very much towards the currency of the Nicene views. At the Second Council of Constantinople (381), the Nicene theology was adopted, and Semi-Arian as well as Arian views were condemned. See ARIANISM, MACEDONISM, etc. W. MÖLLER.

SEMINARIES, Theological, Continental, are divided into four classes: (1) The Roman Catholic, according to the plan of the Council of Trent, in which boys of twelve years are received, trained in theological and secular studies apart from all worldly influences, and remain until they are ordained priests; (2) The evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, which receive boys of fourteen years, train them until they are eighteen, then send them to the university of Tübingen for further theological study, whence they issue as assistant pastors; (3) Institutions which receive the candidates for the ministry after they have finished their theological studies at the universities, and train them in practical ministerial duties; (4) Institutions which give training in homiletics and catechetics.

I. Before the Council of Trent, the institutions of the first class were called "schools," or "colleges." The discipline was monastic. The principal was an abbot, or, in the case of schools directly under episcopal control, a "scholasticus," who was always a clergyman. The rise of the universities destroyed these schools; but the Jesuits restored them, and after Trent they were called "seminaries." Instruction is given in grammar, singing, the ecclesiastical calendar, the Scriptures, service-books, the homilies of the saints, the ceremonies of the sacraments, and other matters relating to the services. Mass must be daily heard, and confession and communion be monthly. Every bishop must have such a school attached to his cathedral or metropolitan church.

II. The first seminary in the Protestant sense was in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg. It was modelled upon the cloister idea. Next to these comes Loccum, in Hanover. In 1593 the entire cloister there went over to Protestantism, but retained its organization intact, except that it undertook the special work of educating ministers. In 1820 it was revived and enlarged. Its head is still called "abbot." In 1817 Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary in Wittenberg, to honor the Luther city, which had been deprived of its university. The Reformed seminary at Herborn replaced the old "Orange and Nassau high-school." In 1837 the seminary at Friedberg was founded. The Moravians have seminaries in Gnadenfeld and Nazareth (Pennsylvania, U.S.A.).

III. In Greece the future priests are instructed by deacons or other clergy, under the supervision of the bishops. In Russia most priests are the sons of priests: if the sons of a layman enter the service of the church, they generally become monks. The schools for the education of priests' sons are of three grades, — schools, seminaries, academies. In the lowest, the scholars enter at seven, and remain until twelve years old. In the latter years of their stay they are taught Latin and Greek; so that, even if they do not go to a seminary, they can serve as reader or chorister in village churches. There may be several such schools in a parish, but there can be only one seminary. The latter is under immediate episcopal direction. The principal is a monk, archimandrite, or abbot, or a bishopric. The professors are partly monks, and partly lay. Their number is great, for there are sometimes as many as twenty in one seminary; but the number of scholars is also great, since every priest has the right to send his sons thither; and, as there are not enough churches for the priests thus educated, many of the scholars go into other callings. SEMI-PELAGIANISM, a term invented by the schoolmen, denotes a view which was developed within the time of the Fathers, and which tries to follow a middle course between Augustine and Pelagius. In the West the powerful personality of Augustine, the vigorous proceedings of the African Church, the assent of the see of Rome, and the effective aid of imperial rescript, procured the victory for the views of Augustine; but in the East the Greek Church continued its course, unconcerned by what took place in the West, even after the condemnation of the Nestorians, and implicitly also of the Pelagians, by the synod of Ephesus. Soon, however, it became apparent, that, even in the West, there were many people who took offence at the rigorism of Augustine, and still more who believed that they were following him, though they had really no idea of the consequences which his doctrine involved.

The discrepancy became patent before Augustine died. His two pupils and friends, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Hilary, informed him by letters (Lug. Ep. 225 and 226) that the monks of Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth propositions which contradicted the doctrines of the Fathers and the church in general. In the letters the Massilian monks are described as holding, that by faith and baptism any one can be saved, if he only will; that the will to be saved is implanted in human nature by the Creator himself; that predestination either must presuppose a difference of human nature, or lead into fatalism, etc. It is evident that those monks simply wanted to find a middle way between the Augustinian doctrine of predestination and the Pelagian doctrine of the free will of man. At their head stood John Cassianus, a pupil of Chrysostom, and for some time an inmate of an Egyptian desert monastery, whose writings, glowing with monkish fervor, show marks of influence from the Greek theology. The report of Prosper and Hilary called forth the two treatises of Augustine, De prædicatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiæ; but they did not succeed in convincing the Massilian monks. Shortly after (430), Augustine died, and Prosper found himself the chief opponent of the Semi-Pelagian movement. He repaired to Rome, and induced Pope Celestine to address a letter to the bishops of Gaul (Mansi: Coll. Concil., iv. p. 151). The letter is unconditional in its defence of Augustine, and full of reproaches against those bishops of Gaul who introduced novelties, and put forward indiscriminate and useless questions. But it is strikingly silent about the real point at issue. Nor did Sixtus, the successor of Celestine, find it suitable to be more explicit on the matter. Meanwhile Prosper wrote his various books against the Semi-Pelagians (see the respective articles), and others came to his aid. The De exceptionibus gratiæ, generally, though hardly on sufficient grounds, ascribed to Leo the Great, and found among his works, is an attempt at reconciliation. The expressions are very much mitigated; but, as nothing of the principle has been given up, it exercised no influence. On the contrary, the Augustinian doctrine of predestination now began to be attacked, even with great harshness, by people who did not belong to the Semi-Pelagian camp; and its adherents, though never condemned by the church as a sect, were marked out by the Semi-Pelagians as prædestinati. Interesting in this respect is the Præ- destinatus sive prædestinatorum hæresis, first edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1613, and by him ascribed to the younger Arnobius. It consists of three books: the first contains a catalogue of heresies ending with that of the prædestinati; the second, a representation of that heresy; and the third, its refutation from a Semi-Pelagian point of view.

For some time the controversy seems to have been brought to rest, or to have been forgotten, on account of the great political disturbances under which Gaul suffered during the fifth century. In the latter half of the century, however, it once more comes to the foreground with Faustus, bishop of Reji (Riez), and the presbyter Lucidus. The latter was a passionate adherent of the doctrine of predestination, and, as friendly expostulations led to nothing, Faustus publicly attacked him, and invited him to a disputation in the presence of the assembled bishops. The disputation took place, probably, at the synod of Arles (475); and Lucidus declared himself defeated, and recanted. Shortly after, Faustus published his De gratia et humanæ mentis libero arbitrio, which was received with great applause; so that the whole of Gaul seemed to have been conquered by Semi-Pelagianism. In the beginning of the sixth century, however, a sudden change took place in the state of affairs. Those Scythian monks, who, during the reign of Justin I. and Justinian, preached theopaschitism in Constantinople, were naturally opponents of Pelagius. Having tried in vain to introduce themselves to Pope Hormisdas, they sent a confession of faith to the African bishops who lived in exile in Sardinia. It is found in Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, ix., and ends up with a condemnation, not only of Pelagius, but also of Faustus. Fulgentius of Ruspe, the most prominent of the African bishops, responded with his De incarnatione et gratia, in which he completely refuted Semi-Pelagianism, though without mentioning the name of Faustus. The case attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, and he asked Hormisdas to pronounce his opinion on it. The answer of the Pope (520) is very diplomatic (Mansi: Coll. Concil., viii.). It defends Augustine, it defends Faustus, it defends every thing; but it was very unceremoniously handled by Johannes Maxentius, the leader of the monks, in his Responsio ad epistolam Hormisdæ (Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, ix.), who demonstrated, that, if Augustine is right, Faustus must be wrong. The tide was now turning. Even in Gaul, Semi-Pelagianism found influential adversaries: an Avitus of Vienne, a Cæsarius of Arles, and the synod of Orange (transisio), actually condemned it (Mansi: Con. Coll., viii.). The decrees of the synod of Orange were afterwards confirmed, by Pope Boniface II. and the synod of Valence, and officially Semi-Pelagianism was denounced. This must not be understood, however, as if it had been really extinguished. By the decrees of the synod of Orange, the expressions of Augustine were accepted; but how far people were from really embracing his principles is shown by the controversies of Gottschalk, of the schoolmen and the monastic orders, of the reformers, of Arminius, of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, etc.

SEMITIC LANGUAGES. I. NAME. — Up to the latter part of the last century, before Sanskrit was known to Europe, or attention had been directed to the Central and Eastern Asiatic tongues, or those of Africa (except Coptic), the title "Oriental languages" signified only Hebrew and its sister dialects; these alone, with the exception of Coptic, had been the object of scientific study. Up to this time, all study of non-classical languages was connected with the Bible; and it is to biblical students that we owe what was done in Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, and the related tongues, for the preceding three hundred years. But when the linguistic circle began to widen, and attempts were made at classification, the need of special names for the different linguistic groups was felt; and, for the more general divisions, recourse was naturally had to the genealogies in the table of nations in Gen. x. The credit, if such it be, of having originated the name "Semitic" (from Noah's son Sem, or Shem) for the Hebrew group, is to be given either to Schlozer or to Eichhorn, — to which of the two is doubtful. The first known use of the term is in Schlozer's article on the Chabkians, in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 8, 161 (1781), and he seems to claim the honor of its invention; but a similar claim is made by Eichhorn himself, without mention of Schlozer, in his Allgemeine Bibliothek, 6, 772 (1791). Eichhorn, however, appears to have been accepted as the author of the name; he is so said to be by Adelung (Mithridates, I. 300; 1806), from whose manner of speaking of it we may infer that it had not then come into general use. In a short while, however, it was everywhere adopted, and is now the recognized name of this group of languages. In Germany and France, and to some extent at least in England (so Coleridge, Table-Talk, 1827), the form "Semitic" was employed (after Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, and Luther's "Sem," instead of Hebrew "Shem"); while some English and American writers prefer the form "Shemitic," after the more accurate transliteration of the Hebrew. Between the two there is little to choose. The shorter term, now the more common one, is preferable to the other, because it is shorter, and in so far as it is farther removed from genealogical misconception. The once popular but unscientific threefold division of all the languages of the world into Japhetic, Shemitic, and Hamitic, is now abandoned by scholars. "Shemitic" is misleading, in so far as it appears to restrict itself to the languages spoken by the peoples mentioned in the table of nations as descendants of Shem; while it in fact includes dialects, as the Phœnician and Philistine, which are assigned in the table to Ham. The form "Semitic" (in English, but not in German and French), as farther removed than "Shemitic" from "Shem," may, perhaps, be more easily treated as in itself meaningless, and made to accept such meaning as science may give it. On the other hand, as meaningless, it is felt by some to be objectionable; and other names, expressing a geographical, or ethnical, or linguistic differentia of the languages in question, have been sought, e.g., Western Asiatic, Arabian, Syro-Arabian; but none proposed have been definite and euphonic enough to gain general approbation, and it is likely that "Semitic" will retain its place for the present. If a new name is to be adopted, some such term as "Trilateral" would be the most appropriate; since triliterality of stems is the most striking characteristic of this family of languages, and is found in no other family.

II. TERRITORY. — In ancient times (c. B.C. 1000) the Semites occupied as their proper territory the south-western corner of Asia; their boundaries, generally stated, being, — on the east, the mountain range (modern Kurdish) running about forty miles east of the Tigris River, and the Persian Gulf; on the south, the Indian Ocean; on the west, the Red Sea, Egypt, the Mediterranean Sea, and Cilicia; and, on the north, the Taurus or the Masius Mountains. The north and east lines are uncertain, from the absence of full data in the early Assyrian records. Not long before the beginning of our era, Semitic emigrants from Southern Arabia crossed the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and occupied the part of Africa lying just south of Egypt, their territory being about that of the modern Abessinia; these were the Geez ("emigrants," "freemen"), or Semitic Ethiopians. The main Semitic region thus lay between the tenth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude and the forty-fourth and sixtieth degrees of east longitude, with an area of over a million square miles. Semitic colonies established themselves early in Egypt (Phœnicians in the Delta, and perhaps the Hyksos), and on the north coast of Africa (Carthage and other cities) and the south coast of France (Marseilles) and Spain, but probably not in Asia Minor or in Greece. In modern times, Syrian Semites are found in Kurdistan, as far east as the western shore of Lake Urmî (lat. 37° 33' N.; long. 45° 30' E.); but it is doubtful whether this region was Semitic before the beginning of our era. A large part of the Semitic territory was desert. Only those portions which skirt the banks of rivers and the shores of seas were occupied by settled populations; the desert was traversed by tribes of nomads, whose life was largely predatory. Semitic speech is interesting, not from the size of the territory and population it represents, but from the controlling influence it has exerted on human history through its religious ideas.

The original seat of the Semites is unknown. There must have been a primitive Semitic race and a primitive Semitic language, which existed before the historical Semite peoples and dialects had taken shape; but of this primitive race we can say no more than that it goes back to a remote antiquity; since of one of its daughters, the Babylonian people, there are traces in the fourth millennium B.C. It has been attempted to determine the habitat of the Semites, before they broke up into separate nations, from their traditions, and from the vocabulary of the primitive tongue made out by a comparison of the existing dialects; but no trustworthy result has been reached. The oldest accounts say nothing definite. In Gen. xi. 2, for example, we have the statement that the whole body of the descendants of Noah journeyed "eastward" (so עֲרָבָה is to be rendered), that is, toward the Tigris-Euphrates region; but we are not told from what point they came, nor is there here any thing of a separate Semitic people. Again: in the same chapter, the assembled human race is said to have been scattered from the city Babel, without, however, any indication of the points to which the descendants of Noah's three sons severally went. At most, we may see here a dim feeling that the Semites had once lived together in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; but this might be referred to the fact that the Hebrews knew that they themselves had come from that region to Canaan. No other Semitic people has, so far as we know, any ancient tradition on this point. The evidence from the primitive Semitic vocabulary is equally vague. Its terms for land, mountains, rivers, seas, metals, grains, fruits, and animals, do not allow us to fix on any particular spot in Western Asia as the locality where such terms must have originated. We are obliged, therefore, to reject the hypotheses which make the mountains of Armenia, or the lower Tigris-Euphrates valley, or the Arabian Desert, the cradle of the Semitic race, and to leave the question at present unsolved.

The Semitic territory was enclosed by that of great rival peoples, Indo-Europeans (Persians and Greeks) on the east and the west, and Egypt on the south. In ancient times, however, the language was very little affected by foreign influence, except at one point. According to the view now held by most Assyriologists, the Babylonian-Assyrians, conquering the non-Semitic Accadian-Sumerians, who preceded them as occupants of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, in adopting the civilization of the conquered, adopted a number of their words, some of which are found in Hebrew also, and in others of the dialects. Hebrew made a few loans in early times from the Egyptian, and at a later period, possibly from the Indian, and then from the Persian, Greek, and Latin; and the ecclesiastical Aramaic was naturally greatly affected by Greek and Latin. The loan-words are easily recognized, except those which come from the Accadian-Sumerian.

All the Semitic nationalities, except the Arabian and the Geez (Ethiopia), died out before the second century of our era. The Babylonian-Assyrian disappeared from history in the sixth century B.C., and their language survived only a few centuries. The Phœnicians lingered in Asia till the time of the Antonines, and their language in Africa (Carthage) till toward the fifth century of our era (mentioned by Augustine and Jerome). The Syrian Arameans lost their independence in the eighth century B.C., but continued to exist, and their dialect revived in the second century A.D. as a Christian language; and the Jewish Aramaic continued for some centuries (up to the eleventh century A.D.) to be the spoken and literary tongue of the Palestinian and Babylonian Jews. The Jewish people, broken up by the Romans in the first century A.D., and scattered over the world have carried Hebrew with them as a learned, artificial tongue. The Arabians did not appear as a nation till the sixth century. Geez proper died out about the sixth century A.D., remaining, however, as the ecclesiastical and learned language; and the nationality is still in existence.

III. DIVISIONS. — The various Semitic dialects closely resemble one another, there being, for example, between no two of them such dissimilarity as exists between Greek and Latin; but the family is divided into two well-defined groups and several sub-groups, the difference between which, in vocabulary and forms, is considerably greater than that between any two members of the same group or sub-group. The relations of the dialects may be seen from the following table, which is designed to include all Semitic forms of speech that can lay claim to linguistic individuality, except a few modern jargons mentioned below.

I. NORTH SEMITIC.

1. Eastern.
 - a. Babylonian.
 - b. Assyrian.
2. Northern.
 - Aramaic.
 - a. East Aramaic.
 - a. Syrian (Dialect of Edessa).
 - b. Mandæan.
 - γ. Nabathæan.
 - b. West Aramaic.
 - a. Samaritan.
 - β. Jewish Aramaic (Daniel, Ezra, Targums, Talmud).
 - γ. Palmyrene.
 - β. Egyptian Aramaic.
3. Western.
 - a. Phœnician.
 - Old Phœnician.
 - Late Phœnician (Punic).
 - b. Hebrew.
 - c. Moabitish and other Canaanitish dialects.

II. SOUTH SEMITIC.

1. Northern.
 - Arabic.
2. Southern.
 - a. Sabæan, or Himyaritic.
 - Mahri.
 - Hakili (Ebkili).
 - b. Geez, or Ethiopic.
 - a. Old Geez.
 - β. Tigre.
 - γ. Tigrîna.
 - δ. Amharic.
 - c. Harari.

Of these the following are now spoken: (1) Aramaic, by the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians in Upper Mesopotamia, near Mosul, thence eastward to the western shore of Lake Urmî, and northward in the Kurdish Mountains (Noldeke, Neusyr. Gram. Einleitung); and by the remnant of the Mandæans in Lower Mesopotamia (Noldeke, Mand. Gram. Einleitung). (2) Arabic is the only Semitic dialect that has now any real life. It is spoken in various sub-dialects, — by the Bedawin of the Arabian Desert; in Egypt, and, as ecclesiastical language, in Turkey; in the Magreb (north coast of Africa); in Syria; in Malta, where the vernacular is a strange mixture, with Arabic as its basis, but many Italian and other words; on the coast of Malabar (the Mapuli jargon). The Mosarabic, a Spanish-Arabic jargon formerly spoken in the south of Spain, became extinct in the last century. (3) Geez: the four dialects, Tigre, Tigrîna, Amharic, Harari, are still spoken in Abessinîa. (4) Hebrew is studied by the Jews as a sacred language, and by a few of them, chiefly the older orthodox bodies in Germany and Austria, is to some extent written and spoken. This spoken language contains a large admixture of modern European terms. The literary Hebrew of to-day occupies about the same position among the Jews as Latin among us.

Of languages which have been strongly affected by Semitic tongues may be mentioned the Iranian Huzvar-shi, or Pahlavi (the language of the Bundeshi), which is greatly Aramaized; the Iranian Persian, whose vocabulary is largely Arabic, and even its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turkish.

especially the literary and learned language of Constantinople, which in like manner, and for the same reason, has a large infusion of Arabic.

IV. CHARACTERISTICS. — These may be divided into formal (grammar), material (vocabulary), and stylistic (rhetoric and thought). (1) Grammar. The Semitic phonetic system has a marked individuality. It is probable that the original Semitic alphabet was nearly identical with that of the classical Arabic, containing six gutturals (Alef, Ha, Ha, Ha, Ayin, Gayin), five uvulars (Kaf, Ta, Za, Sad, Dad), two palatals (Kaf, Gam), two linguo-dentals (Fa, Dal), two labials (Pa, Ba), six liquids (Ra, Ya, Lam, Waw, and the nasals Min, Nun), three sibilants (Sin, Sin, Zayin), and perhaps six spirants (Kaf, Gam, Ta, Dal, Pa, Ba). No existing dialect has all these letters, but there are traces of most of them in all. Thus, comparison of Assyrian and Arabic makes it probable that the former contained all these h-sounds (ha, ha, ha), though only one of them (ha) is now found in it. Hebrew (Septuagint transliteration) seems to have possessed Gayin, as well as Ayin; the South Semitic group shows all the uvulars, and the Hebrew all the spirants. It may be, however, that the parent Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, and that the Southern group developed the former, and the Northern the latter. It is doubtful whether Hebrew Samek and Sin represent two different sounds. It is likely, also, that not all the sounds above mentioned are original, i.e., some of them may be merely modifications of earlier and simpler sounds; but we are concerned here only with the consonantal material possessed by the primitive Semitic tongue, and not with the material out of which its alphabet may have been formed. The Semitic alphabet is thus seen to be characterized by fullness of guttural, uvular, and spirant consonants. In the several dialects, the movement has been towards a diminution of the number of gutturals and uvulars; namely, by changing these into similar letters pronounced farther forward in the mouth. Assyrian, Galilean Jewish Aramaic, and Mandaean threw off the most of the gutturals; modern Arabic has diminished the number of its uvulars; and Geez, of its uvulars and gutturals. This is a tendency, observable in all languages, to bring forward the consonants, and thus facilitate their pronunciation. — The vowel material of the primitive Semitic was simple, consisting, probably, of the three vowels, a, i, u, with the corresponding long a, i, u. These have been variously modified in the different dialects. Assyrian has e; Aramaic, é, o; Hebrew, a, e, e, o, ô; modern Arabic, e, e, â (ax), o; Geez, e, e, o. — Morphologically, the Semitic languages belong to the class called inflecting, standing in this respect alongside of the Indo-European. Their most marked peculiarity is their trilateralism; most stems consist of three consonants, on which, by prefixes, affixes, and internal vowel-changes, all derived forms are made. The noun has gender (masculine and feminine), number, case. The verb has gender, number, person, but properly no distinction of tense (in the sense of time), instead of which there are two forms which denote respectively completeness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by prefixes and infixes. — The Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word "and;" there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; and there are no elaborate periods. The structure is commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking special peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature, — an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material differs greatly according to the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetic discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books, — no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded); from the Assyrians, somewhat more, — royal and commercial inscriptions, geographical, astronomical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phoenicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scanty in philosophical and artistic terms and in names of things pertaining to common life; the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. They multiply words for objects and acts which we do not care to particularize, and are deficient in terms for those which we wish to express with precision. (3) The above description of the vocabulary and syntax will serve to characterize the style and thought of the Semitic tongues. The highest artistic shape they have not, either in prose or in poetry. They do not readily lend themselves to philosophy proper or to art. But in the simple expression of emotion, and the condensation of practical wisdom into household words, they are not surpassed by the most highly developed Indo-European languages. In these respects the Bible has an acknowledged pre-eminence.

V. Literary Products. — It will be sufficient here to mention briefly the general characteristics of the literature of the Semitic languages; for more particular accounts see the articles on the different languages. Of the different forms of poetry, the Semites have produced only the lyric; such as the Old-Testament Psalms, the Syrian hymns, and the Arabian Kasidas. What has sometimes been described as Semitic epos and drama is either not Semitic (as the Assyrian Izubar epos, which was derived from a non-Semitic people; and the drama of the Jewish poet Ezekiel, which is an isolated imitation of the Greek), or not epos or drama (as the Book of Job, which is not a drama, but a religious argument carried on in the form of alternate speeches; and the Arabian romance of Antur, which is a string of loosely connected stories). The subjective character of the poetic thought is obvious: no action or phenomenon in outward nature or in human life is described for its own sake, but always as a part of the feeling of the writer. As poetry it takes high rank. The Hebrew lyrics are sonorous and rhythmical, the Arabian are ingenious and lively; the Syrian, however, are tame. The historical writing of the Semites has never attained a scientific or artistic form. It is either baldly annalistic (as parts of the Old Testament Book of Kings, the Assyrian royal inscriptions, and the Arabic histories), or, when it attempts more connected presentation of the facts, it is subjective and pragmatic, arranging the historical facts so as to point a moral, or support a theory. In one department, prophetic discourse, the Semitic literature is unrivalled: there is nothing in any other family of languages like the prophetic oratory of the Old Testament, or the declamation of the Kuran. In other departments, as fiction and philosophy, the Semites have never been original, but always imitators (Thousand and One Nights, the Arabian philosophy. The Persian Arabic is, of course, not to be considered here.)

VI. RELATIONS TO OTHER FAMILIES OF LANGUAGES. — So far as our present knowledge goes, it is doubtful whether the Semitic family is genetically connected with any other in the world. Various attempts have been made to show a relationship between it and its neighbors, especially the Indo-European and the Egyptian. In respect to the former, the attempt may be said to be wholly unsuccessful. The ease is somewhat different with the Egyptian, between whose personal pronouns and the Semitic there is a remarkable resemblance; though this isolated point of contact, considering the very great differences between the two families in other respects, gives an insecure basis for comparison. There is a similar resemblance between the structure of the Semitic verb and that of the Cushite group of languages (the Galla, Saho, and others, near Abyssinia), but nothing definite. At most, we may conjecture an original Semitic-Hamitic family, out of which these two have grown; but in that case their separation took place so long ago, and their paths since that time have been so different, and the traces of kinship have been so far obliterated, that it is hard to see how any valuable results can be drawn from a comparison between them. One main obstacle in the comparison of Semitic words with others is the triliteralism of stems of the former; and it has therefore been attempted to reduce these to bilaterals, but hitherto with indifferent success. It need not be denied that this problem may hereafter be solved, and comparisons instituted between Semitic and other families, that may be of service to all.

SEMLER, Johann Salomo, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible; was b. at Saalfeld, Dec. 18, 1725; and d. at Halle, March 4, 1791. Brought up in a pietistic circle, he entered the university of Halle, 1743, and was much influenced by the lectures of Baumgarten. He devoured a large mass of books, and mentions only one original idea of that period. "Already at that time I had some intimations of the difference between theology and religion." In 1750 he became editor of the local newspaper of Saalfeld, 1751, professor of history at Altdorf, and six months later professor of theology at Halle, becoming Baumgarten's successor in 1757. He asserted the right to freedom of thought and investigation, and drew down upon himself the keenest criticism from orthodox circles. The Nova bibliotheca ecclesiastica called him an "impious man, and worse than the Jews" (homo impius et Judæis pejor). He was the principal professor at Halle, and his reputation among the students increased in proportion to the attacks from outside. This feeling changed, however, to some extent, in 1779, when his Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten exposed him to the charge of being double-tongued. During the last ten years of his life he spent much time in the laboratory, and became an advocate of alchemy. His interest in the mysterious had increased; and the miraculous cures of Gassner, and the miraculous faith of Lavater were the occasion for him to appear in the Berlin Monatsschrift (1787) as an advocate of the possibility of miracles. Semler introduced new views upon the canon. The opinion which had prevailed up to that time was, that the books of the Bible constituted one "homogeneous whole," all parts of which are equally inspired. To refute this opinion is the purpose of the Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch d. Kanons, 1771-75, 1 vols. He tried to prove that the books of the canon were brought together by accidental considerations, and not according to any fixed and well defined plan. He also showed that the text had many variations. The Scriptures were not even designed to be a norm of faith for all men. Was not the Old Testament written for the Jews? Did not Matthew write for Jews outside of Palestine? etc. Paul alone taught that Christianity was the universal religion, and the catholic epistles were intended to harmonize the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity. Here was the germ of the fruitful principle of the later Tübingen critics. Semler is never done stating the thought that Christ and the apostles accommodated themselves in their language to the popular notions of their day and the ideas of the Old Testament. In his commentaries on Romans, John's Gospel, the Epistles to the Corinthians, etc., he attempts to found his exposition upon the Jewish notions of that day. Of course, those things in which the New-Testament writers accommodated themselves to the opinions of their day are not to be believed by us. Nevertheless, Semler, with all his faults, is the author of the present method, in explaining a biblical author, of taking into consideration his purpose in writing and the historical environment. He reduced the difference between Christianity and natural religion to a minimum, but his Christian consciousness always insisted upon this difference. He sang Christian hymns, prayed with his wife, and they pledged one another to follow God only, and his commandments. "No one knows," he said, "what I feel when I think of God's goodness to me." In the department of church history Semler did not do as much as in that of biblical criticism. But he became the father of the history of Christian doctrine by his restless scepticism, which led to the minute investigation and clearing-up of many points. On the history of the first Christian centuries he published Selecta capita hist. eccles., Commentarii hist. de antiquo christianorum statu, etc. He issued in all a hundred and seventy-one publications, only two of which reached a second edition. Baur, after acknowledging the value of Semler's investigations, complains that he had no power of grouping or elaborating his theories. His work consisted only in a variety of disconnected results and truths. But, as Reuss says, it belonged to Semler to speak the magic word which emancipated theology from the fetters of tradition. Though piously inclined, he gave the traditional views a deadly wound. But he was neither the head of a school nor the prophet of the future. See SEMLER: Autobiography, 1781; EICHMORR: Leben Semler's, in his Bibliothek, v.; H. SCHMID: D. Theologie Semlers, 1858; THOLUCK: Vermischte Schriften, ii. 39. THOLUCK.

SENECA, LUCIUS ANNÆUS, a distinguished philosopher and author of the first century of our era; [the son of a rhetorician; was b. in Corduba, Spain, about 5 B.C.; d. by suicide 65 A.D. Young Seneca was trained in his father's art, but subsequently forsook rhetoric for philosophy. After travelling in Greece, he began to practise as an orator at Rome, and achieved forensic success. On a charge of adulterous connection with Julia, daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he lived for eight years, composing the De consolatione ad Helviam liber and De consolatione ad Polybium liber. On the marriage of Agrippina to Claudius, he was recalled, and made tutor of the future emperor, Nero. During his incumbrance he amassed great wealth, which became the occasion of his ruin. Looked upon with suspicion by Nero, he retired from the court; and, being accused with having had a share in the conspiracy of Piso, he received an order from the emperor to commit suicide. He at once obeyed the order by opening his veins, and bleeding to death in a hot bath].

Seneca's relation to Christianity has excited much interest, and awakened much discussion. Jerome (De script. eccl., 12) speaks of letters which passed between Paul and Seneca, and says they were read by many (leguntur a pluribus). Augustine (Ep. ad Marcell.) also refers to this correspondence. These are the only allusions to it during the first eight centuries, except the mention made in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Peter, which go under the name of Linus of Rome. Seneca's name, however, is mentioned with respect, and his philosophical and religious opinions are occasionally referred to, as by Tertullian, Lactantius, and Bede, who look upon him as a heathen. The notice of Jerome is referred to for the first time in the Chronicle of Freculph of Lisieux (d. 850), and frequently, after the twelfth century, by Honorius of Autun, Peter of Cluny, John of Salisbury, etc. These writers unanimously express the opinion that Seneca was a Christian, and that his correspondence with Paul is genuine. The critical spirits of the period of the Reformation called these judgments into question, especially Erasmus; and the correspondence was declared apocryphal. It would be difficult to find any one now who would deny this conclusion. Many collections have been made of the passages in Seneca's writings which seem to be Christian in tone. Among the latest and most elaborate is that of Amédée Fleury, in his monograph, S. Paul et Sénèque, recherches sur les rapports du philosophe avec l'apôtre et sur l'infiltration du christianisme naissant à travers le paganisme, 1853, 2 vols. Seneca's relation to Christianity has been exhaustively treated by Aubertin (Étude crit. sur les rapports supposés entre Sénèque et St. Paul, Paris, 1857), and F. C. Baur, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, 1858. The latter considers, in his usually profound way, the fundamental ideas of both men. The correspondence between Paul and Seneca consists of eight letters of the latter and six of the former, and bears upon its surface the stamp of an unscientific fabrication. Christ is not the topic, but Castor and Pollux are referred to; and the writers deal more with social conventionalities than with the great ideas of religion and philosophy. But how did it come that Jerome and Augustine were both deceived? One explanation has been, that there was a genuine correspondence, of which this is the spurious imitation; and Seneca's promise in the ninth letter, to send to Paul his work, De copia verborum, is appealed to in confirmation of this theory. The more rational explanation is, that it was a forgery, and as such the outgrowth of the opinion that friendly relations subsisted between the apostle and the philosopher. This opinion was based upon those passages of the New Testament which speak of Paul's residence at Rome (Acts xxviii. 30; Phil. i. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 17) which would have afforded them opportunity to meet, and his acquaintance with Seneca's brother Gallio (Acts xviii. 12 seq.). These passages are, however, so indefinite, that no one would have hit upon the idea of an acquaintance between Paul and Seneca but for other considerations which seemed to indicate that he had approached Christianity. The reason for such approach was derived from his own writings; and, if we pass by the exaggerated attempts to extract distinctively Christian ideas, we cannot overlook the peculiar coloring which stoicism gets in them. We mention here two of Seneca's characteristics, — his practical tone and the tinge of mysticism with which his thinking is colored. Nor can we forget his frequent confession of universal error and estrangement, his references to a future life, etc. Such ideas as these do not, however, necessarily indicate that Seneca had come under the influence of Christianity. His thought had a religious vein: but as a whole, as well as in minor details, his writings stand opposed to the Christian system; and the points wherein they seem to approach it belong to all religions. Seneca knows nothing either of the Judaistic type of Christianity, or of Christ as its Alpha and Omega. Without speaking of the specific Christian conceptions of revelation, sin, and law, Seneca stands on other than Christian ground. The stoic is himself the source of truth and his own duty. There is, however, a Christian glimmer, the moonlight of Christianity, diffused over his philosophy. But he is not the dim reflection of a new light which he has appropriated, but the faint dawn on the obscure horizon of the pre-Christian world, announcing the sun, which has already begun to scatter his light across valley and on mountain. The fine ideas of Roman stoicism were the buds which only the sun of the gospel could develop into beauty and perfection, but which, left alone, would never have produced rich fruits.

SENNACHERIB (Heb., שִׁנְחַרְיָא; LXX., Σενναχεριμ; ASSYR., Sin-ah-ir-ba, = "Sin [the moon-god] multiplied brothers"), king of Assyria B.C. 705-681, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xviii. 13-xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvi. 1-xxxvii. 38; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-22. From the Assyrian monuments we have tolerably full accounts of his reign. He was the son and successor of Sargon (see the art.), and ascended the throne on the 12th of Ab (i.e., July), B.C. 705. His first military expedition was directed against Babylonia and the irrepressible Merodach-baladan (see the art.). This enterprising prince, whom Sargon had vanquished in 710-709, seized the opportunity of Sargon's death to re-assess his claims to Babylon. But Sennacherib's campaign of 701 resulted in driving him into the remote parts of Southern Babylonia. The years immediately following were occupied by the Assyrian king in composing the affairs of Babylonia, where he established a ruler named Belibus (703), and in chastising various allies of Merodach-baladan. In B.C. 701 fell his great western campaign, which is related from the Hebrew stand-point in the passages named above. The death of Sargon had seemed to the Phœnician, Judæan, and Philistian cities, also, to offer an opportunity for throwing off the hated Assyrian yoke. That Merodach-baladan sought to make alliances in the West, his embassy to Hezekiah proves; but his own defeat was so speedy, that the revolt of the western cities was useless for him. Sennacherib merely waited until his work of re-conquest in Babylonia seemed sufficiently assured, and then, as his third campaign, marched to the West. Following the usual route of the Assyrian armies, he appeared first before Sidon, whose king, Elulaus, ventured no opposition, but fled to Cyprus. The Phœnician cities, those of Philistia as far as Ashdod, and the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, submitted to Sennacherib forthwith. Gaza also seems to have been friendly to him. Ascalon and Ekron were more obstinate. The king of Ascalon was therefore seized, and with his family carried away prisoner. The case of Ekron was peculiar. Padi, its king, was favorable to Sennacherib; but the aristocracy and people had determined on revolt from Assyria, and, having overpowered Padi, sent him in chains to Hezekiah for safe-keeping. It may have been the report of this act, reaching Sennacherib on his southward march, which induced him to send off a detachment of troops into the land of Judah. This detachment devastated Judah, and captured forty-six Judæan cities (2 Kings xviii. 13 = Isa. xxxvi. 1; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1). As a result of this, Hezekiah sent tribute to Sennacherib, who in the mean time had reached Lachish, and taken possession of that city (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 14-16). Probably it was at the same time that Hezekiah surrendered Padi, as the inscriptions declare that he did. But Sennacherib demanded more than this from the Judæan king. He had taken up his position at Lachish with the expectation of a battle against a most formidable enemy, namely, Egypt, which had joined the league against Assyria, and whose army, although too late to protect most of its allies, was on the way to meet Sennacherib. It was most important, therefore, to the Assyrian king that he should be secure in the rear. An expedition, under his Tartan (Assyr., tartanu, "general-in-chief"), was accordingly despatched against Jerusalem; and the Rab-shakeh (Assyr., rab-sak, "chief captain"), acting, no doubt, under orders from his superior, used every means of persuasion and threat, by word of mouth and by letter, to gain possession of the city (2 Kings xviii. 17-35 = Isa. xxxvi. 2-20; 2 Kings xix. 9-13 = Isa. xxxvii. 9-13; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 9-19). This demand, so formidably backed, produced a great effect upon people and king (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 26, 37-xix. 1 = Isa. xxxvi. 11, 22-xxxvii. 4; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 18); but faith in Jehovah, stimulated by the exhortations of Isaiah, who had been a sturdy opponent of the Egyptian alliance (see, e.g., Isa. xxx., xxxi.), and yet believed in the certainty of a deliverance from the enemy at their doors, sustained the hearts of those within the city, and they did not yield (2 Kings xix. 5-7, 11-34 = Isa. xxxvii. 5-7, 11-35; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 20 and 2-8). With rebellious Ekron on one flank, and obstinate Jerusalem on the other, Sennacherib felt that he was too far south to fight the Egyptians with safety; and he withdrew to the neighborhood of Eltekeh, where the expected battle took place. The Assyrian inscriptions claim the victory for Sennacherib; but the success was, at all events, not decisive enough to encourage him to follow it up. He contented himself with taking possession of the neighboring cities of Eltekeh and Tinnath, and visiting the unfortunate Ekronites with condign punishment. He put to death the leaders of the revolt against Padi, and took many of the citizens to swell his train of prisoners. Padi himself he re-instated as vassal-prince upon the throne of Ekron.

Sennacherib's return to Assyria was immediately brought about, according to the biblical account, by the smiting of his host in a night at the hands of the angel of Jehovah (2 Kings xix. 35, 36 = Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). The probable interpretation of this is, that a pestilence broke out in the Assyrian camp, and led to the abandonment of further operations in the West. The Egyptians told Herodotus (Herod., ii. 111) a story, improbable enough, according to which the god Hephæstus (Padi) sent field-mice into Sennacherib's camp, and these devoured the quivers and the bows and the shield-handles of his warriors, so that the next morning they fled without weapons. This shows, at all events, that the Egyptians had a tradition to the effect that Sennacherib's host departed suddenly, and in consequence of a great misfortune in their camp, and to this extent confirms the biblical account.

One or two apparent discrepancies between the biblical narrative and Sennacherib's own account of his Palestinian expedition admit of explanation. The Bible speaks of Hezekiah's tribute as consisting of three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14). The inscriptions, which likewise give thirty talents of gold, say eight hundred talents of silver. This is probably due to a difference in the standard used, the Babylonian talent being to the Palestinian as three to eight. Further: the inscriptions represent the tribute of Hezekiah as sent after the battle at Eltekeh, with the obvious design of obscuring the partial lack of success which had attended the Assyrians both in that battle and before Jerusalem, and of closing their account with the mention of material tokens of victory. That the inscriptions say nothing of any failure to reduce Jerusalem, and nothing of the destructive providence which caused the return to Assyria, is in keeping with the boastful tone which characterizes the records of Assyrian kings.

After this campaign we have no mention of Sennacherib's presence in the West (cf. "and dwelt at Nineveh," 2 Kings xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37). He reigned twenty years longer, and was engaged in important campaigns and great public works. The fourth, sixth, and eighth campaigns were against Babylonia, where a new pretender, Suzub, divided his attention with Merodach-baladan, whose frequent failure did not daunt him. As a result of the fourth campaign, Sennacherib established his son Assurnadinsum (the Assurnadinsum, whom Ptolemy assigns to B.C. 699) as viceroy of Babylonia. In the sixth campaign Suzub was again defeated, and brought captive to Nineveh; and in the eighth, which was evidently the fiercest struggle of all, Suzub again appeared in freedom, and in league with Nebosumiskun, son of Merodach-baladan, made a renewed attempt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, but finally succumbed. Other expeditions of Sennacherib took him to the eastward; and one of these was a not very successful campaign against Elam, whose king repeatedly appears as an ally of Merodach-baladan and Suzub.

But Sennacherib distinguished himself by his building as much as by his fighting. Early in his reign he pulled down the royal palace on the northern mound of Nineveh (modern Kuyunjik), and replaced it by a magnificent structure, even in its ruins the largest of the Assyrian palaces yet discovered. It is now known as the South-west Palace of Kuyunjik. He erected a second palace on the southern mound of Nineveh (modern Nebi Yunos). He made a broad and splendid street through the city, and reared a bridge over the waters which protected the eastern gate, - the chief gate of the city, - through which the Assyrian kings and their armies often passed. He supplied the city with water by cutting at immense cost a canal from the high land near the city Ki-iri, north-east from Nineveh, through which the waters of the Khoser were conducted to his capital, and provided for a constant supply by a system of feeders. In all these enterprises he employed vast numbers of captives as laborers. The quarries of the neighboring mountains furnished the stone that was needed, and timber and all costly things for the adornment of the palaces were brought from various conquered lands.

But Sennacherib was not permitted to end his days in peace. The prediction which Isaiah had uttered concerning him while he was still in Philistia (cf. 2 Kings xix. 7 with Isa. xxxvii. 7) came true after twenty years. He was murdered by two of his sons, whose names the Bible has preserved to us as Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvii. 38; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 21). Abydenus (Euseb., Chron. i. 9; and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron. i. 5) also mention the murder of Sennacherib, but no account of it has yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. He was succeeded by his son, Esarhaddon.

SEPARATES, an American Calvinistic Methodist sect, composed of Whitefield's followers, which sprang up in 1750 under the name of "New Lights." They were, however, subsequently organized into separate societies by Rev. Shubal Stearne, and then they took the name "Separates." Stearne became a Baptist in 1751, and many of the Separates followed him into that church; and the sect died out. "The distinctive doctrine of the sect was, that believers are guided by the immediate teachings of the Holy Spirit, such supernatural indications of the divine will being regarded by them as partaking of the nature of inspiration, and above, though not contrary to, reason." See BLEUNT: Dictionary of Sects, s.v.; GARDNER: Faiths of the World, s.v.

SEPARATISM, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means the spirit of separation in matters of faith; therefore Separatists are those who separate themselves from the State Church in order to seek in conventicles and prayer-meetings the edification they do not derive from the public religious services. They are very numerous in Russia and Wurttemberg. See INSPIRED, PIETISM, RUSSIAN SECTS.

SEPHARVAIM (Heb., סִפְרַוַּיִם; LXX, Σεφάρβαι; Assyri., Sippara; Sippur; Akkad., Zimbar, meaning unknown, a city of Northern Babylonia, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31, xviii. 31, Isa. xxxvi. 19, xix. 13 (Isa. xxxvii. 13). The last four passages name Sefharvaim among the cities conquered by the king of Assyria: the first two speak of it as one of the places from which colonists were transplanted into Samaria (see SARGON), whose idolatrous practices were continued in their new land (see below).

The site of Sefharvaim (Sippara) was discovered in 1881 by Hormuzd Rassam, who unearthed in the mounds now called Abu Habba the ruins of its famous sun-temple, with a bas-relief of the sun-god himself, and valuable inscriptions. Sippara lay a little to the west of a north and south line joining Babylon with Bagdad, and somewhat nearer the latter place, in lat. about 33° 42' N.; long. about 11° 16' east from Greenwich. The Euphrates, which in the Assyrian inscriptions is repeatedly called "the river of Sippara," once flowed near it; but the present river-bed is several miles to the west. Sippara was an ancient and highly venerated seat of power and worship. It was sometimes called "Sippara of the Sun" (see Alzou zila, Euseb., Prap. Evang. 9, 12, and Chron. i. 7). It appears to have been a double city, with two separate parts: this follows not only from the dual form of the Hebrew Sefharvaim, but also from the distinction which the inscriptions make between "Sippara of the Sun" and "Sippara of the goddess Anunit." One of these twin parts was perhaps identical with the old city Agade (Akkad (?), so George Smith), which was undoubtedly in the immediate neighborhood.

Sippara was connected with Babylonian mythology; for, according to Berossus (see Euseb., loc. cit.), Xisuthros, the Babylonian Noah, was directed by a god, before the flood, to deposit in Sippara the records of antiquity, and after the flood his companions were ordered by a heavenly voice to dig up the tablets deposited by Xisuthros at Sippara, which they accordingly did. The temple of the sun-god discovered by Rassam is of unknown antiquity. It was already venerable when it was restored by Sagassalti-Burias, a king who is believed to have lived about B.C. 1050. Tradition carried its origin many centuries farther back; and, indeed, an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, who reigned B.C. 555-538, makes the surprising statement, that, in exploring its walls and foundations, he came upon "the cylinder of Naram-Sin, son of Sargon, which for thirty-two hundred years no king going before me had seen." (See T. G. Pinches: Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., Nov. 7, 1882.) If this statement is accurate, then we have a Shemitic civilization (Naram-Sin is a Shemitic name) in Northern Babylonia nearly four thousand years before Christ. There is no reason to doubt that Nabonidus gave these figures in good faith, but there are several grounds for questioning their correctness. (1) It cannot be proved, and is not probable, that the chronological records, which in later times, it is true, were preserved with minuteness and care (cf. the Assyrian Eponym Canon), extended back to so remote an antiquity. (2) "Thirty-two hundred" looks like an approximate, not an exact statement. (3) This statement throws back Sargon I. and Naram-Sin (from both of whom we have inscriptions) so far as to leave an immense gap between them and the later Babylonian kings, — a gap which no materials at our disposal enable us to fill. (4) Berossus, although he assigns many thousands of years to the prehistoric kings, does not trace the actual history of Babylonia beyond about B.C. 2500. It seems, then, probable that Sippara, though a very ancient city, has at present no claim to such an age as Nabonidus assigns to its temple. (See further, F. Hommel: Semit. Völker u. Sprachen, i. pp. 487-489.)

In 2 Kings xvii. 31 we are told that the Sefarvites (Heb., סִפְרַוַּיִם; LXX, Σεφάρβαι) burnt their sons with fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, "gods of Sefharvaim." (The K'thib gives כְּסֵפֶי־אֶרֶץ and Lagarde, Labr. Vet. Test. Cane. Pars Prior Geogr. (Göttingen, 1883, adopts for the LXX, the following reading: "ὡς Ἀφραὶμ καὶ Συμμεαῖα.") Neither of these gods is as yet found in connection with Sappara in the cuneiform inscriptions, and no satisfactory explanation of their mention in 2 Kings xvii. 31 has thus far been given.

SEPULCHRE, Holy. See HOLY SEPULCHRE.

SEQUENCE, The, or sequentia (from sequor, "I follow"), was so called because it formerly followed the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel, in the church service. At this point the deacon left the altar, and ascended to the rood-loft to sing the Gospel. The Alleluia of the "Gradual," which was sung meanwhile, was consequently too short to cover his transit; and the last syllable (ia) was therefore protracted into "thirty, forty, fifty, or even a hundred notes." This was known as a "run," "cadence," or neuma. It continued in this shape for about three hundred years. In 851 the abbey of Jumieges in Normandy was sacked by the barbarian Normans; and the monks fled, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where was a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Notkerus Fetslar, to distinguish him from a younger person of the same name) was the true author. This man (called Ballulus, "the little stutterer") had once been at Jumieges, and had there debated with this very refugee monk the question whether words ought not to be given to these notes. It is said that the sound of a mill-wheel furnished him with the idea. Further, that, on the arrival of the refugee, the twenty-year-old debate had been resumed. In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Maitland: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prosa); that is to say, an unmetrical but rhythmic series of sentences. This he offered to Yso, the precentor. Upon commendation, it was adopted. There is no doubt that Notker deserves some credit; but the Vi Deum ludamus and the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to name no other ancient hymns, are of this form. The famous sentence, "in the midst of life we are in death," etc. (Media vita in mortuis sumus, etc.), and which is found in the Episcopal Prayer-Book, is his composition. It was inspired by the Martinsbruck bridge-builders swinging down over the torrent. Dr. Pearson admits Notker's invention of these rhythmical proses; and the Laudes Deo canentibus ubique universis, his first production, has been recently republished. His sequence of the Holy Spirit (Sacri Spiritus ad utrobis gratia) was in use throughout Europe. In this sequence the choir "acts like the chorus of a Greek play," maintaining the attention in default of the principal characters. In the seventeenth century the rood-lofts became organ-lofts to such an extent that sequences, not being required, were disused. In later days the word "sequence" was (incorrectly) applied as synonymous with "hymn." Thus Adam of St. Victor (d. 1192) is called a writer of "sequences," and the Dies Ieri is sometimes similarly entitled. Unless this term be employed with reference to the music, it is confusing; for the "sequence" differs from the "hymn" in being rhythmical without regular metre, and in possessing no rhymes at all. For the high ritualistic significance of its construction, see Neale's Latin monograph prefixed to Daniel's Thesaurus, tom. v.

SER APHIM (plural of Heb. seraph, "to burn"), beings seen by Isaiah, who alone mentions them (vi. 2-6), on either side of the throne of God. They each had six wings: two were spread, in token that instantly they were ready to go upon any errand; two covered the face, to indicate how unworthy they were to look upon their Lord; and two covered the feet, — an Oriental custom in the presence of royalty. They sang an antiphonal chant. One of them cleansed the prophet of his sins by touching his lips with a live coal from the altar before the Lord. The seraphim were manifestly quite different from the cherubim, for the latter had four wings and four faces; and from the angels, who have no wings. SERGIUS PAULUS. See PAUL.

SERGIUS is the name of several saints and martyrs of the Roman-Catholic Church. One of them, a native of Rome, was martyred at Rosaph in Syria, 290, and in his honor the Emperor Justinian I. built the city of Rosaph Sergiopolis. His day of commemoration is Oct. 7.

SERGIUS with the surname Confessor was a native of Constantinople, and lived in the first half of the ninth century. His book, De rebis in ecclesiis publicis et celestibus gestis, — a history of the image-controversies from Constantine to Gregory III. — Michael II. Balanus, — is lost, but under Leo Isaacianus, or under Theophilus, he was imprisoned and exiled as an image worshipper; and for that reason he is styled a confessor by the Greek Church, and commemorated on May 13.

SERGIUS is the name of four popes. — Sergius I. (687-701), b. at Antiochia, but educated at Palermo; refused to recognize the decrees of the Trullan Council, though his delegates had signed them. The emperor, Justinian II., proposed to compel obedience, and had already ordered the Pope to be transported to Constantinople, when he was himself deposed. Thus the Papal rejection of the Trullan Council remained unshaken, and became the starting-point of that contest between the Greek and the Latin churches which ended with their complete separation.—Sergius II. (844-847) was the first pope who had the courage to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Drago, presented a formal protest in Rome.—Sergius III. (904-911), one of the basest characters ever placed on the Papal throne. He lived in open adultery with Marozia, who, besides other children, bore to him the later Pope John XI. See LUTFRAND: Antipodosis, in PERTZ: Mon. Germ. Hist., v.—Sergius IV. (1009-12). His true name was Bocca di Porco ("Swine-snout"); but he was ashamed of it, and on his accession he changed it for Sergius. After that time it became customary for the Popes to change their family names on their election. NEUDECKER.

SERPENT, Brazen, The. When the Israelites, in the fortieth year of their journey through the wilderness, after they had overcome and banished the Canaanites, turned again to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom, they murmured against God and against Moses for want of water. To punish the people, God sent fiery serpents; and by their bite many died. This punishment leads the people not only to acknowledge their sin, but also to ask Moses to pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents. Moses, therefore, at the divine command, makes a brazen serpent, hangs it on a pole, so that by looking toward it every one that had been bitten was cured (Num. xxi. 5 sq.). These fiery serpents are not to be understood as flying-serpents; but they were serpents which were called fiery either on account of their red, shining, fiery-like color, or on account of their inflammatory bite. Very striking indeed is the remedy which Jehovah gives here against the consequences of the serpents' bites, and different explanations have been tried. But we must bear this in mind, that not the way in which the brazen serpent was hung up, but the very fact that it was a serpent, and nothing else, which was made visible in a far distance, is of the utmost importance. The brazen serpent was to the Israelite a symbol of the punishment with which his sin, his murmuring, was visited by Jehovah. Since he that was bitten, in order to be cured, had to look toward the brazen image of the death-bringing serpent, he was cured only under the condition that he became conscious of that punishment which he had incurred by his sin, part of which he had already suffered in the bite of the serpent, and that he wished to be spared the last consequences, the death. By looking toward the brazen serpent, the Israelite was to be cured, but only on condition that he was reminded of his deserved punishment, and took it to heart. Remission and forgiveness of sin were only to follow after true repentance had been effected. This brazen serpent was still, in the time of Hezekiah, an object of idolatrous reverence among the Israelites (2 Kings xviii. 4), and the pious king had it destroyed with other images.

In the New Testament the brazen serpent is mentioned (John iii. 14, 15), where Jesus shows unto Nicodemus the necessary elements for seeing the kingdom of God,—first the subjective condition, through which the faith in the Son of man, as effected by the new birth, can bring life eternal (14 sq.). This latter condition consists in that the Son of man is lifted up like the serpent in the wilderness. Like the brazen serpent, he becomes an image of those punishments which man has incurred, and from which he asks to be delivered. Jesus had therefore to suffer the death of the cursed, which we had incurred, in order to relieve us from the curse. By looking toward him in faith, we are cured and saved, but not without being reminded at the same time of our own sins, for which he was crucified, and of the punishment which we have deserved. This is only one, and nothing else but one, side of the great work by which Jesus has effected our redemption.

SERVETUS, Michael (Miguel Serveto), b. at [Tudela in Spain, Sept. 29], 1511; burnt at the stake in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse; entered the service of Father Quintana, the confessor of Charles the Fifth, and accompanied him in 1529 to Italy and Germany. The minute circumstances, however, of his earlier life, cannot be made out with certainty, as the explanations he gave before the court of Vienne often contradicted those he gave before the court of Geneva. In 1530 he was at all events in Basel, and in the following year he published his De Trinitatis erroribus. While in Toulouse he began to study the Bible, and received a deep impression from it; but he was and always remained a self-taught man in the field of theology, without any true scientific training. He had, however, some talent for abstract speculation, and threw himself with ardent zeal on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, sure that the development which the doctrine had found in the church was utterly wrong, and eager to turn the course of the Reformation in the direction of his own speculation. He addressed himself to Ecolampadius; and Ecolampadius was unable to convince him that his speculations, directed against the eternal divinity of Christ, and leaving the Holy Spirit almost entirely out of consideration, were obscure, contradictory to the Bible, and blasphemous. When the book appeared, it made a great sensation; but all the Reformers denounced it, and Butzer even declared from the pulpit that the author ought to be punished with death. On his return to Basel, Servetus was cast into prison. His book was seized and burnt, and he was released only on condition of retracting; and indeed his next book (Dialogorum de Trini tate libri ii., 1562) opens with a recantation; but he retracts only because he understands that what he formerly wrote on the subject was unripe and unintelligible; and after that kind of recantation he begins afresh. This second book, however, fell flat from the press.

Soon after, he left Basel and repaired, under the assumed name of De Villeneuve, to Paris, where he studied mathematics and medicine. In 1510 he settled as a physician at Vienna, on the invitation of Archbishop Paulmier; and he staid there for twelve years, enjoying the favor of his patron and the esteem of his co-citizens, engaged in various literary pursuits of a highly creditable character, and seemingly in perfect harmony with the Roman-Catholic Church around him. But he had not given up his antitrinitarian speculations, nor abandoned his hope of exercising a decisive influence on the course of the Reformation. Probably in order to ascertain how far he could hope to find a co-worker in the French-Reformed Church, he opened a correspondence with Calvin. At first Calvin answered calmly and with great composure; but, as the correspondence developed he felt deeply provoked; and, when Servetus asked him to procure him a safeguard for a visit to Geneva, Calvin refused, remarking in a letter to Farel, dated Feb. 13, 1546, "Si eorum, nuda calat mea auctoritas, eorum esse nonquam putare" ("If ever he enters the city, he shall not leave it living, if I can prevent it"). Servetus himself was aware of the danger of his enterprise; but in the excited state of mind in which he lived he was drawn onwards with irresistible force, and in the beginning of 1553 he published anonymously his principal work, Christianismi Restitutio. All the old objections to the doctrine of the Trinity are here repeated; and it is urged that the Bible and the ante-Nicene Fathers know nothing of such a doctrine, and that it is the principal reason why the Jews and Mohammedans have not been converted. The author of the book was soon found out, and his identity proved by means of papers delivered up by Calvin. Servetus was imprisoned at Vienna, and a process was instituted against him; but on April 7 he succeeded in escaping from his prison, well provided with money.

His plan was to go to Naples, where, as a Spaniard and a good physician, he would not find it difficult to live. But he tarried for nearly a month in Geneva; and just as he was about to leave the city he was recognized (Aug. 15), and imprisoned at the instance of Calvin, who appeared before the court as his formal accuser. The issue of the process was by no means certain, and some of the details of the proceedings are a little difficult to form a definite opinion of. On Oct. 26, however, the verdict was given, death at the stake. Servetus was shaken to the very depths of his soul, and pleaded for pardon. But he absolutely refused to recant, and on the following day he was publicly burnt. The impression which the altar made at the time was very varied. Melancthon, Bullinger, and all the most prominent theologians of the Protestant Church, took the side of Calvin unconditionally. The Antitrinitarians, and all who in any way inclined towards the ideas of Servetus, were deeply provoked. The Roman Catholics exulted. Generally, however, the public disapproved of the proceedings of Calvin; and such a hail-storm of pamphlets, in verse and prose, representing his character and conduct in the most odious light, came pouring down upon him, that he found it necessary to publicly defend himself. His Declaration appeared in the beginning of 1554 in French, and shortly after in Latin: Reputatio. It was very severely criticised by one Vatableus (Contra libellum Calvinicum), who, however, was no adherent of Servetus. A remarkable book on the question is the De hereticis, an sint persequendi . . . sententia (Magdeburg, 1551), probably by Castellio. It is a collection of all the most noteworthy opinions pronounced upon the question.

SERVIA. Modern Servia, which on March 6, 1882, resumed her place among the kingdoms of Europe, has an area of 208,500 square miles, and a population of about a million and three-fourths. Ancient Servia had a much greater area; and the number of the Servian-speaking people, including those living under Austrian rule, and in the provinces formerly subject to Turkey, is stated to be over seven millions. The Servian tribes received Christianity from the Eastern Church, early in their history; but it was only towards the end of the twelfth century that the energetic Grand Shipane, Nemanja, abolished the partly Romanized ritual which had come into use, and brought the Servian Church into full accord with that of the Eastern Empire.

The Latins having taken Constantinople, St. Sava, son of Nemanja, in 1217, crowned as king his brother Stephen, and in 1221 induced the humbled emperor and patriarch to make the Servian Church autocephalous, as a means of preserving it from Rome; St. Sava himself being the first independent archbishop. The key to the earlier church history of Servia is found in the attachment to the formulae of the Eastern Church, joined to jealousy of the political power of the Eastern Empire. In 1347, when the great Stephen Dushan declared himself czar, the archbishop, as was natural in the Greek Church, where the secular and spiritual powers are so closely united, was declared patriarch, and his seat fixed at Ipek. The fatal battle of Kossowa, in 1389, and the trampling of Servia under the Turks, and not interfere with the succession of the patriarchs of Ipek until near the middle of the seventeenth century; then the Porte, finding the patriarchate a centre of national feeling, interested, and finally, in 1767, abolished it, and placed the church under Greek bishops from Constantinople, who were as much hated by the people as were the Turkish rulers. As the erection of the patriarchate under Stephen Dushan marks the highest point of Servian history, so its suppression marks the lowest. In 1810, when Kara George freed his country from the Turks, the archbishopric of Carlovitz, in Hungary, which represents the patriarchate of Ipek, was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church. The Turks reconquered the country; and when Milosh Obrenovics by his efforts, from 1815 onward, in 1830 secured a Hatti-sheriff from the Porte, which erected Servia into an autonomous principality, paying tribute to the Porte, the Church was also allowed to elect her own bishops and metropolitan, paying tribute to the Patriarch at Constantinople. In 1838, when the seat of government was removed to Belgrade, the metropolitan of that city was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church, although the Archbishop of Carlovitz urged his claims. The treaty of Berlin, in 1878, made the principality of Servia wholly independent, and the connection of the church with that of Constantinople ceased. The Liturgy of the Servian Church is in ancient Slavonic, which is said not to differ more from modern Servian than does the English of Chaucer from that of the present day. Servia has a good public system of education. The parish priests of Belgrade and the more populous parts of the country are men of education and intelligence; but the standard in the mountainous regions of the interior, in this respect, is not as high as it should be. Freedom of worship is allowed, although proselytizing from the Established Church is forbidden. The metropolitan of Belgrade has five suffragans, each of whom presides over a diocesan consistory. The entire Protestant, Roman-Catholic, and Jewish populations together numbered in 1871 less than seven thousand. The districts annexed in 1878 contained a Mohammedan population of seventy-five thousand.

SERVITES (Servi Bona Maria Virginis, "Servants of the Virgin Mary") is the name of a monastic order, which was formed in 1223, at Florence, on the day of the festival of the ascension of the Virgin (Aug. 15), by seven distinguished citizens, who retired to a secluded place (Villa Camarini) for the purpose of devoting themselves entirely to the worship of Mary. In 1236 they removed to Monte Senario; and in 1239 they adopted the rules of St. Augustine, and began to receive novices. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX., and Alexander IV.; and from Martin V. it obtained all the privileges of the mendicant orders, 1324. Among the celebrated men who have belonged to the order is Paolo Sarpi. There are also female Servites. See A. GIANNI: Avantio Ordinis Fratrum Servorum, Lucera, 1719; and PAULUS FLORENTINUS: Dialogus de origine Ordinis Servorum, in J. LAMUS: Delicia Eruditiorum, Florence, 1736; SCHROCKH: Christlichen Kerkengeschichte, vol. xxvii., pp. 509 sqq. NEUDECKER.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI ("Servant of the Servants of God") is the official formula with which the Pope signs his name. It was brought into technical official use by Gregory the Great (q. v.)

in imitation of Augustine, yet as a rebuke to the Patriarch John of Constantinople, who had the audacity to style himself "Œcumenical Patriarch."

SESSION, the lowest court in the Presbyterian Church, composed of the pastor and his elders. Before it, all candidates for admission to full communion come for examination, and by it all business relating to the government and practice of the congregation is transacted.

SESSION OF CHRIST, a theological term derived from the phrase that Christ is "seated at the right hand of God," setting forth the perpetual presence of the human nature in heaven.

SETON (Mother), Elizabeth Ann (née Bayley), foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States; b. in New-York City, Aug. 28, 1774; d. at Emmitsburg, Md., Jan. 4, 1821. She married William Seton in her twentieth year. After his death (1803) she entered the Roman-Catholic Church, March 14, 1805. In order to support herself she taught school at Baltimore, 1806-08; but with her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, on the inheritance of eight thousand dollars from the Rev. Samuel Cooper, she opened a conventual establishment of the Sisters of Charity—they having taken the veil Jan. 1, 1809—at Emmitsburg, July 30, 1809. In 1812 the order had increased to twenty members, with Mother Seton as superior-general. At her death it numbered fifty. In 1814 the order took charge of an orphan-asylum in Philadelphia, and in 1817 was incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland. See her biography by WHITE, New York, 1853, and by ROBERT SETON, New York, 1869, 2 vols.

SEVEN, The Sacred Number. Among ancient nations, especially in the East, in India, China, Chaldea, Egypt, Greece, we find that a symbolical significance is attached to the number seven as a pre-eminently sacred number. According to the Indian doctrines, "man is the representative of the great seven-stringed world-lyre," the "symbol of cosmic harmony," the "makro-cosmic heptachord" (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls in man, together with three spiritual souls (Ritter: Asien, i. 199). The Egyptians worshipped the seven planets (Diodor. Sic., ii. 30; and Herodotus tells of their seven castes (ii. 64; cf. Uhlmann: Ägyptologie, ii. 59, 163). There were also the sacred "Heptads" of Greece and Rome; and hence the significance attached to Rome's seven hills, to the seven reeds in the pipe of Pan, the seven strings of the lyre of Helios. With the heathen, the number seven—which also includes the seven planets, the seven colors in the rainbow, the seven tones in music—had almost exclusive reference to natural relations, to the seven sacred divisions of time, which all nations seem to have recognized; and Ideler (Chronologie, i. 178, ii. 173) traces the universal division of time into periods of seven days to the phases of the moon, or the duration of each of the four divisions of the lunar month of twenty-eight days. In place of all such material relations, the ethical and religious significance of seven was alone recognized by the Hebrews. The Bible begins, in the Book of Genesis, with a seven, and ends, in the Apocalypse, with a series of sevens. The symbolical value of this number is not to be sought for, with Winer (Kritisch-exegetisch, ii. 715, in the ideas attached by the ancients to the seven planets, but in the seven days during which creation arose from chaos [and was pronounced to be "very good"], when God "rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made," when he blessed it and sanctified it as a day of rest for the creation also. With reference to this starting-point or sacred number—seven, or seven multiplied by seven—all the legal festivals were ordered. Thus the great festivals lasted seven days,—the passover [Exod. xii. 15], the feast of weeks [Exod. xxxiv. 22], the feast of tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13]. Pentecost was seven weeks after the passover [Lev. xxiii. 15, 16]; each seventh year was "a sabbath of rest unto the land" [Lev. xxv. 4], and the jubilee year was the year after "seven times seven years" [Lev. xxv. 8-11]. The great day of atonement fell in the seventh month [Lev. xvi. 29, 30], as did the feasts of trumpets and of tabernacles [Num. xxix. 1, 12; and thus the seventh day is a sabbath, the seventh week a pentecost, the seventh year a sabbatical year, the seventh sabbatical year a jubilee]. Not only the legal festivals, but also other enactments, had reference to the sacred number seven. Thus seven days were required for the ceremonies of the consecration of priests; seven days for the interval to elapse between the occasion and removal of various kinds of legal uncleanness, as after childbirth, after contact with a corpse, etc.; seven times appointed for aspersion either of the blood of the victim [Lev. iv. 6, xvi. 11], or of the water of purification (xiv. 51; cf. 2 Kings v. 10, 11, ["go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh," etc.], and Gen. vii. 2, 3). Seven things were to be offered in sacrifice,—oxen, sheep, goats, pigeons, wheat, oil, wine; seven victims to be offered on any special occasion (Num. xxiii. 1, [11, 29]; 2 Chron. xv. 11, xvii. 11, xxi. 21; [Job xlii. 8]; cf. also Gen. xxxiii. 3, where Jacob bowed seven times, and 2 Kings vi. 38, concerning Solomon's temple, which was seven years in building); and especially at the ratification of a treaty, the notion of seven being embodied in the very term nash'ba, signifying "to swear," literally meaning "to do seven times" (Gen. xxi. 28; Deut. iv. 31; cf. Herod. iii. 8 for a similar custom among the Arabians). The same idea is farther carried out in the vessels, adjuncts, measurements, and arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick [and its seven lamps (Exod. xxv. 31-37); the length of each curtain of the tabernacle, which was seven by four cubits (Exod. xxvi. 2)]; the number of the pillars of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two [Exod. xxvii. 10-15]. The number seven also appears in cases where the notion of satisfaction is required, as in reference to punishment for wrongs (Gen. iv. 15; Lev. xxvi. 18, 28; Prov. vi. 3), or to forgiveness of them (Matt. xviii. 21). It is again mentioned, in a variety of passages (Isa. iv. 1, xi. 15, xxx. 26; Jer. xv. 9; Job v. 19; Matt. xii. 15, etc.) in a sense analogous to that of a "round number," but with the additional idea of sufficiency and completeness. To this also may be added the numerous instances in which persons or things are mentioned by sevens:

e.g., [the seven king and the seven ears in Pharaoh's dream], the seven sons of Jacob, [the seven daughters of the priest of Midian], the seven daughters of Job, the seven children of Hannah, [the seven sons of Jesse], the seven sons of Joseph, the seven deacons (Acts vi. 5), the seven sons of Sevea, the seven disciples in John xxi. 2, and the seven times ten disciples (Luke x. 1), [the seven beatitudes], the seven petitions in the Lord's Prayer, the seven parables (Matt. xiii.), the miracle of the seven loaves, [the seven words from the cross], the seven times two generations in the pedigree of Jesus, the seven charismata in Rom. xii. 6-8, the seven characters of wisdom in Jas. iii. 17, the seven virtues in 2 Pet. i. 5-7. There are also the Heptads of the Apocalypse, such as are silently indicated, as in v. 12, vi. 16, vii. 12, xix. 18, xxi. 8, as well as such as are expressly indicated,—the seven churches (iii. 1 sq.), seals (v. 1 sq.), trumpets (viii. 2 sq.), thunders (x. 3, 4), vials (xvi. 1 sq.), and angels (xv. 1 sq.). As these apocalyptic sevens—the seven heads, horns, and crowns of the beast (xii. 3, xiii. 1, xvi. 7 sq.) not excluded—have their common divine archetype in the "seven spirits which are before the throne of God," or in the "seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth" (Rev. i. 4, iii. 1, iv. 5, v. 6), and which again have for their basis the seventold designation of the Spirit of God coming down on the Messiah (Isa. xi. 2), we are entitled to regard the seven as the signature of the Holy Spirit, or of that triune God who historically and judicially reveals himself in the Spirit. The significance of the seven in the last book of the Bible evidently looks backwards to that given to it in the first book. On the application of the number seven in mediæval art, science, liturgies, and mysticism, see OTTE: Handbuch der kirchlichen Kunstarchæologie des Mittelalters, p. 283; Dr. WILHE: Geschichte der christlichen Sittenlehre, i. and ii. passim; PEPPER: Evangelisches Jahrbuch für 1856, pp. 76 sq.; DIESCH: Symbolik der christlichen Religion, ii. pp. 536 sq.

SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHEBUS. See ERNESTUS, SEVEN SLEEPERS OF.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS. 1. Name.—In their early history in England this sect was known as the "Sabbatarian Baptists;" but, for the sake of greater definiteness, the General Conference in the United States changed it to its present form in 1818.

Origin.—The Seventh-Day Baptists as an ecclesiastical organization appear in England in the latter part of the sixteenth century. The lack of conformity to apostolic doctrine and church order on the part of the Established Church was the ground they alleged as the sufficient reason for separate organization. In formulating their doctrine and polity they undertook to follow the model of the Apostolic Church as nearly as circumstances would allow.

History.—Since the institution of the sabbath at the close of creation, and its formal pronouncement as a part of the Sinaitic code, it is believed that there has been an unbroken line of God-loving men who have kept the seventh day of the week as a sabbath, according to its original institution and enjoyment. None question that it was observed by Christ and his apostles, and by Christians generally during the apostolic period. It had no rival day in the Church until about the middle of the second century, when Sunday began to be observed as a festival day in honor of the resurrection, along with Wednesday, Friday, and numerous other festival days of the Latin Church, then beginning to drift upon the first great wave of its apostasy. This church made the sabbath day a fast-day, not without sinister motives looking to its suppression in favor of the festival Sunday; while the Greek or Eastern Church steadfastly observed it as a day of holy delight in the Lord. Controversy upon this subject began about the middle of the second century, and was kept up with a zeal amounting to bitterness for several centuries. In the Western Church the seventh day continued to be observed quite generally till the fifth century, and traces of it were noticeable in some parts of Europe much later. In Scotland and Ireland, as well as in England, the seventh day was regarded and observed as the sabbath in the eleventh century and later. In Skene's Celtic Scotland, p. 350, vol. 2, there is this statement: "There was no want of the veneration of Sunday, though they held that Saturday was properly the sabbath, on which they abstained from work." In the Oriental or Greek branch of the church the seventh day continues to be observed to this day.

There is not wanting evidence that an unbroken chain of observers of the seventh day was preserved, in the face of detraction and persecution, all through the dark ages, and that they appeared in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation, and were represented in that movement by a number of its prominent actors.

In the Abyssinian, Armenian, and Nestorian churches the seventh day has not yet been supplanted by the first day of the week. Consult GEDDES: History of the Church of Ethiopia, London, 1691; GOBAT: Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 2d ed., 1817; STANLEY: History of the Eastern Church, 1861.

As these sabbath-keepers were pressed by persecutions, they were compacted into several centres. Most prominent among these were societies in Bohemia, Transylvania, and Holland. From among these, under the lead of prominent and able dissenters from the Church of England, were gathered the "Sabbatarian Baptists" of England. This movement was accelerated as a reaction against the theory, that, while the Sinaiic sabbath law was still in full force, the first day of the week had been put in place of the seventh day by divine authority. This theory was first set forth by NICOLAS BOWEN, in his Sabbathum ceteris et veri testum etc; or the true doctrine of the Sabbath, held and practised of the Church of God, both before, and under the Law; and on the time of the Gospel, London, 1595, 2d ed. ("perused and enlarged"), 1606. See Neal, Harper ed., vol. i, p. 208.

During the English Reformation, several able and distinguished men came out of the Established Church, and took up the defence of the sabbath in the face of severe persecution, amounting, in a number of instances, to martyrdom, characterized by all the circumstances which had marked the dark ages. In 1630 Theophilus Brabourn wrote an able defence of the views of the Sabbatarian Baptists; and he was followed by James Ockford, the Steunets, Robert Cornthwait, and others.

Out of such agitation, and from such elements, were the Seventh-Day Baptist churches of England organized during the latter part of the sixteenth century, and fore part of the seventeenth. During that period eleven churches were formed in England. Three of these were in London.

The Mill-yard Church is still active, with a church-edifice, parsonage, and considerable money endowment. This church was gathered by John James, at a date not well settled, in consequence of loss of records by fire. This first pastor fell a victim to the wild spirit of intolerance abroad in the politico-ecclesiastical counsels of England, and was by authoritative mandate dragged from his pulpit during sabbath service, imprisoned, and at length beheaded, drawn, and quartered, and his head was set upon a pole opposite his chapel. There are now two churches in England, two in Holland, and one (missionary church) in Shanghai, China.

11. Seventh-Day Baptist Churches in America. In 1661 Stephen Mumford came from one of the English churches, and organized the first Seventh-Day Baptist Church in America, in Newport, R.I., in 1671. From this church others soon grew up, and were pushed out into Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, and farther west. Another centre was established, about 1700, near Philadelphia, Penn., by Rev. Abel Noble, a minister of large ability, from England. Five churches were formed there, drawing largely for adherents from the Keithian Baptists. From these, other churches were formed, in South Carolina, Georgia, and in the western part of Pennsylvania, and still farther west. A third centre was established at Piscataway, N.J., in 1705, where there is still a flourishing church. From these three radial points the churches have spread westward with the general tide of emigration, until there are now flourishing churches in no less than sixteen States, with an aggregate membership of about nine thousand.

Church Polity.—This is strictly congregational. The annual conference has simply the power of an advisory council, and is composed of two delegates from each church, with an additional delegate for every twenty-five members. There are five associations, which sustain the same relation to the churches composing them as the conference does to all the churches. The associations may be represented by delegates in the conference, but with no power to vote as association in that body.

Doctrines.—The Seventh-Day Baptists believe in the general doctrines of salvation held by the evangelical churches, and differ from the tenets of the Baptists generally only in regard to the sabbath.

They believe, and conscientiously regulate their practice accordingly, that the seventh day of the week is the sabbath of the Lord, and that this, at its institution in Eden, and promulgation as part of the Sinaiic code, was made binding upon all men in all times; that, in the nature of its relations to God and to man, it is irrepealable.

In the terms of its constitution and in the reasons for its enactment it is inseparably connected with the seventh or last day of the week, and that any attempt to connect the sabbath law and sabbath obligation with any one of the other days of the week is illogical, and in its tendency destructive of the whole sabbath institution.

That the change of the day of the sabbath to Sunday has no warrant in the Scriptures, is only a human device brought about by such questionable and unjustifiable means as to give it no claim either to the respect or acceptance of Christendom.

That the only stay to the wave of no-sabbathism now sweeping from Europe to America is in the impregnable bulwark of the true sabbath of the Fourth Commandment.

Education and Publication. — The Seventh-Day Baptists have two flourishing institutions of college grade, — one at Milton, Wis.; the other at Alfred Centre, N.Y. This latter has a university charter, and is vigorously carrying on business, mechanical, and theological departments, in addition to its academic and collegiate courses. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms to these colleges, and over seven hundred students were in attendance in them the last year.

The publishing-house of the denomination is also at Alfred Centre, from which, besides a large number of tracts and books, it issues its weekly organ, the Sabbath Recorder, an eight-page paper of good size, ably edited, and executed in the best style of the art. A monthly, The Outlook, has an issue of over fifty thousand copies; and a finely illustrated sabbath-school paper, Our Sabbath Visitor, is issued weekly.

Missions. — For many years the denomination has had a mission in Shanghai, China, where it has accumulated considerable property, which it is now enlarging; and the mission force is to be enlarged at once by the addition of a female medical missionary.

General Reform. — Upon the questions of reform which have agitated the public mind, such as antislavery, temperance, religious liberty, sabbath-observance, etc., this people have always maintained a consistent and radical position, favorable to the reforms sought.

General Repute. — Baird, in his Religion in America (New York, 1856), says of them, "The population under their instruction and influence is reckoned at forty thousand. Their churches are widely scattered through the States, and altogether they are a very worthy people."

Arnold's History of Rhode Island, vol. ii. p. 86, has the following: "The Rev. Mr. Price, missionary at Westerly, expresses his astonishment at the kind treatment he received at their hands, and that he found them most charitable and catholic, whom he thought to have found the most still and prejudiced." With "charity for all, and malice towards none," they claim their place and equal rights among other religious societies, nor do they find occasion to

"Spurn the badges their fathers have worn, Nor beg the world's pardon for having been born."

D. E. MAXSON: Seventh-Day Baptists. SEVERIANUS, Bishop of Gabala in Syria, was a friend of Chrysostom, and his representative in Constantinople during his absence in Asia Minor. But he used the opportunity to intrigue against Chrysostom, and was driven out of the city by the people, though afterwards recalled by his patroness, Eudoxia. He was reconciled with Chrysostom, but continued to intrigue against him. Six sermons of his are found in Montfaucon's edition of the works of Chrysostom. In 1827 the Mekhitarists published in Venice some homilies by him.

SEVERINUS, St., the apostle of Noricum; b. in Italy in the beginning of the fifth century; d. at Faviana, a city on the Danube, near the present Pöchlarn, Jan. 8, 182. After a journey to the East, where he adopted a life of the severest asceticism, he returned to the West to devote himself to missionary work. He first visited Pannonia, but then settled in Noricum, a province of the Roman Empire occupying the present Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Cariola, Tyrol, and parts of Bavaria. The country, which was inhabited by a Celtic tribe, was conquered by the stepsons of Augustus, Tiberius and Drusus, B.C. Many new cities were founded, excellent roads were made, numerous castles with Roman garrisons were built, agriculture was improved, and commerce flourished. Through their commercial and military connections with Italy and Rome the inhabitants of Noricum early became acquainted with Christianity, and after the law of Theodosius the Great, which in 392 prohibited all Pagan idolatry within the boundaries of the empire, Christianity was in fact the recognized religion of the country. Thus it can hardly be considered so very heavy a task which St. Severinus undertook when he settled at Faviana. His life by EUGENES, in WELSER, Op. Hist. et phil., Nuremb., 1672, in Act. Sanct., Jan. 8, [ed. by H. Sauppe, Berlin, 1878, 36 pp.], is full of fables. [See A. A. SEMBLER: Heinr. Walsitz u. Starboort d. heil. Severin, Wien, 1882.] G. H. KLEPPEL.

SEVERINUS (Pope, 638-640), the successor of Honorius I. The Monothelite controversy was just raging, and caused him many difficulties. He condemned the Ecthesis of the Emperor Heraclius, and thereby the whole Monothelite doctrine.

SEVERUS, the name of three persons. (1) The Rhetor, wrote in 386, on occasion of a fearful epidemic among the cattle, a carmen bucolicum, generally called De moribus bovm ("On the death of the oxen"), or De virtute signi crucis domini ("On the virtue of the sign of the cross"), in which he tells us that the animals were saved from the plague by making a cross on their forehead.

(2) Bishop of Mahon in the Island of Minorca, communicated in 418, by an encyclical letter, to the whole of Christendom that four hundred and fifty Jews had been converted and baptized on the intercession of Stephen, the first martyr, whose relics were deposited in the church of Mahon. The letter is found in BARONII'S Ann., vol. 418.

(3) A Jacobite bishop of Egypt, who wrote in Arabic a history of the patriarchs of Alexandria, about 978.

SEVERUS, Alexander, b. at Arce, Oct. 1, 205; made Roman emperor March 11, 222; murdered at Mayence, March 19, 235. During his reign the Christians dared worship openly. He was a pantheistic hero-worshipper, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Septimius, b. at Leptis in Africa, April 11, 116; d. at York, Feb. 1, 211; became Roman emperor after the assassination of Pertinax in 193. He was a just but somewhat sombre character, not destitute of true religious feeling, but a mystic easily captivated by the fantastic practices of the Pagan religions. He had Christian servants in his household, defended the Christian senators against the fury of the Pagan nobles, and allowed his eldest son to converse freely with the boys of Christian families. But during his campaigns in the East a great change took place in his feelings towards the Christians. The reason is not known; but he issued laws, which, by very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to Judaism and Christianity. From these laws the Pagan authorities took occasion to revive and enforce again older laws against the Christians, which, though not revoked, had fallen into oblivion; and persecutions broke out, especially in Africa and some parts of Asia Minor. The Christians seem, however, generally to have been of the opinion that those persecutions were not really intended by the emperor. See TERTULLIAN: Apolog., 37. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, b. 363 in Gaul; d. at Marseilles in 410; was a distinguished rhetorician, and successful as a lawyer, but adopted a monastic life after the death of his wife, in 392, and settled with a few companions in some secluded place in Aquitaine. He was a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours, whom he visited several times, and whose life he wrote. He also wrote a Historia sacra, three dialogues on the monastic life, and some letters, which, however, are of no interest. His collected works were edited by IHERONYMUS DE PRATO, Verona, 1711, and reprinted in GALAND: Bibl. Patr., viii.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. at Bishopstoke, Eng., March 28, 1652; d. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 1, 1730. He was graduated at Harvard, 1671; studied divinity, and preached for a while, until by his marriage (Feb. 28, 1676) with Hannah Hull he got great wealth. He then turned his attention to law, was made judge (1692), and eventually (1718), chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He at first shared in the popular delusion concerning witchcraft (1692), and concurred in the condemnations; but on Jan. 14, 1697, his minister, Rev. Samuel Willard, read "a bill" before the congregation of the Old South Church, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, asked the pardon both of God and man, and deprecated the divine judgments for his sin. He contributed liberally to the spread of the gospel among the Indians, and in 1699 was chosen one of the commissioners of the Society in England for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England, and, soon after, their secretary and treasurer. His sympathy for African slaves prompted him, in 1700 to publish a tract entitled The selling of Joseph, in which he advocated their rights; it being his opinion that there would be no progress in gospel'ing until slavery was abolished. His benevolence and charity were great, and his house was a seat of hospitality." He wrote Phenomena, etc., a description of the New Heaven, Boston, 1697, 2d ed., 1727; and Prospects touching the accomplishment of prophecies, Boston, 1713. His Diary (1671-1729) was published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1878, 2 vols. See DRAKE: Dictionary of American Biography.

SEWELL, William, Friend; b. at Amsterdam, 1650; d. about 1725. His father was a surgeon; and he served his time as a weaver, yet acquired Greek, Latin, English, French, and High Dutch. He is known as the author of Hist. van de Oplossing, Aankomst, en Voortgang der Christenen, bekend by den naam van Quakers, onderzocht met de voornameste Staatsgechiednissen van dien tyd in Engeland voorgevallen, en met authentieke Stukken voorzien ("The history of the rise, increase, and progress, of the Christian people called Quakers"), Amsterdam, 1717, and then translated it himself into English, London, 1722, folio; 3d ed., 1795, 2 vols.; Philadelphia, 1855. One of his objects was to correct the "misrepresentations" in GERARD CROESE: Historia Quakeriana, Amst., 1695-1704, 3 books.

SEXAGESIMA, "the sixtieth," means the second Sunday before Lent, the next to Shrove Tuesday, as being about sixty days before Easter.

SEXTON, a contraction of "sacristan," a subordinate officer of the church, taking care of its vessels and vestment, attending the officiating clergy, etc.

SFONDRATI is the name of an Italian family of which several members have been intimately connected with the Church. — Francis Sfondrati, b. at Cremona, 1493; d. there July 31, 1550. He taught law in the universities of Padua, Pavia, Bologna, Rome, and Turin, and was much used in diplomatic negotiations by Duke Francis Sforza and Charles V. After the death of his wife he entered the service of the Church, and was by Paul III. made Bishop of Cremona, and a cardinal. He acted as mediator between the Pope and the emperor at the occasion of the Augsburg Interim. — Nicholas Sfondrati, son of the preceding, became Pope under the name of Gregory XIV.; which art. see. — Celestine Sfondrati, b. in Milan, 1619; d. in Rome, Sept. 4, 1696. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall; taught theology, philosophy, and canon law in various places; and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689, and made a cardinal in 1695. In the controversy between the papal see and the Gallican Church he wrote, in defence of the absolute supremacy of the Pope, Rogale Sacerdotium (1684), Gallia vindicata (1687, often reprinted), Legatio Marchionis Luvardini (1688), etc. His Nodus prædestinationis, published in Rome, 1697, made a great sensation, as in many points it stood in open contradiction to the official system of doctrine recognized by the Church. The French bishops tried to have the book put on the Index, but did not succeed.

SHAFTESBURY. See DEISM, INFIDELITY.
SHAKERS. This appellation was given, in derision, to a religious body calling themselves "Believers in Christ's Second Appearing," because in their religious meetings, and under the inspirations of the Christ-spirit, they were sometimes led to shake, as a manifestation of hatred to the sins and elements of a wicked, worldly life. Perhaps the title is not inappropriate; as this people believe themselves to be the followers of Christ, the great shaker prophesied by Haggai (ii. 6, 7): "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake . . . all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come." The embryotic origin of this sect is found in the Revivalists of Dauphiné and Vivarais, France, about 1689. Some of these went to England about 1706. Offshoots from them formed a little society in England about 1717. For a time they were led by one James and Jane Wardley.

Ann Lee, the primary leader of the Shaker Church, was the daughter of John Lee of Manchester, Eng., and b. Feb. 28, 1736. In early childhood she was the subject of deep religious convictions of the great depravity of human nature, but eventually was married to Abraham Stanley, by whom she had four children, who all died in infancy. In 1758 she joined the society of James Wardley, and thenceforth lived a religious life. She now became the renewed subject of remarkable revelations of God, causing her intense sufferings of body and soul, resulting in purification of spirit, by which she found that protection from sin she had so much prayed for in her childhood. She and others of this household of faith were severely persecuted in England; and Ann, in 1770, was imprisoned in a manner to take her life by starvation. While in prison she received, as believed by her followers, a revelation of God relative to the cause of the sinful state of humanity and the means of redemption. She was thenceforth accepted by the society as their leader, and, by the character of her gifts, as the manifestation of the second appearing of Christ in his glory; not of Jesus, but of the baptism that crowned and anointed Jesus the Christ in his first appearing.

Ann Lee and many of her followers received gifts pointing them to North America as the "land of humankind" shadowed with wings, delineated by the prophet Isaiah (xiii. 8). Accordingly, on May 19, 1771, Ann Lee and nine of her followers set sail for America, and landed in New York on the 6th of August following. One of this number, John Hocknell, purchased a lot in the wilderness of Niskayuna, about seven miles north-west of Albany, erected log buildings, and in 1776 Ann's little church gathered to this forest home. Three years thereafter, a remarkable revival of religion occurred at New Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.; and in 1780 many of those affected by this revival, and others from distant parts, visited Ann's little church, and embraced their testimony. Ann Lee died Sept. 8, 1784, aged forty-eight years.

The Shakers' first house of worship was built at New Lebanon aforesaid in 1785. The first gathering into a community analogous to the primitive church was in 1787. Their first written covenant of a full consecration to God of life, services, and treasure, was signed by the members in 1795. "There are now (1883) seventeen societies in North America (none elsewhere), located as follows: "New Lebanon," Mount Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.; "Watervliet" Shakers, Albany County, N.Y.; "Sonsyva," Livingston County, N.Y.; "Hancock," West Pittsfield, Berkshire County, Mass.; "Harvard," Ayer, Middlesex County, Mass.; "Shirley Village" Shakers, Middlesex County, Mass.; "Enfield, Connecticut," Shaker Station, Hartford County, Conn.; "Canterbury," Shaker Village, Merrimack County, N.H.; "Enfield" Shakers, Grafton County, N.H.; "Alfred," York County, Me., Shakers; "New Gloucester," West Gloucester, Cumberland County, Me., Shakers; "Union Village," Shaker post-office, Warren County, O.; "North Union," Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, O., Shakers; "Watervliet, Ohio," Dayton, Montgomery County, O., Shakers; "White-water," Preston, Hamilton County, O., Shakers; "Pleasant Hill" Shakers, Mercer County, Ky.; "South Union," Logan County, Ky., Shakers. The entire Shaker order in America own about forty-five thousand acres of land. The number composing the communities fluctuates, so that no definite number can be appropriately stated. Some societies are fewer now than a quarter of a century ago; others number about the same; while some others have doubled in numbers during the past two years.

ORGANIZATION AND THEOLOGY.—Their societies are organized into families of both sexes and all ages, varying in numbers from a very few to a hundred and fifty or more. Their organization, formulas, and by-laws are anti-monastic, anti-Mormon, anti-Oneidan, anti-Nicolaitan. Each sex, including those once married, occupy separate apartments. Both sexes congregate for meals and meetings at the same time, and in one and the same hall. At table, except small parties, each sex is grouped by itself; the same order in meetings. They kneel in prayer before, and in thanks after, each meal, also on retiring to rest, and rising in the morning.

Worship-Meetings are generally held three or four times per week. Worship consists in singing, in solo and harmony, hymns, anthems, and improvised songs, called "gift songs;" quick and slow marches, two abreast, in ranks and circles, sometimes timing with the hands to the measure, sometimes in solemn dances in ranks or circles, and occasionally interchangeably, but always each sex grouped by itself; also prayers, exhortations, and sermons by both sexes. Meetings are held for mental discipline, as reading and speaking; others, for learning new songs, and trainings in singing; also for social converse, called "Union Meetings."

Theology, Synopsis of.—1st, God, a spirit Being, a heavenly Father and heavenly Mother. 2d, Mediatorial intelligences reveal God's character and his truths to man. 3d, Jesus Christ was one of these; was not God, but the Son of God. 4th, By birth of Mary, Jesus was simply highly organized man. 5th, By baptism of the Christ-spirit he became the Christ. 6th, Of this Christ-spirit, not of Christ, there was to be a second appearing. 7th, This was to be manifest in his glory—woman, the glory of man. 8th, In each of these dispensations its Church, while in union with and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, represents the Christ of that dispensation; the father, the Bridegroom, the batter, the Bride. 9th, The Head of Christ's church is neither man nor woman in a generic sense, but the Christ-spirit, and, possessed of this, either man or woman may teach and lead. 10th, Thus Jesus Christ (Jesus baptized) is the Son of God par excellence, the "Elder Brother" (Paul) of other sons of God, his true followers. In like manner we have daughters of God, females, baptized with the Christ-spirit. 11th, There are two creations, orders of humanity,—the old, instituted by generation through Adam, the sowing dispensation; the new, instituted by regeneration through Christ, the reaping, harvesting of the world, a new colony.

its vis vite; Christ, "the Lord from heaven," "the quickening Spirit in both male and female, its organic media; and, so far as light now revealed, these may run parallel for all time. 12th, Redeemed man and woman, by holiness of and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, constitute the subjects of the new creation, the heavenly kingdom of God. 13th, Reject vicious attachments. "My reward is with me, to give to every man according as his [own] work shall be" (Rev. xxii. 12). 14th, Reject carnal resurrection. The Christian resurrection is of the soul, from death by sin, to a life of righteousness. 15th, The day of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession and repentance of sin, comes to the Christ-life; or, having an offer, refuses the Christ-life. "Of myself [as Jesus] I judge no man." "As I [Jesus Christ] hear, I judge; and my judgment is just" (John v. 30). 16th, Election to salvation is of man's free will, when offered. "Whosoever will, LET him come and partake of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17). Election, choice of instruments for some specific part of the work in God's vineyard, because of constituted fitness, is preferred by superiors in the order of Heaven's anointing and choosing. Thus Jesus says, "I have chosen you." 17th, Probation extends to the spirit-world. Thus only can God be just. 18th, Physical death is not the gate to heaven nor hell: heaven is opened by good deeds; hell, by deeds evil. 19th, Heaven and hell are states of the soul, — the rewards of conduct and the rewards of judgment by the Christ tribunal. 20th, The end of the world has come to every soul who is born of the Christ-spirit. 21st, Old and New Testament scriptures, inspiration, revelation, eternal life of soul, the gospel-crown prize, and Christian experiences — all teach spiritualism: therefore the Shakers are Spiritualists. 22d, All carnal warfare is of the world, and has no part nor place in Christ's church and kingdom.

Position to the State. — Opposed to war; neither aid nor abet it, unless by compulsion, and under protest; will not fight with carnal weapons, though death be the price of refusal. Loyal to all the demands of peaceful civil government. Pay all taxes promptly, the State being responsible for use and appropriation thereof. Have no part in politics. Accept no governmental offices but postmaster, road-commissioner, and school officers.

Polity of the Community. — A true Christian community, patterned in conformity to the Christ-spirit, is the order of the kingdom of heaven, the answer to Jesus' prayer, "Thy kingdom come . . . on earth," etc. It is therefore a theocracy, of which the Christ-spirit is the leading authority, and is virtually the appointing power of the leaders of its society. By the perception, and in the wisdom and exercise of this spirit, not by a majority of votes, an order of ministry is appointed, consisting of two of each sex; these constitute the primary leading authority of the church. These nominate elders to lead the families in spiritual and social matters, and deacons to direct temporal business, generally two of each sex; they are confirmed as appointed by the general union and approval of the loyal covenant members, duly and publicly manifest. Two or more of each sex also are appointed as a board of trustees, to hold in trust the legal tenure of real estate, and keep and manage the personal property of the community. Other business-agents sometimes employed. The consecrators hold the property in usufruct: the consecration is God.

Eg-Laws of the Community are instituted for direction and protection of members. These are originated by the ministry and elders, and apply to the conduct of the community temporally, socially, and spiritually. They permit the com-mingling of the sexes in companies of several persons, when needed, in temporal employment, social converse, and worshipful devotion, but debar all carnal associations, all private correspondence, verbal or written. No two individuals of opposite sex allowed to work together alone, ride out, or walk out together alone or hold lengthy conversations together alone. Short and necessary errands permitted. The opposite sexes, in all cases, room separately, both members of the commune, and visitors sojourning among them. All persons, both old and young, have single beds.

Correspondence of Members, by letters, books, or papers, except business-letters by trustees and business-agents, is required to be open to the knowledge of the elders, and subject to their approbation. This is to prevent the intrusion of malfeasance, and the institution of cliques or private societies working against the community. Due regard is made to the feelings of novitiates. While in the communion of the saints all choose to dwell in the light, as God is light; and these compose that glorious galaxy of souls the revelator saw "standing on a sea of glass" (Rev. xv. 2). Nevertheless, espionage is rigorously discarded; and a liberal freedom of orderly and protective union and correspondence, both verbal and written, is encouraged and promoted. All good, moral, miscellaneous, religious, scientific, philosophic, historical, biographical, narrative, and literary books and periodicals are freely admitted.

LIT. — The society has of its own a limited literature, and several of its works are long since out of print. Those now most prominent in circulation are as follows. Testimony of Christ's First and Second Appearing, by BENJAMIN S. YOUNG of Union Village, O., printed at Albany, N.Y., 1856. Dunlavy's Manifesto, by JOHN DUNLAVY of Pleasant Hill, Mercer County, Ky., New York, 1847. Millennial Church, by CALVIN GREENE and SETH Y. WELLS of New Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1848. Testimony of the First Witnesses (contemporary with Ann Lee), by SETH Y. WELLS of Mt. Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1827. Brief Exposition, etc. (pamphlet), by SETH Y. WELLS and CALVIN GREENE, 1830. Plain Evidences of the Church of Christ (pamphlet), by JOHN DUNLAVY of Kentucky, New York, 1834. Tests of Divine Inspiration, by F. W. EVANS, New Lebanon, N.Y., 1853. On Revelation, United Inheritance, and Second Appearing of Christ, by WILLIAM LEONARD of Harvard, Mass., 1853. Shaker Compendium, etc., by F. W. EVANS of New Lebanon, 1859. Ann Lee, the Founder of Shakerism, a reprint of fourth edition of Compendium, London, Eng. The Shaker Manifesto, a monthly periodical from 1871 to date, now printed at Canterbury, N.H. Shaker Theology, by H. L. EADS of South Union, Ky., Albany, 1879. Plain Talks on Shakerism, a pamphlet by G. A. LOMAS of Watervliet, Albany, County, N.Y., 1883. Sketches of Shakers and Shakerism (pamphlet), by GILES B. AVERY, Mt. Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1883. Several of the foregoing have many editions: we give the late or latest edition. GILES B. AVERY

SHALMANESER (שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר; LXX., Σαλμαναζαρ; Assy., Salmanu-ussir, "Shalman, be gracious") was the name of several Assyrian kings, of whom only two are important for biblical history. — Shalmaneser II. (reigned B.C. 860-825) is not mentioned in the Bible, but was a contemporary of Ahab and Jehu of Israel, and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael of Syria, all of whom are named in one or another of his numerous inscriptions. From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Ben-hadad II. (whom he calls Dad-adler; i.e., Hadad-ezer) and about a dozen allied princes, at Karkar, between Halman (Haleb-Aleppo) and Hamath, B.C. 851. Among these princes was "Ahab the Israelite;" and in the danger from Assyria which was here realized we have one explanation of the "covenant" which Ahab made with Ben-hadad after he had conquered him (1 Kings xx. 31-34). Shalmaneser records again, that, during the western campaign of his eighteenth regnal year (B.C. 842), he received tribute from "Jehu, son of Omri." This designation of the king of Israel, who had destroyed the house of Omri, is one of the most striking tokens of the might which Omri and his real son, Ahab, had exercised. Dad-adri, i.e., Ben-hadad, was defeated by Shalmaneser four distinct times. — B.C. 851 (see above), 850, 849, and 846. Hazael is mentioned as suffering defeat, B.C. 842, and as losing some towns, B.C. 839. Shalmaneser appears, however, at no time to have reached Samaria, nor did he succeed in capturing Damascus.

The dates above given are secured by the statements of the Annals of Shalmaneser compared with the Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the years. This canon is absolutely fixed by the eclipse of the sun, which it mentions June 15, B.C. 763; and by the coincidence of Sargon's thirteenth regnal year (B.C. 709), his first year as king of Babylon, with the date given by Ptolemy's Canon for the first year of Ἀπύων (i.e., Sargon; see the art.), king of Babylon. But a difficulty arises when we compare the dates above named with those of the received chronology, according to which Ahab reigned B.C. 919 (or 918)–897 (or 896); Jehu, B.C. 884–856; and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael, correspondingly early. This is only another indication that the dates of the Hebrew kings as they now stand in the text of our Bibles are corrupt; the error in that part of the nineteenth century B.C. with which we are here concerned being for the kings of Israel, something more than forty years. (Cf. TIGLATH-PILESER, and see, for various attempts to solve the difficulty wholly or in part, J. WELLHAUSEN: Jahrb. f. Deutsche Theol., 1875, pp. 607 sq.; M. DUNCKER: Hist. of Jud. (Eng. trans., 1878–82), vol. ii. pp. 112 sq., 231, vol. iii. p. 16; J. OMRI: Salomon et ses Successeurs, 1877; W. J. BECHLER: Presbyterium Review, April, 1880; V. Geschichts-forschung*, 1878, pp. 299–356.)

Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria B.C. 727–722, is twice mentioned in the Bible, 2 Kings xvii. 3–5, xviii. 9. The former passage tells us that he came up against Hoshea, king of Israel, and that Hoshea submitted to him, and gave him tribute; that Hoshea entered into conspiracy with So (better, Sevech, 877, Sabakos, king of Egypt, as a punishment for which Shalmaneser bound him, and put him in prison; some interval doubtless occurred between the acts of verse 3 and those of verse 4. Finally, we are told that Shalmaneser "came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years." This took place, according to 2 Kings xviii. 9, in the seventh year of Hoshea's reign. Just before the fall of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, as we learn from the inscriptions of Sargon, his successor, who brought the siege to an end. (See SARGON.) Whether his death was natural or violent, we do not know. The only inscriptions concerned with his reign are an inscribed weight and two Eponym lists, which give us hardly more than the dates of his reign. With the expedition against Samaria was, perhaps, connected that against Tyre, which Josephus (Jud., ix. 11, 2) mentions on the authority of Menander. The hostilities against Tyre lasted five years, and cannot have been concluded before Shalmaneser's death.

SHAMMAI, a Jewish rabbi of the first century B.C., who founded a school directly antithetical to that of Hillel; so that it became a proverb, "Hillel loses what Shammai binds." Nothing is known of him personally. See art. SCRIBES.

SHARP, Cranville, English philanthropist, b. in Durham, 1734; d. in London, July 6, 1813. Disapproving of the government action relating to the American Colonies, he resigned (April, 1777) a position in the ordnance office, and devoted himself to study. Before this his course in befriending and successfully defending the negro slave Somerset from his master, who tried to regain him (but the Court of King's Bench declared that a slave could not be held in, or transported from, England), brought him into great notice, and determined his career. He thenceforth devoted himself to the overthrow of slavery and the slave-trade. He presided at the meeting which organized the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery (May 22, 1787). He was a good linguist and a pious man. See his biography by PRINCE HOARE (London, 1810), and bibliography in ATTORNEY.

SHARP, James, a Scottish prelate; b. in the castle of Banff, May, 1618; assassinated on Magus Muir, near St. Andrews, May 3, 1679. He was educated at Aberdeen; in 1640 was professor of philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews; in 1656 was chosen to plead the Presbyterian cause before the Protector; in 1660 he represented the same party when Monk marched upon London, and in that capacity was sent over to Charles II. at Breda, to provide for the protection and preservation of "the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation." This, of course, was understood in the Presbyterian sense; but in 1661 the Scottish Parliament annulled all the Parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus totally abolished all the laws made in favor of the Presbyterian Church. The "Church of Scotland" thus became the old Episcopal Church; and Sharp, in Dec. 12, 1661, was in London consecrated Archbishop of St. Andrews. With the zeal of a convert he persecuted his former allies. He re-erected the Court of High Commission in 1664, which severely punished, some even with death, all those who in any way interfered with the prelatical designs, and executed nine persons after the king had required the persecutions to cease. For his perfidy and cruelty Sharp was thoroughly detested; yet the assassins who despatched him were really on the lookout for one of his underlings, Carmichael, and had no intention at first of killing him. See HETHERINGTON, History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 205 sq., 250 sq.

SHARPE, Samuel, Unitarian layman; b. in London, March 8, 1799; d. there (Highbury) July 28, 1881. The last twenty years of his life were passed in retirement from business and assiduous biblical study. Although he had not the advantage of a university education, but was from early life a London banker, he yet acquired much solid information upon recondite subjects. He early became interested in Egyptology, and published Egyptian Inscriptions (London, 1836-41, 7 parts, 2d series, 1856, 4 parts), History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till A.D. 640 (1816, 6th ed., 1876, 2 vols.). To biblical literature he contributed a translation of the New Testament from Griesbach's text with notes (1810, 5th ed., 1862), a revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament (1865, 3 vols.), and History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869, 4th ed., 1882). These works, and others of less importance, abundantly attest the industry and learning of their author. See his biography by P. W. CLYDEX, London, 1883.

SHECHEM (shoulder), a town nineteen hundred and fifty feet above sea-level, thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 7), later in Samaria. It lies in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal on the north, and Gerizim on the south; called also Sichem (Gen. xii. 6), Sychem (Acts vii. 16), and Sychar (John iv. 5). It was destroyed in the Jewish war, but rebuilt, and, in honor of the Emperor Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis (new city). Hence in early Christian times it was called Neapolis only, as in the Talmud. From this name comes its present one, Nablus or Nablus. Shechem, under its various designations, is mentioned forty-eight times in the Bible, first in connection with Abraham, who halted there (Gen. xii. 6). There occurred the massacre of all its males by Simeon and Levi, in revenge for Shechem's insult to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.). There the Israelites solemnly dedicated themselves to God, and there Joseph was buried (Josh. xxiv.). Abimelech set up an independent kingdom there, but after three years was expelled, and the city was destroyed, and sown with salt (Judg. ix.). Jeroboam made the rebuilt city the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii. 1-19, 25). After the captivity, Shechem became the centre of the Samaritan worship. There Jesus first definitely announced himself the Messiah (John iv. 5, 26). Neapolis became the seat of a bishopric, and there Justin Martyr was born. It was captured by the crusaders, and Baldwin II. held a great diet there (1120). It has repeatedly suffered from earthquakes, particularly in 1202 and 1837. It was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1834; but its natural advantages, being in the midst of a most fertile country, have always caused its speedy resurrection.

The present town numbers thirteen hundred inhabitants, among whom are a hundred and thirty Samaritans, six hundred Greek Christians, and a few Jews, Latins, and Protestants. It is abundantly supplied with water, there being no less than eighty springs and fountains in its immediate neighborhood, and presents a picture of great beauty. Its principal buildings are the great mosque Jami el-Kebir, which is the Church of St. John, built by the crusaders (1167), and the little Samaritan synagogue (Keniset es-Samireh) in which is the famous Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch. Cf. art. "Shechem," in SMITH'S Dict. Bib.; SCHAEFF'S Bib. Dict.; "Sichem," RIEM'S Hud. d. bib. Alt.; BÄDEKER (Socin), 2d ed., p. 225.

SHECHI'NAH (residence, i.e., of God, his visible presence), THE, is post-biblical Chaldee, but adopted into Christian common use from the later Jews. The idea is, however, found in the Bible expression "the glory of the Lord." This "glory," the Jews say, was wanting in the second temple.

SHEM HAMMEPHORASH (Heb., peculiar name, i.e., Jehovah), a cabalistic word among the rabbinical Jews; the representative of a wonderful combination of twelve, forty-two, or seventy-two letters, whose pronunciation has astonishing results. Absurd stories are told by the rabbins respecting it,—how Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai in learning it from the angel Saxael; how its right utterance would enable the speaker to create a world; how Jesus wrought his miracles by its use; how two letters of it inscribed on a tablet, and cast into the sea, raised the storm which destroyed the fleet of Charles V. (1542). See BARKING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 291.

SHEOL, the Hebrew word (the equivalent of the Greek Hades) for the under-world, the place of the shades. It comes from a word meaning "to penetrate," "to go down deep;" hence Sheol is literally what is sunk deep, bent in. The Hebrews thought that the dead went down into deep fissures. See HADES, and Hebrew lexicon under שְׁאוֹל.

SHEPARD, Thomas, Puritan, b. at Towcester, near Northampton, Eng., Nov. 3, 1605; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 25, 1649. He was graduated M.A. at Emmanuel College, Oxford, 1627; "lecturer" at Earl's Coln three years and a half; became a preacher; was silenced for nonconformity by Laud, Dec. 16, 1630; employed as chaplain to Sir Richard Darcy, Buttercrambe, York-shire, for a year; pastor at Heddon, Northumberland, another year; sailed for America, December, 1631, but was compelled by a storm to put back, had to hide himself lest he should be taken, but finally got off, July, 1635, and landed on Oct. 3 at Boston, and became minister to the church at Cambridge in February, 1636. He played a prominent part in the synod at Cambridge which ended the Antinomian controversy. He "was characterized by great humility, spirituality, soundness in the faith, and decision." In learning, piety, and spiritual insight he takes a first rank among Puritan divines; especially is he held in perpetual remembrance by that "rich fund of experimental and practical divinity," his treatise, The parable of the ten virgins opened and applied, first published by Jonathan Mitchell, from the author's notes, Boston, 1659, 2d ed., 1660; reprinted in London, 1695, in Aberdeen, 1838, and again, 1853, with biographical preface by James Foote. In all he is said to have written 352 books and pamphlets. Among them may be mentioned New Englands lamentation for Old Englands present errors and divisions, Boston, 1611, 2d ed., 1615; Certain select cases resolved, 1618; The clear sunshine of the Gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England, 1618; reprinted, New York, 1865; Theses subalterne, 1619, 2d ed., 1655. A collective edition of his works, with memoir, was published, Boston, 1853, 3 vols. His Autobiography was published in Alexander Young's Chronicles of the First Planters of Massachusetts Bay, Bost., 1816. See COTTON MATHER: Magnum (ed. SHEPHERD, Thomas, b. 1665; d. at Bocking in Essex, Jan. 29, 1739; a seceder from the Church of England; published sundry sermons, and thirty Penitential Cries (1692), which were usually bound with John Mason's Songs of Praise, and with them reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1859. SHERLOCK. There are four literary divines of this name, who require different degrees of notice. — I. Richard Sherlock, b. at Oxtou in Cheshire, 1613, and educated at Oxford and Dublin; became rector of Winwick; and d. in 1689. He fell into controversy with the Friends, and wrote an Answer to the Quakers objections to Ministers answered. The same year, Quakers wild objections answered. The practical Christian (1673), by the same author, was valued by Wilson, bishop of Soder and Man, who enlarged and corrected and republished it in 1713. — II. William Sherlock, b. in London, about 1611; d. at Hampstead, June 19, 1707; educated at Cambridge University, where he went in 1657, and was successively rector of St. George's, Botolph Lane, London, prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of Thetford, Hertfordshire. He became master of the Temple in 1681. Refusing to take the new oath at the time of the Revolution, he was suspended for a while, but afterwards complied with the requirement of the law. This led to an immense amount of personal controversy; and Mrs. Sherlock's influence over her husband sharpened the wits, and elicited the ridicule of his opponents. He had before this been reproved by James II., through the lord-treasurer, and deprived of a part of his income, for preaching against Popery; but the most important incidents of his life were the publication of a book entitled The case of resistance to the supreme powers, stated and resolved according to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures (1681), and the subsequent publication of a work on the Doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation of the Son of God (1690). These involved him in much trouble; the first, relating to a constitutional question, exposed him to political attacks; and the second, touching a theological subject then much discussed, brought him into conflict with certain divines, especially the witty and violent Dr. South. Sherlock's idea was, that in the three persons of the Trinity there is what may be called "a mutual self-consciousness, a consciousness common to the three," and that therefore the three are essentially and numerically one. This brought down on the writer the merciless ridicule of South. The former was accused by the latter of being a Tritheist, and the latter laid himself open to the charge of Sabellianism. Sherlock, who is often called Dean Sherlock, from his attaining to the deanery of St. Paul's in 1691, was indefatigably industrious; his publications amounting to sixty all together, chiefly controversial, but including some on practical subjects. Amongst them the most important are, A Discourse concerning Death (1689), A Discourse concerning a Future Judgment (1692), A Discourse concerning the Divine Providence (1691), and other discourses on religious assemblies, the state of the good and the bad hereafter, and the immortality of the soul. — III. Thomas, known as Bishop Sherlock, son of the dean; was b. in London, 1678; was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1701; became master of the Temple, 1701; prebendary of St. Paul's, 1713; master of Catherine Hall (where he had been fellow), 1711; dean of Chichester, 1715; prebendary of Norwich, 1719; and bishop of Bangor, 1727, whence he was translated to Salisbury, and finally to London, 1748. He declined the archbishopric of Canterbury, and died in London, July 18, 1761. These rapid promotions could not but make a mark on his name, but his authorship is that which is most noticed by posterity. His principal works were, Discourses in the Temple Church, Discourses on Prophecy, and the Treat of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus. This last, published in 1729, is the best known, and for a long time held a distinguished place in the literature of Christian evidence. — IV. Martin Sherlock, an Irish divine of no great reputation, wrote Counsel to a Young Poet (1779), in Italian. Horace Walpole said that his Italian was ten times worse than his French, in which language he published, the same year, Letters of an English Traveler.

JOHN STODOLTON.

SHINAR (Heb. שִׁנָּר; LXX., Σινάρ, almost certainly, Assyro-Babylonish Sumér, of Akkado-Sumerian origin, with another probable form, Suager), the name of a country or district, is found in the following passages of the Bible: Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Isa. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. x. 11. In Gen. x. 10 it seems to be a general name for Babylonia; for it includes, besides Babylon, cities lying as far apart as Erech (Babyl., Uruk; modern Warka), lat. about 31° 10' N., and Accad (Agade, part of Sippara? see SEMIARVATIM), lat. about 33° 11' N. The same meaning is suitable for Gen. xi. 2, Isa. xl. 11, Dan. i. 2, Zech. v. 11. The language of Gen. xiv. 1, which speaks of Ellasar (Larsa; modern Senkerel), in nearly the same latitude with Erech, but farther east, as if it were not in Shinar, admits of explanation. It may be that "Arioch, king of Ellasar," (Babyl., Erivaku, king of Larsa?) was tributary to "Anraphel, king of Shinar:" in that case there is really no opposition here to what was said above.

In the form Šumēr (Shumér) the name occurs very frequently in the Assyrian inscriptions, but is there applied to only a part of Babylonia. "Šumēr and Akkad" is a frequent designation of the entire region extending between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris (occasionally overstepping these limits), from Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf. "Akkad" was a name for the northern part of this region; "Šumēr," probably, for the southern part. The northern boundary of Akkad was not easily fixed with precision; but it apparently lay about lat. 34° N., between the points where the Lower Zab and the Turnat flowed into the Tigris. Neither can we draw an exact line between Akkad and Šumēr; but the inscriptions represent Erech as in Akkad, and Ur (modern Mugheir, probably Ur Casdim of Genesis), lat. about 30° 51' N., as outside of it. If, then, the Hebrews came from the district of Šumēr, it is not strange that they should use this name in a general sense for Babylonia, especially in view of the wide sovereignty exercised by the kings of Šumēr, which seems implied in Gen. xiv. 1. It is believed that Meḥabba and Magan are other designations of Akkad and Šumēr respectively.

The significance of these divisions dates from a time when both Šumēr and Akkad were inhabited by a highly cultivated, non-Shemitic people, to whom the Shemitic Babylonians and Assyrians were indebted for the larger part of their civilization, and whose influence has been by no means confined to the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was this people who invented the system of cuneiform characters: they had literature, art, and science. (Cf. CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.) It is quite likely that their earliest settlements were in Šumēr; and Ur, Eridu, and the city whose remains have been found at Tell Loh, must have been centres of political and religious influence at a very ancient time; no dates, however, can be now given with confidence. It is certain that the later Babylonian tradition attributed a high antiquity (about B.C. 1000) to the Shemitic civilization of Akkad, and the non-Shemitic culture must have been much earlier than the Shemitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See SEMIARVATIM.

The distinction between Akkad and Šumēr appears to have been not merely geographical, but also linguistic: the language used in one had certain dialectic peculiarities, as compared with that of the other. These peculiarities are few, and of limited application: they are such as the appearance of m or d in the dialect, for g in the normal language, and of e in the former, for u in the latter. The number of texts composed in the dialect is, as far as is now known, comparatively small. It is still disputed, whether the name "Akkadian" belongs to the normal language, and "Šumerian" to the dialect, or the reverse; i.e., which of the two was the language of Northern, and which of Southern Babylonia. In favor of the view that the normal language was that of Akkad, and the dialect peculiar to Šumēr, it is claimed, that, while the dialect is sometimes called Šumē-sal ("women's language"? the reason for this name is in doubt), it is also called Šumē-ku ("language of the master"); and, since "Land Šumē-ku" is a name for Šumēr, the desired inference is plain. Akkad is called, on the other hand, "Land Šumē-luh" ("land of slaves' language"). It is further claimed that the name Šumēr itself, and the name Kingī, another designation of the same district, show characteristics of the dialect; that Tinūr and Kadīngīrra, on the other hand, names of Babylon, which was in Northern Babylonia, belong by their form to the normal language; that one inscription which contains dialectic peculiarities bears the colophon "Tablet of Šumēr:" another argument is drawn from the fact that many loan-words in the Shemitic language are borrowed from the normal language, it being held that Shemitic contact with the pre-Shemitic civilization must have been chiefly in Akkad, etc. To these arguments it is replied, that the Šumē-sal is identical, not with the Šumē-ku, but with the Šumē-luh, that the dialect belongs therefore to Akkad; that Šumēr was a North Babylonian form of the normal Šumgēr, this latter lying at the foundation of the Hebrew שִׁמְרִי, Shinar, and that Kingī is not a dialectic form at all; that Kadīngīrra may have been pronounced Kadīnairra (dialectic form); and that Tinūr, although the normal form, may simply indicate that people from Šumēr founded the city, and is therefore consistent with the view that the normal language belonged to Šumēr; that in the inscription with the colophon "Tablet of Šumēr," the dialectic peculiarities occur only in citations, the body of the text being neither Akkadian nor Šumerian, but pure Shemitic; and that many loan-words in the Shemitic language, and those such as belong to the common speech of everyday life, are derived from the dialect, and not from the normal language. It is further urged, on this side, that the names of places mentioned in the texts of the dialect denote cities in Northern Babylonia, or Akkad, and that the converse, though the instances are fewer, is also true; i.e., that Šumerian cities are mentioned in texts of the normal language; that the sea (Persian Gulf) is mentioned frequently, and as something familiar, in the texts of the normal language; that texts of the old Šumerian king Gudea, discovered at Tell Loh, show no dialectic peculiarities; that the Hebrews coming from Ur (in Southern Babylonia) carried the name שִׁמְרִי with them; this name corresponding to the normal, not the dialectic, form of the word (see above), etc. The problem cannot yet be regarded as fully solved: but the weight of evidence seems at present to be in favor of this latter view; namely, that the normal language is entitled to the name Šumerian, and the dialect to the name Akkadian. The comparative age of the normal language and the dialect is also in dispute, with arguments too technical to be given here. Further discovery and discussion are needed to put these matters beyond controversy.

SHIN-SHIU, or "REFORMED" BUDDHISM, is claimed by its followers to have been founded A.D. 381 in China, by Hwui-yuen, who established the worship of Buddha Amida (the Eternal), or Amitabha (the Bud of Infinite Light), the fourth of the five Dhyanī Buddhas. It was then called the "White Lotus School." Pupils were sent to India, who collected Sanscrit texts, and translated them into Chinese. Three translations of the smaller, and twelve of the larger, Sukhāvatī-gyāna (the Description of the Land of Bliss) were made, of which two of the former, and five of the latter, are in existence. Recently the original Sanscrit text of the sutra on which the religion of Amitabha is founded, and which was taken from India to China in the second century of our era, has been found in Japan. The cardinal doctrines of the sect are salvation by faith in the boundless Buddha, or Amida, and the hope of attaining bliss in the western paradise. The Chinese translations of Sukhāvatī-gyāna were known in Japan from 610 A.D.; but the Jōdō-shinshū ("True Sect of the Pure Land") was not founded until 1173, at Kioto, by the priest Hōnen, whose pupil Shinran still further developed the protestant features of the system. Shinran married, and thus set the example of revolt against priestly celibacy, made worship more attractive and sensuous, while translating the sacred books into the vernacular, making missionary journeys, and preaching the cardinal tenet of the new faith, justification by faith, not in works, long prayers, masses, liturgy, fasting, and penance, but in Amida Buddha, the boundlessly merciful. In some respects "Reformed Buddhism" resembles Protestantism, while the other Buddhist sects have many of the features of Romanism.

Shinshū, or "True Sect," is the most numerous, the most active, and perhaps the most enlightened, sect of modern Buddhism, and numbers in Japan alone ten million adherents, with its chief temple and "archbishop" at Kioto. Of two Japanese students of this sect, studying under Professor Max Müller at Oxford, one, Mr. Bunin Nanjio, has collated the ancient text recently discovered in Japan with the Sanscrit manuscripts of the Sukhāvatī-gyāna found in Europe, and compared with them the five authorized translations now in use, to discover which of these latter is the best. The publication of this original text of their sacred book, which has been likened to the issue of the Greek text of the New Testament by Erasmus, is the latest proof of their protestant principles; thus testing the purity of the stream by tasting of the fountain. The Buddhism of Shakyā Muni does not, however, acknowledge or know of this Amida Buddha, nor is it heard of in Burmah or Siam. Rhys Davids: Buddhism, p. 206 speaks of Amida as the fourth of "these hypothetical beings, the creations of a sickly scholasticism, hollow abstractions without life or reality." Dr. E. J. Eitel (Religion in China, p. 153), after showing how the doctrine of Nirvāna failed to satisfy the cravings of humanity, says, "It was to satisfy this want that the fiction of the 'Peaceful Land in the West' was framed. A Buddha was imagined distinct from the Buddha of history, Gautama, or Shakyā Muni. He was called Amitabha, 'boundless age.'" See BUDDHISM.

SHINTO (Sintonism) is the cult of the primitive Japanese. Japan is now classified among Buddhist countries; since the vast majority of her thirty-three millions of people worship according to the doctrines, greatly modified, of Shakyā Muni. (See SHIN-SHIU.) Since 552 A.D., when the first images and sutras were imported from Corea by missionaries of the India faith, Buddhism has been steadily propagated in Japan. Conquest was not made in a day or century, but it required fully a thousand years to convert the Japanese from their indigenous faith. Nor was the victory secured by overthrow or extirpation of the primitive belief, but rather by absorption of it. This will account partly for the fact that Japanese Buddhism, so different from that of Siam or China, is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or overlaying Shinto, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintoists were formed, such as Riōn ("twofold," i.e., of Shinto and Buddhism mixed), Yūitsu (Buddhism with a Shinto basis), Dōguchi (Shinto explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Dōguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chün-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in the Mikado's empire. Passing by these later developments, we shall outline the characteristics of pure Shinto, which is interesting as "a natural religion in a very early stage of development, which perhaps originated quite independently of any natural religion known to us;" that is, "neither by revelation, nor by introduction from without." The native term Kami no michi ("way or doctrine of the gods") is rendered by two Chinese characters, Shin ("god") and to ("way"), equivalent to theology. Its scriptures are the Kopki ("Record of Antiquities"), a collection of oral traditions reduced to writing A.D. 712, in pure Japanese, uncolored by any but native ideas; the Nihongi ("Chronicles of Japan"), composed 720 A.D., containing, in the main, similar narratives to those in the Kopki, but cast in the mould of Chinese philosophical thought and expression; and the Engishiki ("Book of Ceremonial Law"), promulgated in A.D. 927, in which are found many odes and prayers that are, on good grounds, believed to antedate the introduction of letters in the third or fourth century.

According to the sacred books, the universe comes into existence prior to the gods who after ward populated it. "Of old, when heaven and earth were not yet separated, chaos, enveloping all things like a fowl's egg, contained within it a germ. The clear and ethereal substance, expanding, became heaven; the heavy and thick, precipitating, became earth. Subsequently deity was born." The first kami sprouted upward like a rush. After successive evolution of several pairs of gods in imperfection, sex or differentiation was reached by the perfect manifestation of the creative principle in Izanagi and Izanami, who proceeded to make and furnish the earth. Standing in the floating region of heaven, Izanagi plunged his jewelled spear into the plain of the green sea beneath, and, stirring it round, withdrew the point, from which the drops, trickling, consolidated, and formed an island, to which the creator and creatrix descended to make other islands, and populate and furnish them with kami (gods), rocks, trees, soil, vegetation, and animals. Gradually the earth and sun separated; though, before they did so, the brilliant daughter of the first pair ascended to reign over the luminary of day, while a less fortunate son became ruler of the moon. Japanese mythology is full of the adventures of Izanagi and Izanami, not only on earth, but in the nether world. With the reign of Amaterasu, the sun-goddess in heaven, a new epoch begins. This heaven-illuminator, dissatisfied with the anarchy that reigned among the earthly kami, or gods, sent her agents to earth to restore order, and abolish feuds. None was able to do this work, until she despatched her grandson, Ninigi no Mikoto, who descended to the earth; and, after a series of violent struggles between the heavenly and the earthly powers, the grandson of Ninigi no Mikoto established his throne near Kioto, and became the first emperor of Japan. The mikado is thus the personal centre of Shintō, and the vicar of the heavenly gods on earth,—the pope, who claims both spiritual and temporal power over his subjects. In the primitive government of Japan the Jin-gi Kuan, or Council of the Gods of Heaven and Earth, was the highest legislative power next to the mikado. In Shintō scriptures the earth is Japan, and the mikado's palace the most sacred of all places. The nobility claim their descent from inferior deities; the mikado, directly from the sun-goddess. The common people are the progeny of the earthly kami, though all claim Izanagi and Izanami as their creators.

In its essence, Shintō is ancestor-worship. In the earlier mythology the kami seem to be but the deified forces of nature, but the later traditions and the liturgy show that the gods addressed are hero-ancestors. After the division of the country by its first conquerors into feudal divisions, the chieftain and his kin, selecting one of the "heavenly gods," made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shintō is that the miyas, or temples, are austere and simple, containing no idols, images, or statues of heroes, no paint, gilding, symbols, or any thing sensuous, except the temporary offerings, or their permanent substitute, the gohei, which are strips of notched paper suspended from unpainted wands; nor can this absence of effigies of the gods worshipped be explained by the rudimentary condition of art in early Japan, since figures, in terra cotta or carved wood, of men, horses, and birds, were known and employed in the interment of the dead,—a merciful substitute for the human beings anciently buried alive with their departed master. Living animals were dedicated to the gods, but were not slaughtered. In front of the shrine was the bird-rest (tori), on which the cocks perched to give notice of dawn and the time for morning-prayers. This "sacred gateway," now so called, is still a striking feature in the landscape of Japan. Prayers were offered for protection, health, freedom from evil, for offspring, and for harvests; and thanksgivings were especially profuse at festival time, when offerings of silk, cloth, rice, weapons, horses, and equipments, were made. The root-idea of sin was pollution, and, of righteousness, purity. Actions were good or bad according as they were concerned with purification or defilement. Lustrations were frequent; and twice a year the festival of general purification took place, both at the imperial palace and at each one of the chief local shrines. Polluted persons were washed in the waters of running streams, and their clothing was destroyed. Later, paper figures representing the people, and an iron image of the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. "And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the men of the offices who serve in the court of the Sovran, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven." All offences were divided into "earthly" and "heavenly,"—a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, house, looms, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and hunters and fishermen (the aborigines). Between these two classes there would at first be continual trouble. "The so-called heavenly offences are chiefly such as would be possible only in an agricultural community, or to agriculturists living in a population of hunters and fishermen." It is nearly certain that the invaders of primitive Japan were warriors from Corea or the Asian mainland, who, after coming across the sea, gave out that their ancestors had come down from heaven. They were thus the descendants of the heavenly gods, while the aborigines whom they conquered were but the progeny of the earthly kami, or gods. It was by this combination of superior theology with superior weapons and prowess, that the over-sea invaders finally secured supremacy. In the first rude ages, when government was partly patriarchal and partly feudal, private property was scarcely known; and hence trespass and defilement, revenge and sacrilege, were offences more common than the sins usually catalogued in codes of more complex or modern society. Left by itself, however, Shintō might have developed codes of ethics, systems of dogma, and even a body of criminal and civil law, had not the more perfect materialistic ethics of Confucius, and the more sensuous ritual of Buddhism, by their overwhelming superiority, paralyzed all further growth of the original cultus; still there might have been a re-action, and the old faith have re-asserted its power, had not an Euhemerus appeared, who resolved Japanese mythology into Buddhist history. A learned priest named Kukai (A.D. 771-835), canonized as the great teacher Kōbō, professing to have received a revelation from the gods at the Mecca of Shintoism at Ise, promulgated a scheme of reconciliation, according to which the chief deities of Shintō were avatars, or manifestations of Buddha to Japan prior to his perfect incarnation in India. All the legends, dogmas, cosmogony, and traditions of the primitive cult were explained according to Buddhist ideas; and the old native gods, baptized with Buddhist names, were henceforth worshipped according to the new and more sensuous ritual. Under this new teaching, Shintō as it was sunk out of popular sight, and its remembrance was cherished only by scholars. After the long wars of the middle ages, and the establishment of profound peace by Iyēyāsi and the Tokugawa rulers, a school of writers arose in the eighteenth century whose enthusiasm led them to recover, decipher, and edit the scriptures of Shintō, and to enrich the native literature by a very creditable body of antiquarian and polemical writings, which helped greatly to prepare the way for the revolutions of 1868 and later, which have so surprised the world. Yet after the restoration of monarchy in Tōkiō, and the temporary revival of Shintō as manifested in propaganda, and purging of some old temples, the Jim-gi kuan, instead of being restored to ancient power, was degraded to a department, and finally abolished. The shrines and priests (of the latter, in 1880, 11,215) are now maintained partly by government appropriations, and partly by popular subscriptions. Shintō is still a living power among millions of the people, who oppose Christianity with patriotic animus rather than with martyr's convictions. It is also the source of occasional polemic literature. Japanese Christians, in whom the sense of patriotism is very strong, hold to the narratives of the Kojiki in a rationalizing way, explaining them on the theory of the solar myth, phonetic decay, or according to similar reasoning. Mr. Takahashi Gorō, a Christian writer, in his Shintō Discussed Afresh, follows this plan. Two English scholars, Mr. Ernest Satow and Mr. Basil Hall Chamberlain (to whose labors the writer of this article is greatly indebted), are now engaged in translating portions of the original literature of Shintō, as seen below.

SHIRLEY, Hon. Walter, b. 1725; d. 1786; was rector of Loughrea in Ireland, and cousin of Lady Huntingdon, whose celebrated Collection of Hymns he revised in 1771, inserting six of his own, which were above the standard of that time in elegance, and have often been copied. He also published two poems, Liberty and The Judgment (1761), and some sermons. F. M. BIRD.

SHISHAK (favorite of Ammon, 1 Kings xi. 46, xiv. 25 sqq.; 2 Chron. xii. 1 sqq.), king of Egypt, the first Pharaoh of the twenty-second dynasty; called "Sheshenk" upon the monuments, and "Sesonchis" upon Manetho's list. It was he who received the fugitive Jeroboam (1 Kings xi. 10), and, perhaps at the instigation of the latter, invaded the kingdom of Judah in the fifth year of Rehoboam, and spoiled the temple and the palace (1 Kings xv. 25 sqq.). On his return home he wrote an account of his victory upon the walls of a temple on the south of the great temple of Karnak. In the long list of towns ("fenced cities") which he captured appear many of Judah and of Israel; so that Shishak invaded the northern kingdom as well as the southern. The most interesting name is Judha Midek, "the royal Judah" (not the king of Judah). See art. REHOBAM. Cf. EBERS, in REIM: Handb. d. bib. Alt. s. v. "Sisak."

SHOWBREAD is the rendering of the Hebrew lechem hap-panim (lit., "bread of the face," because placed before the face of Jehovah); it is also called "bread of the ordering" (1 Chron. ix. 32, xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xiii. 11; Neh. x. 33); once it is called the "continual bread" (Num. iv. 7), and "holy bread" (1 Sam. xxi. 5). According to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve loaves were placed on the table, which stood within the holy place, near the curtain of the Holy of holies. The loaves, which, according to Jewish tradition, were unleavened, were placed in two rows, of six loaves each. An addition to the showbread was the frankincense (Lev. xxiv. 7). It was to be "on the bread for a memorial, an offering, made by fire unto the Lord;" the two golden pots containing it being (according to Josephus: Ant., III. 10, 7) taken out along with the bread, and the frankincense burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was given to the priests to be eaten. On each sabbath this took place; twelve new loaves, which had been prepared the evening before by a portion of the Levites (1 Chron. ix. 32), being made every returning sabbath to replace the old, and fresh frankincense put in the golden vessels in the room of that which had been burned (Lev. xxiv. 8, 9).

The significance of the showbread is expressed in the words "from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant;" they are a sign of covenant made by Israel,—a sign whereby they continually prove their connection with the Lord. The loaves are a symbol and type of the spiritual bread, which the people of God presents as a visible, practical proof before the Lord, an emblem of Israel's spiritual work in the field of the kingdom of God. That the priests alone were permitted to eat them, and this only within the sanctuary, would indicate, Be diligent in good works, and you shall live in the house of God as a priestly people, and shall receive from his communion salvation and blessing. The frankincense which was burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was eaten was an offering made unto the Lord, whereby Israel was symbolically reminded, and at the same time confessed, that every fruit with which it appears before the face of God it owes to the Lord, and for which it is to praise him. LEYRER.

SHOWBREAD, Table of the. According to the description given in Exod. xxv. 23-30 this table was two cubits in length, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, made of shittim-wood, overlaid with pure gold, and having a golden crown to the border thereof round about. This table, which is called "the table of the face" (Num. iv. 7) and "the pure table" (Lev. xxiv. 6; 2 Chron. xiii. 11), stood on the north side of the sanctuary, and was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, etc., which were of pure gold (Exod. xxv. 29). When it was transported, it was covered, with every thing that was thereon, with a cloth of blue (Num. iv. 7). In 2 Chron. iv. 19 we have mention of "the tables whereon the showbread was set," and at verse 8 we read of Solomon making ten tables. This is probably explained by the statement of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 7), that the king made a number of tables, and one great golden one on which they placed the showbread. The table of the second temple was carried away by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 22), and a new one made (1 Macc. iv. 49). Since the table was made only for the showbread, its symbolic signification cannot be a peculiar one; and, whatever it may mean, it can only be explained in connection with the showbread.

SHRINE (Lat., scrinium, a case for keeping books, etc.), a repository for relics, whether fixed, such as a tomb, or movable. The term is also sometimes applied to the tomb of an uncanonized person. Shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in religious processions, were kept behind and above the altar; and before and around them lamps were burning.

SHRIVE, to confess sin; hence Shrove-tide, the time immediately before Lent, when it was customary to confess as a preparation for the forty days' fast; and Shrove-Tuesday, the day before Ash-Wednesday, which was spent merry-making, and so, in England, came to be called "Pancake-Tuesday," from the fritters and pancakes eaten on that day.

SHRUBSOLE, William, b. at Sheerness, Kent, Nov. 21, 1759; d. at Highbury, Aug. 23, 1829; a devout and active layman; was an officer of the Bank of England, of the London Missionary Society, and of the Religious Tract Society. He wrote two much used missionary hymns (1795), and that beginning "When streaming from the eastern skies" (1813), often attributed to Sir Robert Grant. F. M. BIRD.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, D.D., Church of England; d. in London, July 14, 1751. He was graduated M.A. at Caius College, Cambridge (1720); was successively curate of Shelton, Norfolk, prebendary of Canterbury (1735), and rector of Allhallows, Lombard Street, London. He is the author of the famous Connection, intended to supplement Prideaux's work, but only finished to the death of Joshua. The full title is, The sacred and profane history of the world connected from the creation of the world to the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the death of Sardanapalus, and to the declension of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the reigns of Ahas and Pekah, London, 1727, 4 vols., 3d ed., 1743; rev. ed. by J. SHUSHAN (Heb., שׁוּשַׁן; LXX., Σοῦσα, accus., Σοῦσα, gen. and dat., Σοῦσαν, Σοῦσος; Elamit., Susim; Assyr., Susim, etymology unknown), generally known as Susa, the capital of Elam or Susiana, is mentioned in the Bible as Susa; Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2, 5, ii. 3, 5, 8, iii. 15 (t.), iv. 16, viii. 14, 15, ix. 6, 11-15, 18; Dan. viii. 2; cf. "Shushanchites," i.e., "men of Shushan" (Ez. iv. 9). It was situated on the river Eulaeus so Dan. viii. 2, and Assyrian inscriptions and sculptures, which formerly emptied into the Persian Gulf, and must, at all events in its lower part, have been identical with the Pasitigris and the modern river Karūn. The ruins of the city are buried in the mounds of Shush, lat. about 32° 10' N.; long. about 49° 48' E. from Greenwich; but these mounds lie forty miles distant from the present course of the Karūn at its nearest point, and this might at first sight seem to favor the statement of some classical writers, that Susa was on (or near) the Choaspes (modern Kerkhah), which flows to the west of Shush. Loftus, however, who visited the spot, was told that the Kerkhah was once connected with the Karūn, and found the ancient river-bed, through which the water must have flowed, about two miles east of Shush. It is, then, quite possible that this was regarded as the Eulaeus, which in its lower part was certainly the same with the Karūn, and which, it is thus natural to suppose, may sometimes in its upper part have passed under the name of the Choaspes.

Elam was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrians in their campaigns; but Susa is not mentioned until the time of Asurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king (B.C. 668-626), who captured it about B.C. 655. After the fall of Assyria and Babylon, and the accession of the Achæmenidan kings, Susa became the winter and spring residence of these monarchs, and was greatly improved and adorned by them. According to the Book of Esther, there were great numbers of Jews in it. Alexander found great wealth there, and even after his time it preserved a reputation for riches. Under the Parthian Arsacide (B.C. 250-A.D. 226) it continued to be a chief city, but thereafter declined; and after its capture by the Mohammedans, A.D. 640, it is heard of only from time to time, e.g., in the eighth and twelfth centuries. Its site has been even yet but very imperfectly explored, owing to the extreme difficulties which attend excavations, arising in large part from the bigotry and fierceness of the present inhabitants of the region.

SIBBES, Richard, D.D., Puritan; b. at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1577; d. at Cambridge, July 5, 1635. He was successively student and fellow of St. John's College, and lecturer of Trinity Church, Cambridge; preacher of Gray's Inn, London, 1618-25; master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge. His best-known works are The braised rood (to which Baxter attributed his conversion) and The soul's conflict (1638). He wrote, also, The returning backslider, or a commentary upon Hosai xiv. (1639), and A learned commentary, or exposition upon the first chapter of second Corinthians (ed. by T. Manton, 1655). See his Complete Works, with memoir by A. B. Grosart, Edinb., 1862, 7 vols.

SIBEL, Caspar, b. near Elberfeld, June 9, 1590; d. at Deventer, Jan. 1, 1658. He was educated at Herborn; studied theology at Leyden; and was appointed pastor at Randerath in 1609, at Juliers in 1611, and at Deventer in 1617. He was a very prolific writer, and left a number of sermons, homilies, catechetical and devotional works, besides an autobiography (unfinished). Of his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1641, in 5 vols. folio.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS. The sibyl is "the half-divine prophetess of the arrangements and decisions of the gods in reference to the fate of cities and countries" (LÜCKE: Versuch einer vollstand Einleit. in die Offenb. Joh., 1852, pp. 66 sqq.). Etymologically it is probably the same as Σοῦς βροχία, the Æolic form for Σοῦς βοῶν. Hieronymus (Adv. Jov. i. 14) derives it from θεο-βοῶν. Earlier classical writers recognize but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythrae, or Cumæ; later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas' Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lübker, 6th ed., p. 327.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. When, after the conquests of Alexandria, the period of religious syncretism was introduced, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted with the pseudo-prophecy of the Gentiles, they made use of her influence to make their peculiarities of religion and life palatable to the Greeks. Still more did the early Christians endeavor to make propaganda of their views in this manner; so that there were Gentile, Jewish, and Christian sibylline oracles. In the earlier centuries they enjoyed a high authority in the church, being quoted as evidences of the truth of Christianity by such apologists as Athenagoras, Justinus, Theophilus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and especially Lactantius. (Cf. ΒΕΛΛΑΧΟΣ: De l'emploi que les Pères de l'Eglise ont fait des oracles sibyllins, Paris, 1851.) These different oracles, as many as have been preserved, originating at different places, in different times, and by authors of various tendencies, are now united in twelve books and some fragments, written in Homeric hexameters and language. In former times but eight books were known, which were published first by Nystus Betulejus, Basel, 1815. Angelo Mai in 1817 discovered the twelfth book, and in 1828 the ninth to twelfth books. C. Alexandre (1811-56) published the first complete edition in Paris (2d ed., 1867), and Friedlieb, in 1852, published a critical edition, together with a metrical translation into German. The contents are most varied. After two fragments of a general character, book i. (400 lines) describes the creation of the world, the five generations to Noah, the Deluge, and prophecies concerning future nations; book ii. (315 lines) exhorts to an upright life, and prophsies the destruction of all the wicked; book iii. (828 lines) contains three sections of prophecies concerning the good and the evil, book iv. (196 lines), prophecies of various kinds and the tenth generation; book v. (531 lines), the fate of various nations and the better future for the Jews; book vi. (28 lines), Christian prophecy concerning the Messiah; book vii. (162 lines), the Messiah and his times, with surrounding circumstances; book viii. (591 lines), prophetic concerning the destruction of Rome and its lands at the final consummation, together with messianic predictions; book ix. (321 lines), address to all the nations, and predictions; book x. (298 lines), the Latin race and its fate; book xi. (173 lines), the fate of different nations in the east and west; book xii. (360 lines), admonitions and prophecies, closing with the glory of Israel. In a collection of this sort, naturally no unanimity as to author, date, country, object, etc., of the various parts, can be expected among the investigators; and in reality but a small portion has been thoroughly examined. The most searching work in this respect was done by Bleek in his articles Ueber die Entstehung und Zusammensetzung der uns in 8 Büchern erhaltenen Sammlung Sibyllinischer Orakel (Theol. Zeitschrift, herausg. von Schleiermacher, de Witte, u. Lucke, vol. i., 1819, pp. 120-216, vol. ii., 1820, pp. 172-239), and his conclusions have found general acceptance among scholars. The prophecies which we have here collected into one volume extend over a period of from five to six centuries. The majority of the books are of little or no importance historically. Religiously, however, as the index to a certain train of thought and spirit in certain times and places, they are not only interesting, but also instructive. The following results can be regarded as safe: book iii. (97-807) is the production of an Alexandrian Jew in the Maccabean period (170-160 B.C.), combined with two older poems of heathen origin (97-161, 133-188) and later Christian interpolations (36-92), and dates from the second triumvirate (40-30 B.C.). All the other books, with the exception of the fifth, which is yet sub judice, are of Christian origin. The third book is in every way the most important, and in it three sections can be traced (97-291, 295-188, 189-807). The first section, after an historical survey from Kronos to the Romans, begins with 161 to prophesy, that, after the seventh king of Hellenistic origin shall have ruled over Egypt, then the people of God will again come into power, and the evil nations of the earth will be destroyed. The second section pronounces a judgment on all nations who directly or indirectly have stood in opposition to the Israelites. The third section predicts the final judgment, and finishes with the promise of a messianic kingdom and glory. The statement about the seventh king, as well as the epithet μεγαλειος ("republican") applied in 176 to Rome, points to the days of Ptolemy VIII. (Physkon), as the date of writing. This is thus pre-Christian, as are also lines 34-92. (Cf. DUMMOYD: The Jewish Messiah, 1877, pp. 11 sqq.) Since the prophecies concerning the Messiah and his rule in the other books are intertextum post eum, those of the third being, as was seen, pre-Christian and of Jewish origin, are really the only ones of special value in the whole collection. As the section of 286 refers to Cyrus, and the vion θωος of 775 should be vion θωος (cf. SCHÜRRER: N. T. Zugesch., p. 567, these two passages are not messianic. But the whole section 652-795 is messianic. God will send a king from the rising of the sun (ἀπὸ ἡλίου), who will put an end to all war on earth. The Gentile rulers will rise up against him and the temple, but they will be destroyed around Jerusalem. God will then establish an eternal kingdom over all nations. Peace will reign over the whole earth, and the laws of God will be recognized and obeyed everywhere. The main stress lies on the establishment of this everlasting kingdom, the person of the Messiah as the medium of its establishment being of minor importance. The later and younger section (lines 36-72) finds its historical background in the career of Anthony and Cleopatra in Egypt. Vv. 46-50 read, "But when Rome will rule also over Egypt, then the greatest of kingdoms, that of the immortal king, will appear among men, and there will come a holy king (ἅγιος ἀνὴρ), who will rule all the lands of the earth for all times as long as time continues." This king is naturally God or the Messiah. Cf., in addition to the works mentioned, HILGENFELD: Die jüd. Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtl. Entwicklung, 1857, pp. 51-90; *Ztschrift f. wiss. SICARI (assassins), a set of Jewish fanatics who did much to hasten the war which terminated so disastrously, and on the downfall of Masada went to Egypt, where they continued to resist the Roman power (Josephus: Antiq., XX, 8, 5, 6; Jar., II, 13, 3, VII, 10, 1). See JUDAS OF GALILEE, ZEALOT.

SICKINGEN, Franz von, b. in the castle of Ebernburg, near Kreuznach, May 1, 1481; d. in the castle of Landstahl, near Zweibrücken, May 7, 1523; one of the heroes of feudalism, always at war with the powerful and arrogant, always defending the suppressed and meek, but specially famous for the great services he rendered to the Reformation. He enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian, and, in the beginning, also that of Charles V.; but in 1522, when he attacked the Archbishop of Treves, he openly declared in favor of the Lutherans. The undertaking proved too great for his means; and he was, in his turn, besieged in his own castle by the archbishop, and compelled to surrender the day before his death. Reuchlin, Ulrich von Hutten, Butzer, Ecolampadius, and numerous others, found at various times a refuge at Ebernburg; and his castles were justly called the "Asylums of Righteousness." His life was written by F. MEYER, Stuttgart, 1827, 2 vols. G. H. KUTTEL.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, b. at Penshurst in Kent, Nov. 9, 1551; d. at Arnhem in the Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1586, was educated at Shrewsbury, Oxford, and Cambridge; went abroad in 1572, and narrowly escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; became a courtier and diplomatist; was married and knighted, 1583; wished to join Drake's second expedition in 1585, but was forbidden by Elizabeth, who feared to "lose the jewel of her dominions;" was made governor of Flushing, and general of horse; and was mortally wounded at Zutphen, Sept. 22, 1586, marking the event by an illustrious act of humane magnanimity. This model gentleman did not omit religion from the list of his accomplishments, as may be seen by his noble sonnet, "Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust," and by the version of Psalm made in conjunction with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. His poetic talent, if not lofty, was more than respectable. His Works appeared in 3 vols., 1725, 1739, etc. His Poems were edited by Mr. Grosart in 1873. His Arcadia and Defence of Poesie, once popular, are still famous. F. M. BIRD.

SIDONIUS, Michael, b. at Esslingen in Baden, 1506; d. in Vienna, Sept. 30, 1561. He studied theology at Tübingen, entered the service of the Archbishop of Mayence, and was by Paul I. made bishop of Sidon in partibus infidelium, whence his surname Sidonius; his family name was Helling. He represented for some time the Archbishop of Mayence at the Council of Trent, and the emperor in the negotiations of Ulm. By the latter he was made bishop of Merseburg in 1550, and in the colloquy of Worms (1557) he took a prominent part. He was very active, though without exercising any influence, and the mediating position he tried to occupy between Romanism and the Reformation he had not strength enough to vindicate. He wrote the Catechismus Moguntinus. NEUDECKER.

SIENA, Council of. The Council of Constance ended in a general confession of incompetence to deal with the question of the reformation of the church. It strove to keep the matter open, by providing for the recurrence of general councils, and fixed Pavia for the meeting-place of the next, in five years' time. Accordingly, in 1423, Martin V. summoned a council at Siena; but scarcely had it met, when the outbreak of a plague gave the Pope a pretext for transferring it to Siena, where it would be nearer Rome, and more under the Pope's influence. On July 2, 1423, the council assembled at Siena. It was scantily attended; for European politics were disturbed, and few hoped that anything would be done by a council held in Italy. The council began by a contest with Martin V. about the wording of his safe conduct, and negotiated with the citizens for greater security. Martin V. complained of this conduct as seditious, and the Papal party used personal pressure to intimidate the Reformers. The council agreed in condemning the heresies of Wiclif and Hus, and approving of negotiations for union with the Greek Church. The French then pressed for a consideration of the reforms projected at Constance. The Papal party took advantage of the small numbers present to throw the machinery of the council, which was organized by nations, into confusion. They contrived to have a disputed election to the office of president in the French nation, and urged the appointment of deputies to fix the meeting-place of the next council. This question awakened national animosities, as the French wished to secure the choice of some place in France. Finally, on Feb. 19, 1121, Basel was chosen as the meeting-place of the next council, to be held in seven years. After this, the dissolution of the council was felt to be imminent. The citizens of Siena vainly offered their aid to any who would stay, and brave the Pope. The council slowly dwindled, till on March 7 the Papal legates, taking advantage of the solitude produced by the festivities of the Carnival, posted on the door of the cathedral a decree of its dissolution, and rode away from Siena. A few zealous Reformers still wished to stay; but on March 8 they agreed, that to avoid scandal to the church, and danger to themselves, it was better to disperse quietly. The council came to an end without any results. Really, it followed too soon on the Council of Constance. The position of affairs had not changed since then; the Pope had not recovered his possessions in Italy; those who had been at Constance were not prepared to renew their labors when there was no hope of success. The only achievement of the Council of Siena was that it fixed the meeting-place of the Council of Basel.

SIEVEKING, Amalie, a distinguished philanthropist of noble birth; was b. in Hamburg, July 25, 1791; d. in Hamburg, April 1, 1859. Left an orphan at an early age, she took up her home with an elderly relative, and began at a tender age works of charity, by instructing a girl living in the house. From this beginning there grew a school, which enjoyed an enviable reputation in Hamburg. Her mind was deeply interested in the organization of a Protestant sisterhood, but was diverted from the realization of her plans, for a time, by the aversion of her relative. At the outbreak of the cholera in 1831 she offered her services to the hospital at Hamburg, and remained in attendance upon the sick for eight weeks, when the plague had abated, winning for herself general esteem by her courage and devotion. The year following, 1832, she realized her design, and formed the female society for the care of the sick and the poor. The society grew rapidly, and became the mother-institution of similar organizations in other parts of Germany. A careful record was kept of each case: those with whom poverty was a chronic disease were not aided. Money was never distributed; orders on the butcher, grocer, etc., were given instead. While the primary object of the society was to alleviate physical ills, it did not overlook the needs of the soul. See Lebenswirklichkeit aus d. Leben von A. Sieveking, SICEBERT OF GEMBLOURS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; was b. in Belgium about 1030; was educated at the convent of Gemblours; became monk; in 1048 went to Metz as master of the school at St. Vincent's Convent; returned to Gemblours, 1070, and, after laboring there as teacher for forty years, died Oct. 5, 1112. He was a man of simple piety and integrity, as well as of distinguished scholarship. Although he was himself devoted to the monastic life, he opposed the view that the masses of married priests were invalid, and wrote against Gregory's celebrated letter to Hermann of Metz, claiming for the Pope the right to pronounce the ban upon the emperor. Sicebert gives a list of his writings in his book De viris illustribus, a work of not much value. His most famous and last work is the Chronicon, which appeared for the first time before 1106, and for the second time, with the author's corrections and additions to 1111. It is a rather dry chronicle, after the model of Eusebius and Beda. It was the author's aim to give a chronological survey of the world's history, and to gather together the legends of the saints. Taking up his work at 381, where Jerome and Prosper had left off, he gives no matter of any value till 1023; but the history from 1024 to 1111 is to be regarded as original and important. Sicebert never wittingly misrepresented facts. For a long time his work was the principal text-book of church history in the convents of Belgium and Northern France. SIGISMUND, Johann, Elector of Brandenburg, 1608-19; was educated in the Lutheran faith, but converted to the Reformed, and partook for the first time, together with his brother and the English ambassador, in the Lord's Supper, administered according to the Reformed rule, in the Cathedral of Berlin, on Christmas Day, 1613. Shortly after, he published his confession of faith, which accepted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Confessio Augustana, but rejected the Formula Concordia, and various later Lutheran additions, such as the passion of the divine nature of Christ and the omnipotence of his human nature, the ubiquity of Christ's body, etc. In a country which was strictly Lutheran, among whose inhabitants it was quite common to call a dog "Calvin," and whose theologians had at their fingers' ends no less than three hundred arguments to prove that the Reformed doctrine was worse than any which could have been invented by the Devil, the step which the elector made was not without danger. Nevertheless, he succeeded in gradually allaying the commotion, and placing the Reformed denomination on equal terms in the state with the Lutheran. Before he died, Reformed theologians were appointed professors in the university of Francfort-on-the-Oder. [RISCH: Reformation d. Sigismund, ed. Bohm, Leipzig, 1875.] W. HOLLFELDER.

SIGOURNEY, Lydia Howard Huntley, b. at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 1, 1791; d. at Hartford, June 10, 1865; started a private school at Norwich, 1809, and at Hartford, 1811, and in 1819 married a merchant of Hartford. She began to write verse at seven, and published in 1815 her first book, Moral Poems in Prose and Verse. Her Poems, Religious and Eclogue, a selection from former books, appeared in London, 1811, during or after her visit there. In all, she published fifty-nine volumes, largely poetical, and chiefly on sacred or moral themes. She was long counted the first of American female poets. Many hymns by her, some of them from Nettleton's Village Hymns (1821), may be found in the various collections; but none is of the first merit or the highest popularity. Her autobiography appeared as Letters of Life in 1866. She was a Baptist. F. M. BIRD.

SIHOR, i.e., "the dark," is a name common to three rivers. (1) The Nile (Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 15), called by Greeks and Romans, "the black," from the black mud which it carries along during the time of the inundation. (2) The river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xi. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Isa. xxvii. 12), the "Si-hor which is before Egypt" (Josh. xiii. 3), "Si-hor of Egypt" (1 Chron. xiii. 5), "the river to the great sea" (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 25), which, formed through the confluence of many wadis, falls into the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish, between Pelusium and Gaza. During the summer it is almost dried up. Gesenius (Thesaurus, iii. 1393) thinks that this also refers to the Nile. (3) The Si-hor-libnath, i.e., "black of whiteness," mentioned only Josh. xix. 26. The Vulgate and Septuagint take it as two rivers. Some think that it is the present Nahr Namun (the ancient Belus), which drains part of the plain of Akka. Reland conjectures that it means the Crocodile River, probably the Nahr Zorah. But this, however, is too far south; since Dor was not within the limits of Asher. Masius and Michaelis refer it to the Nile. LEYER.

SIMEON, Archbishop of Thessalonica, a great scholar, an ardent friend of the monks, and a passionate adversary of the Church of Rome; lived at the close of the fourteenth and in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and left a great number of works, some of which have been printed (e.g., Kata hieronim, Jassy, 1683); while extracts from others have been published by LEO ALLATIUS, in De Simeonem scriptis, Paris, 1661, and by JACOB GOAR, in Euchologium Græcorum, Paris, 1617. NEUDECKER.

SIMEON, Charles, Church of England; b. at Reading, Sept. 21, 1759; d. there Nov. 13, 1836. He was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and from 1783 incumbent of Trinity Church in the same city. He may be considered the founder of the Low-Church party. His "evangelical" preaching at first encountered opposition; but eventually he made many converts, and exerted a wide influence. He established a society for purchasing advoynsons, and thereby was able to put his sympathizers at strategic points. He published a translation of Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon; to which he added notes and a hundred sermon-skeletons, and subsequently published such outlines (2,536 in number) upon the entire Bible (Horæ Homileticæ, London, 1819-28, 17 vols., new ed. with addition of remaining works, but all under the same title, 1832-33, 21 vols.). See his life by W. CARIS, London and New York, 1847.

SIMLER, Josias, b. at Cappel, in the canton of Zürich, 1530; d. in the city of Zürich, July 2, 1576. He studied at Basel and Strassburg, and was in 1552 appointed professor at Zürich in New-Testament exegesis. Besides his De republica Helvetiorum, which was translated into foreign languages and often reprinted, he published several christological treatises, partly against the Polish freethinkers, partly against the Anabaptists. — Responsio ad F. S. M. librum, etc., De filio Domini et Sacerdote nostro, etc., etc. His life was written by J. W. STUCKLI, Zürich, 1577.

SIMON BEN YOCHAI, the celebrated rabbin to whom the authorship of the book Zohar is generally ascribed; lived in the second century of our era. After the miserable failure of the rising under Bar-Cocheba, the rabbins gathered at Jamnia, where a school was established; and Simon was sent to Rome in order to obtain from Antoninus Pius a greater freedom, both of teaching and worship, for his co-religionists. He was a man more feared than loved, learned but obscure, strict but harsh; but he had acquired a great fame, even among the Pagans, for secret knowledge; and his mission was successful. After his return, however, he denounced Roman religion and institutions with such a vehemence that he was impeached, and sentenced to death. He fled, and lived for several years as a hermit in a cave, until, after the death of Antoninus, he was allowed to settle as a teacher at Thekoa, whence he afterwards removed to Tiberias. During his hermit-life he is said to have written the Zohar; and though several parts of that book cannot belong to him, because mentioning teachers who were later than he, there can be no reasonable doubt that some parts were actually written by him. SIMON (hearing), the Name in Biblical History. The name Simon, or Simeon, has its origin in the patriarchal family of Jacob; it occurs very seldom in the pre-exilic Jewish history, but very often in Jewish history after the exile, and this, without doubt, on account of the theocratic significance which from that time on is attached to that name. The explanation lies in the history of Simon, the son of the patriarch (see TRIBES), and in the difference of opinion which prevailed about it before and afterwards.

1. THE NAMES OF SIMEON IN THE FIRST POST-EXILE PERIOD. — I. Simon the Just (Joseph. : Antiq., XII. 2. 5), son and successor of the high priest Onias I., grandson of Jaddes. He held his office in the first decades after 300 B.C. In the Talmud he is greatly glorified. In his person the high priesthood and hierarchical authority were combined. The eulogy in Eccles. i. 1 sq. refers, according to Hody, Jahn, Winer, to our Simon.

2. Simon II., son of Onias II., lived in the time of Ptolemy Philopator (221 B.C.), and is said to have prevented the king from entering the temple and Holy of holies.

II. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE MACCABEAN PERIOD.—1. Simon, the grandfather of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 1).

2. Simon. The Benjamite, a governor of the temple, who informed the Syrians, in the time of Seleucus Philopator (186 B.C.) and Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C., 2 Macc. iii.), concerning the treasures of the temple. Having quarrelled with the high priest, Onias III., he went to the Syrian Apollonius, informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodorus to rob the temple.

3. Simon, surnamed "Thassi," second son of Mattathias, and last survivor of the Maccabean brothers. He deserved well of his people, which acknowledged his merits by appointing him prince and high priest. The document which mentions this fact throws a remarkable, though a little heeded, light upon the messianic hope of the people during the entire post-prophetic period, when it reads: "And it hath pleased well the Jews and the priests that Simon should be their prince and high priest forever, until there arise a trustworthy prophet" (1 Macc. xiv. 11). In the reserve at the end of the clause the theocratic conscience of the people and priests has evidently reserved the right of the Messiah, but with a disheartened expression; for to say that the advent of the Messiah was near at hand meant at that time to do away with the Maccabean dynasty. In accordance with this supposition of an exclusive opposition between the advent of the Messiah and the political dynasty, the Idumean Herod had all the children killed at Bethlehem. John the Baptist, however, preached the advent of the messianic kingdom mostly under the protection of the Roman Government.

III. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE GOSPEL HISTORY.—(1) Simon Zelotes, see below; (2) Simon Peter (q.v.); (3) Simon, father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71, xii. 1, xiii. 2, 26); (4) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36 sq.); (5) Simon the leper of Bethany, in whose house Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 6 sq.; Mark xiv. 3 sq.; John xii. 1 sq.); (6) Simon of Cyrene (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26). Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. Besides these names, other Simons are mentioned: (1) Simone in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke iii. 30); (2) Old Simon, who took the child Jesus upon his arms (Luke ii. 25); (3) Simon usually designated Simon Peter; and (4) a Simon the father of Gamaliel.

IV. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE APOSTOLIC HISTORY.—(1) Simon Niger (Acts xiii. 1); (2) Simon Magus (q.v.), the counterpart of Simon Peter; (3) Simon, the tanner of Joppa, in whose house Peter tarried many days (Acts ix. 13). The counterpart of Simon, the apostle and brother of the Lord, is Simon of Geraza, who plays a remarkable part in the Jewish war (Joseph. Jewish War, II. 5, 1). It is worthy of notice that the blind Jewish people at Jerusalem rather followed a certain Simon and John in order to be destroyed, than the apostles John and Simon, who offered them the salvation in Christ, and who had to leave the city with the Christians.

V. SIMON ZELOTES (Luke vi. 15, Acts 1:13), otherwise called "the Canaanite" (Matt. X. 1; Mark iii. 18). The term "zelotes," which is peculiar to Luke, is the Greek equivalent for the Hebrew term kanan, preserved by Matthew and Mark. As the surnames of the apostles express their characteristics, we see that this Simon already had the right name as Simon, inasmuch as the same reminded of the theocratic spirit of zealotry of older times. It is characteristic that the zealot Simon is the brother of Judas Lebbaeus or Thaddeus; and, if we may take into consideration the contrasts which we find so often among brothers, we may suppose, that, in the occurrence in Mark iii. 31 sq., James, and perhaps also Jesus, who not even belonged to the apostolic circle, took a prominent part; whilst in the narrative telling us of the ambition on the side of Jesus' brethren, Simon and Judas took the lead. According to Eusebius (iii. 1) and Nicephorus (iii. 16), this Simon, after the death of James the Just, was made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles. As this must have taken place soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, we may suppose that Simon already before that time led the Christians to Pella (Euseb., iii. 5). And since he was crucified at the age of a hundred and twenty (about 107 A.D., Hegesippus by Euseb., iii. 32, 1, Cotel. ed., Const. apost., 7, 16), we may surmise with certainty that as bishop he directed the affairs of the Jewish-Christian Church at Pella-Jerusalem in the spirit of union with the Gentile Christians, whilst Bishop John directed the Gentile-Christian Church of Asia Minor more in the spirit of union with the Jewish Christians. That Simon should have preached in Egypt, Cyrene, Mauritania, Lybia, and in the British Isles, where he is said to have been crucified, is mere fiction. J. P. LANGE.

SIMON MACCABÆUS. See MACCABEES.

SIMON MACUS heads, in the early church, the list of heretics. From Irenæus (i. 30) on, he is known as the heresiarch, and is called by Ignatius (Ad Trull.) the first-born of Satan. In the middle age his name gave the designation to that lowest practice of the church, the sale of spiritual offices, simony. The biblical account of Simon is found in Acts viii. The sacred writer connects his name with dark and magical arts, and represents him as endeavoring, by means of them, to secure a large following. The impression he made upon the people is vouched for by the title they gave him, ὁ δυνάστης τοῦ μεγάλου καλεῖσθαι ("The Power of God, which is called Great"), by which was meant that the highest divine potency was revealed in him. Under the influence of Philip's preaching and miracles he offered himself for baptism. But his request of Peter, to purchase the miraculous power of the apostles with money, abundantly proves that he wished to perpetuate his authority over the people. Condemned by Peter for his audacious and ungodly request, he craved the apostle's intercession; but, as most of the commentators hold, his last word breathes dread of the supernatural power which he did not possess, and not repentance. Turning to the ecclesiastical tradition, which represents Simon as the father of all those heresies with which men endeavored to corrupt the church, we must believe, that, in his subsequent history, he opposed Peter, sought to tan the opposition of the Samaritans to the Jews, and perhaps gave himself out as the Messiah. We shall now give a survey of the accounts current amongst the Fathers concerning his personal fortunes and his system.

1. Simon's Personal Fortunes.—The first post-biblical author to mention Simon is Hege-sippus (Euseb.: H. E., iv. 22), who states that he belonged to the Jewish sects with which the heretical corruption of the church originated, the Samaritans being counted among such sects. Justin Martyr, himself born in Samaria, has more to say about him; and his account, with that of the Acts, forms the firm foundation of all subsequent accounts. According to him, Simon was born at Gittion, Samaria, and was revered by the majority of the Samaritans as the most high God; and his attendant, Helena, whom he had found in a brothel at Tyre, was his héra. He visited Rome under Claudius, and created such an impression by his magical arts, that the Senate and people worshipped him as a god, and erected to him a statue bearing the inscription to the "Holy God Simon" (Simoni Deo Sancto). Hilgenfeld and others have supposed that Justin confounded a Samaritan village with Kittium in Cyprus, but without sufficient reason. The strange statue was explained by a discovery, in 1581, of a marble pedestal bearing the inscription, Simoni sacro Deo fidio sacrum Ser. Pompejus . . . donum dedit. Justin, without doubt, was misled by this inscription. The Clementine Homilies speak of Simon's parents, and his education in Greek and magic at Alexandria, and represent him as originally one of the thirty disciples of John the Baptist. He travelled about with Helena, giving himself out as the highest power, superior to the Creator of the world, and representing Helena as having descended from the highest heaven, and being the mother of all and of wisdom. Many magical tricks are attributed to him. He commanded statues to walk, walked without injury in the fire, transformed himself into a serpent or goat, opened locked doors, etc. The relations between him and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. They held a disputation in Casarea Stratonis, which lasted three days. Simon travelled from place to place, spreading calumnies about Peter, but ever pursued by the apostle, until finally, at Antioch, Simon was compelled by the latter to confess his own collusion with Satan, and the apostle's right to the claim of a true apostle of Christ. Another series of traditions cluster around Simon's sojourn at Rome. Grimm's statement, that the entire early church connected Peter with Rome, which he visited to oppose Simon, is not true of the first two centuries. Tertullian follows closely Justin and Irenæus, who do not connect Peter with Simon's sojourn there. The case is different in the third century, when Hippolytus speaks of Simon's controversy at Rome with the apostles Peter and Paul. The magician, seeing his influence waning, ordered himself to be buried alive, alleging he would rise again the third day. His disciples did as he desired, but found him dead on opening the grave. Here Simon's sojourn at Rome is put in the reign of Nero, while Justin puts it in the reign of Claudius. Henceforth the story of the Roman meeting between Peter and Simon is associated with the Clementine descriptions. Thither the magician fled, pursued by the apostle. His death is differently related. According to some, he promised to fly to heaven, and in fact did succeed in flying, until, stopped by the prayer of Peter, he fell dead to the earth. According to others, overcome with shame and chagrin, he threw himself from a rock (Const. Ap., vi. 8 sqq.; Arnob.: Adv. gentes, ii. 12; Cyrill.: Hieros., vi. 15, etc.).

2. Simon's System.—The Fathers agree in representing Simon as the coryphaeus of the heretics, from whom came the devilish poison of heresy. From Justin on, a communion or sect is spoken of who recognized him as leader, or worshipped him as God. Justin expressly speaks of the "Simonian system" (Apol., ii. 14). Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian (De an., 57), Origen, and even Celsus, speak of the sect of the Simonians. Epiphanius and Eusebius speak of its gradual disappearance, and Theodoret, of its extinction. The Simonian teachings gradually take on the form of an elaborate gnostic system. Simon is the highest power, the father over all. Helena is the prolific mother from whom he gets the idea of creating angels and archangels. She brings them forth; and they, in turn, create the world. These angels, which do not know their father, out of jealousy detain their mother in captivity. Confined for centuries, she passes from one female body to another, until she at last is found in a brothel at Tyre. Simon descended from heaven, and freed his lost sheep, and emancipated those who believed in him from the world and the service of the angels who created it. This is in general the view of Tertullian (De an., 31), Hippolytus (v. 19 sqq.), Epiphanius, and, in part, Theodoret. Hippolytus (v. 7 sq.), however, speaks of another and quite different Simonian system, and mentions a writing by Simon, the ἀποκαταστάσις (the Great Denial). Simon, as the great power above all, is called the τὸν ἐν, a designation which the Clementines and Clemens Alexandrinus also mention. Jerome (Com. in Matth., cxxiv.) preserves Simon's words to this effect: "I am the word of God, I am the light, the paraclete, the all of God."

The following may be said concerning the growth and development of the Simonian sect. Simon was originally the false Messiah. A sect of Samaritans sprung up who worshipped him as the most high God. Around his person was formed a gnostic system compounded of mythological and Christian elements. Baur (Manich. Syst., 468 sqq.) was the first to show that the myth of Simon and Helena was a modification of the Phœnician mythology: the sun-god (Mel-quarth, Baal) representing the male, and the moon-god (Astarte) representing the female principle. These two principles are represented as a syzygy from which all things that exist have been developed. The fall is connected with the woman, and redemption with Simon, who descends from heaven, and makes the highest revelation. See MOSHEIM: Institut. h. eccl. antiq. sect., i. 389 sqq.; SIMON: Leben u. Lehre Simon's d. Mag., in HILGEN'S Zeitschrift, 1811; the different works upon Gnosticism; and MÖLLER: *Gesch. d. SIMON, Richard, the founder of biblical isagoges; b. at Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there April 11, 1712. He early became a novice of the Oratorians; but, as the prescribed ascetical practices embarrassed his studies, he left the order, and studied with private support in Paris. His connection, however, with the Oratorians, was not altogether dissolved. In 1662 he again entered the order as novice, having obtained permission to continue his studies; but he never felt at home in the order. The Oratorians were at that time rather successful competitors of the Jesuits in the field of education, and this circumstance drew them nearer towards the Jansenists. But Simon, so to speak, a rationalist by nature, felt averse to the Jansenists; and these conflicting tendencies made his position in the order somewhat difficult. He was first sent to Juilly to teach philosophy, but afterwards appointed at the library of the order in Paris to catalogue its Oriental manuscripts, — a task which was fully congenial to him, and of great advantage in his biblical studies. After the publication, however, of his great work on isagoges, he was again compelled to leave the order; and the latter part of his life he spent mostly in his native city, in literary retirement.

The earlier works of Simon have no special interest. — Fides ecclesie orientalis (1671), a translation from the Italian of Gaudini's "Travels among the Maronites" (1675); Comparaison des cérémonies des juifs avec la discipline de l'Eglise (1681); Histoire de l'origine des revenus ecclésiastiques (1681), etc. But in 1685 appeared his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, and it was followed by his Histoire critique du texte du N. T. (1689), Histoire critique des versions du N. T. (1690), and Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T. (1693). The first part of the work was done in 1678. It was passed by the censor, and printed; but its publication was retarded on account of the dedication to the king. Meanwhile, some stray copies began to circulate, and attracted attention; and Bossuet, on this occasion acting in unison with the Jansenists, succeeded in having the work suppressed. The whole edition was destroyed; and only a few copies, in the possession of private persons, were saved. From one of those copies the Amsterdam bookseller, Elzevir, made a very incorrect edition in 1679; and from that edition Noël Aubert de Versé made his Latin translation, 1681. Finally, the author himself, who in the mean time had left the order of the Oratorians, published an authentic edition at Rotterdam, 1685. It was anonymous, but the other parts of the work bear the name of the author.

The work in its totality is the first scientific attempt at writing the history of the Bible considered as a literary product; and, in view of the immense amount of research which since that time has been bestowed on the subject, the idea of such an undertaking commands respect, both on account of its originality and on account of the courage it presupposes. The execution bears, of course, the marks of its time, of the scantiness of the materials and the insufficiency of the tools at the disposal of the author; but it cannot be denied that it also bears the marks of his narrowness and peculiarities, his hobbies, and his antipathies. The amount of criticism which the work called forth was enormous; and as Simon was a somewhat ticklish person, of a not altogether lovely temper, he could overlook nothing. The first attacks, by Weil, a converted Jew from Metz, and Spanheim, Prussian ambassador in London, with the responses of Simon, are added as an appendix to the Rotterdam edition of the first part. But more vehement and more protracted controversies ensued, with Isaak Voss, Jean le Clerc (Clarius), and others. Generally speaking, the literary history of the work is very interesting, as most of the questions brought forward in the controversies were new; but it is also difficult, as Simon published most of his answers pseudonymously.

Having criticised so many other translations of the Bible, Simon at last undertook to make one himself. The works appeared in 1702, in four volumes, printed at Trévoux, without the name of the author. It was soon discovered, however; and Bossuet took pains to gather from the translation a sufficient number of heresies, especially of a Socinian color. The book was forbidden, first by episcopal authority in some single dioceses, then by royal authority in the whole kingdom. Simon did his utmost to avoid the verdict, but in vain. Among his later works are Lettres choisies de M. Simon (1700-05, 3 vols.), and Bibliothèque critique (1708, 3 vols.), both of which contained striking evidences of the immense learning of the author, and valuable contributions to the literary history of the time. His papers and his excellent library he bequeathed to the cathedral of Rouen, but during the Revolution most of them disappeared. See the elaborate and reliable biography of Richard Simon by K. H. GRAY, in Strassburger theol. Beiträge, 1817, pp. 158-212; [also G. MASSON: Richard Simon, London, 1807; and A. ED. REISS.

SIMON OF TOURNAI lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century as teacher of philosophy and theology in the university of Paris. He was the first who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to theology, which circumstance filled his lecture-room to overflowing, but also seems to have made him crazy from vanity. Matthew Paris tells us that one day he exclaimed, "O Jesus! what have I not done for the consolidation of thy doctrine, though I could have done so very much more for its destruction!" after which he lost the powers of speech and memory, and had to learn his letters over again; but he never reached farther than spelling the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Thomas Cantimpratus ascribes the famous saying about the three impostors — Moses, Christ, and Mohammed — to him. But Henry of Ghent, who was a canon of Tournai, and doctor of the Sorbonne in 1280, and who, consequently, ought to know, says nothing of those stories in speaking of Simon. None of his works have been printed, but they are said to be in perfect harmony with the doctrinal system of the church. C. SCHMIDT.

SIMONY is, according to canon law, the heaviest of all ecclesiastical crimes (delicta maiora ecclesiastica), and has found its most pregnant description in c. 21, § 1; c. 1, q. 1. The name is derived from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 18); and by degrees, as the view developed of ordination by the laying on of hands by the bishop as a communication of the Holy Spirit, and the power of forgiving sin, the buying and selling of ordination naturally became a crime against the Holy Spirit. The idea gradually extended to the buying or selling of any ecclesiastical offices, and, in the controversy between the Pope and the emperor concerning investiture, it formed the principal weapon in the hands of the Pope. Later on, the idea extended still farther: it became simony to obtain admission to a monastic order by money, or to buy or sell the right of ecclesiastical patronage. SCHETRL.

SIMPLICIUS, Pope 468-483, was a friend of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and took part in the Monophysite controversy by condemning Timotheus Ailurus, Petrus Mongus, John of Apamea, Paul of Ephesus, and Peter the fuller. He is commemorated by the church on March 2. NEUDECKER.

SIN. 1. A city of Egypt, which is mentioned only in Ezek. xxx. 15, 16, in connection with Thebes and Memphis, and is described as "the strength of Egypt." It is identified in the Vulgate with Pelusium, "the clayey or muddy" town, and seems to be preserved in the Arabic Et-Tineh ("tineh" signifying mud). Pelusium is famous for the many battles fought here. Here Sethon drove back the army of Sennacherib, and here Cambyzes defeated Psammenitus (Herod., II. 141, III. 10 sq.). The Persians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16. 42 sq.).

2. A wilderness between Elim and Rephidim, where the Israelites arrived on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure out of the land of Egypt, and where they received quails and manna. It is generally held to be the region near the source of Markha, south of Ras Zelima, the northern part of the plain el kaa, which reaches from the south end of the Heroopolitain Gulf to the mouth of the Wady Taiyibeh in the north. Its desolate aspect appears to have produced a most depressing effect upon the Israelites. [Cf. Exod. xvi. 3.] LEYHER.

SIN. Though Scripture gives no definition of the idea of sin, it leaves no elements of the doctrine of sin unnoticed, but gives a full account of how sin penetrated into human nature by the fall of man, how it develops into special acts through the self-determination of man, and how its power is finally broken by the atoning sacrifice of God. This account is the basis of the whole historical development of the Christian dogma of sin: the impulses which pushed on the development it derived from the steadily increasing clearness and depth with which the ideas of freedom and necessity, and their reciprocal relation, were conceived.

The older Fathers, the apologists, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch, as well as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Methodius, defined sin as opposition to the holy will of God, and affirmed that such an iniquity involved death as its necessary consequence. But, though they were well aware that sin had spread throughout the whole human race without leaving one single human being as an exception, they did not put that universal state of iniquity in any necessary connection with the fall of Adam. Every single sin, they taught, is an act of free will, and, in its relation to the sin of Adam, only a repetition; and consequently an infant is as incapable of committing a sin as unable to do any thing good. Even Tertullian, though he taught that the sinfulness of human nature, with death as its consequence, is propagated by generation (corpus tradit animae), asserted that man in his natural state had still the power to do good, that the natural state of man was not one of sin and guilt. It was first during the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine that people became conscious of the contradiction between sin as an act of individual freedom and sin as the result of organic necessity. Pelagius and his adherents, Celestius, Julian of Eclanum, and others, held that the propagation of sin by generation is unthinkable; that good and evil are not born with us, but done by us: that man has now the same nature as Adam had when he was created; that sin is an act of free will, etc. Thus the concupiscentia, or that sensual movement from which, when not governed by man, sin originates, is not an effect of the sin of Adam, but, like death itself, an element of the very nature of man; and between the sins of Adam and those of his offspring there is no other connection than that of example and imitation: the power which sin exercises over man is simply the power of habit. Augustine, who in his earlier writings spoke with marked composure about Manichæism, but who afterwards absolutely submitted to the idea of a total change of human nature, spiritual and physical, as the result of the first sin, placed against the Pelagian views the following propositions: that the sin of self-justification and disobedience which Adam committed with free self-determination completely corrupted his whole nature: that the corruption consists in concupiscentia, or the dominion of the lower sensual instincts over the spirit, which unfits man for good, and makes it impossible for him to escape sin by his own power; that the corruption and its consequence, death, are propagated by generation, which means that sin is hereditary sin (vitium originis, peccatum originale), and the offspring of Adam a massa perditionis; that the natural state of man is not only one of sin, but one of guilt and punishment, as sin and guilt are correlative ideas, etc. Between these two extremes Semi-Pelagianism reared its system, according to which man, though the victim of hereditary sin, and subject to death, has still a desire for good. His powers have been weakened; he is neither completely dead nor fully alive; he is sick. But the liberum arbitrium has not been lost. In vindicating the freedom of the will, however, Semi-Pelagianism actually oversteps the dividing-line between Pelagianism and Augustinism, and sides with the former; and it continued to incline that way, even in the milder forms which it developed after its condemnation.

In the East, John of Damascus, the systematizer of the theology of the Greek Church, taught that death, and the loss of communion with God and converse with the angels, are the necessary consequences of the first sin, and are propagated by generation and birth. But he knows nothing of an unfitness for good and an hereditary guilt propagated in the same manner: on the contrary, according to him, man is still as free as Adam was on the day of his creation; and the image of God, in which man was created, and which consists in reason and a free will, has not been lost. The later Greek theologians, Theodorus, Studita, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, and others, followed in the same track. In the West the subject received a very peculiar treatment by John Scotus Eriugena. In his system of Platonizing philosophy, he ascribed to sin, not as Augustine did, a relative, but an absolute, necessity; and thereby he really destroyed the sin idea. Sin, he said, is an element of human nature, just as evil is an element of the universe; and consequently sin is just as necessary for the perfect development of human nature, as evil for the perfect development of the universe. But by itself evil is only something, negative, the mere negation of good, and has no positive existence, as little as sin. Eriugena, however, exercised very little influence on this point; and, generally speaking, mediæval theology may be said to have left the subject nearly in the same state in which it received it. Of the schoolmen, Anselm of Canterbury, Peter the Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas expounded the dogma on the basis of the category of necessity; Abelard, Duns Scotus, and the Scotists generally, on the basis of the category of freedom. According to the former, sin is disobedience to God, caused by pride, and the sinfulness of the race is the effect of the fall of Adam. In Adam, the person corrupted nature (peccatum originale originans); in his offspring, nature corrupts the person (peccatum originale originatum). Consequently, although the senses are by themselves not of the character of sin, and only enter as an element into the single, actual sin, hereditary sin is, nevertheless, truly sin, and the unbaptized infant is justly damned. In this sense of the word, neither Abelard nor Duns Scotus recognized the existence of hereditary sin. That which was lost by the fall of Adam was, according to Duns Scotus, the justitia originalis; and the Scotists in general laid great emphasis on the free activity of man, a circumstance which aided them considerably in the defence of the doctrine of immaculate conception. In all essential points of the doctrine of sin the mystics of the middle ages agreed with the schoolmen. To them, too, sin had its root in the innermost core of the human personality, the self, the I, and consisted in the turning-away of the creature from his Creator; while the Cathari, the Albigenses, and other mediæval sects, sought the source of sin in the very body of man.

A deeper conception of the dogma was prepared by the Reformers through the clearer consciousness of sin to which they appealed. On the one side, Protestantism awakened a more vivid feeling of the unity of the race and the organic necessity of sin; on the other, it more strongly vindicated the individual person, and proclaimed the freedom of the will as one of its chief principles. A new and fuller mediation between the two opposite elements of the doctrine was necessary, and the change is already apparent in the symbolical books both of the Lutheran and the Reformed Church. The Lutheran theologians Gerhard, Quenstedt, and others, starting from the distinction between peccatum originale originans (the fall) and the peccatum originale originatum (hereditary sin), defined the latter as a loss of the original perfection, entailing a lack of true knowledge, love, and fear of God; as a faulty concupiscentia rising from a complete corruption of the body in all its qualities, so that the capacity for salvation is reduced to a mere possibility; as a reatus (guilt) which brings man, on account of the evil which is propagated in him, under the wrath and judgment of God. Calvin, although, on account of his supralapsarian views, he experienced some difficulties in refuting the charge that he made God the origin of evil, taught, nevertheless, that hereditary sin is connected with guilt; and the later Reformed theologians, Polanus, Alstedt, van Til, and others, defined the fall as a breach of the status naturæ, and sin as a defectus naturæ. A transition to a stronger emphasizing and a more minute elaboration of the second element of the doctrine, the freedom of the will, became visible in Calixtus (who rejected the idea of hereditary sin as a guilt) and the syncretists in general; and during the period of rationalism and supernaturalism the movement was completed. The rationalists, who generally liked better to speak of the dignity of man than of his sin, argued that a transference of the guilt of Adam to his offspring contradicted the goodness, wisdom, and justice of God; and instead of hereditary sin, which term they hated, they spoke of a certain weakness of the will, a certain inclination towards the sensuous side of existence, a certain instinct for pleasure, etc., which was propagated by example, or perhaps by generation, but which formed part and parcel of human nature as created by God, and presented no insuperable obstacle to the absolute exercise of the freedom of the will. The principal representatives of these views were Henke, Steinbart, Eberhard, Wegscheider, and De Wette. The supernaturalists were, of course, very far from going this length. Nevertheless, Rensch explained the transference of guilt from Adam to his offspring by an imputatio metaphysica; God knowing that in Adam's place any and every man would have sinned like him. Reinhard explained the fall as a kind of poisoning, and hereditary sin as the inheritance of a poisoned constitution. Indeed, most of the supernaturalists, such as Michaelis, G. F. Seiler, Bretschneider, and others, taught that no man is declared guilty, and surrendered to punishment, on account of the sin of Adam and the sinfulness he has inherited from Adam, but only on account of those actual sins in which, with free self-determination, he allows his sinful disposition to realize itself.

It is apparent, that, in the whole process of development as above described, each onward step has been accomplished by a more or less one-sided emphasis on one of the two elements of the dogma, — the organic necessity, or the individual freedom. It is the characteristic of the theology of our age, that a perfect mediation between the two opposites is now demanded. Daut's attempt, in his Judas Ischarioth, at explaining the origin of evil as having taken place before the creation of man, found no favor; but, under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, Marheineke, in his Grundlinien der theol. Moral., defined sin as a contradiction between the finite and the infinite spirit, necessarily arising from the abstract, unconscious unity of God and man, and as necessarily resulting in a concrete and conscious unity, and this idea did not prove altogether sterile. By Vatke, Romany, and others, sin was represented as a necessary transition through evil, without which man can neither fully know nor fully do that which is good; and generally the Hegelian school of theology taught the absolute necessity of sin as a condition of the development of the human spirit. Schleiermacher, however, abandoned this track. He sought to establish unity by explaining sin as a double fact, — a free deed of the subject on the one side, and a necessary result of the objective development on the other, — and the sinful state of man as a disturbance of his nature, not necessary to it; so that we become conscious of our sin, partly as something we ourselves have done, and partly as something which has its cause outside of our being. Later theologians generally show an influence either from Hegel or from Schleiermacher, and their treatment of the doctrine of sin is generally shaped after one of those two models. But hardly any of them can be said to have established a perfect balance between freedom and necessity in their solutions of the problem. Nitzsch, Martensen, and Rothe incline towards the absolute freedom of the will; Lange, Thomasius, and Philippi towards the absolute necessity of organic nature.

LIT. — The greatest work in this department is JULIUS MÜLLER'S Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde, Breslau, 1839-41, 2 vols., 6th ed., Stuttgart, 1877, 2 vols.; Eng. trans., Christian Doctrine of Sin, from 3d ed., Edinburgh, 1852, 2 vols., from 5th ed., 1877. Of recent treatments of the subject may be mentioned, JOHN TELLOCH: Christian Doctrine of Sin, Edinburgh, 1876; A. BROWN: The Doctrine of Sin, London, 1881. The doctrine is, of course, treated in every work upon systematic theology and in innumerable essays. The profound work of JONATHAN EDWARDS, The Great Doctrine of Original Sin Defended, deserves particular mention. See HAGENBACH'S History of Doctrines.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT (Matt. xii. 31, 32). The, must be carefully distinguished from blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The latter is unforgivable; the former is not. As Matthew Henry well says, "It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Spirit, or some of his more private operations, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who, then, should be saved?" But blasphemy against the Holy Spirit implies complete deadness to spiritual things; so that holiness is hateful and hated. Wherever there is apprehension felt that the "unpardonable sin" has been committed, there has been no commission of it; for he who really sins in this way feels no contrition. And the latter fact is the reason why it is never forgiven. The sinner continues obstinate and malignant till his death. It is therefore equivalent to final impenitence. Cf. LANGE on Matthew (Am. ed., p. 227); PHILIP SCHAEFF: Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1811; A. SIN OFFERINGS. See OFFERINGS.

SINS, The Forgiveness of, is the negative effect of justification, which in conception precedes the positive, adoption, and rests as the subjective impartation of the work of Christ upon the atonement as the objective fact. The doctrine is found in the Old Testament (Num. iv. 14, xviii. 19; 2 Chron. vii. 14; Ps. ciii. 10, 12, 13, cxxx. 1; Isa. lii.; Mic. vii. 18, 19, etc.), where, however, it rests upon sacrifices (see OFFERINGS); but in the New Testament it is frequently represented as the immediate result of Christ's death (Matt. xxvi. 28; Rom. vi. 25; 2 Cor. v. 19, 21; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 13; cf. Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), and again as the result of the acceptance of the atonement on the part of the individual (Matt. vi. 12, ix. 2; Luke vii. 47; Acts ii. 38, xiii. 38; Rom. iii. 25; Col. ii. 13). Man, renouncing all works and all merits, is forgiven out of God's grace, for the sake of Christ's merits, through faith (Matt. ix. 2; Rom. iii. 25, iv. 4, 5). Righteousness is, however, reckoned as the condition of faith (Acts xiii. 39; Gal. ii. 16). Forgiveness, which removes guilt and its attendant punishment (Rom. v. 19), and sin itself (Rom. viii. 2 seq.) is granted to all believers (cf. Rom. v. 12-21; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22). See SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In the historical development of the doctrine, there was at first no clear understanding of the relations of God and man in the act of forgiveness; and so the apostolic Fathers represented it simply as the result of the atonement, and conditioned it upon a better life. Clement of Rome conditions it upon "faith," i.e., in the conception of the time, mere reception of the truths of Christianity, and obedience to the divine commands; the Shepherd of Hermas, upon "faith" and repentance, only once possible; Justin Martyr, upon "faith," baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon "faith" and good works; Origen, in his commentary upon Romans, upon "faith," but in other places adds good works, which he enumerates, — baptism, martyrdom, repentance, virtue, alms, forgiveness of sins against us, conversion of a sinner, brotherly love. The Latin Fathers — Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Cyprian — attribute forgiving efficacy to baptism and to good works, as alms, and lay great stress upon penance. So the Greek Fathers — Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Theodoret, Chrysostom — condition forgiveness upon the "new life," and good deeds (martyrdom, fasting, alms, etc.). Augustine made an advance in the development of the doctrine, in that he represented forgiveness as a declarative act of God. He maintained that the works which justify follow, not precede, justification. But Pelagian teaching, that forgiveness was only a work of the general divine grace, and Catholic teaching respecting works of supererogation, prevented any immediate use from Augustine's advance. John of Damascus, it is true, distinguished two kinds of faith, — one mere acceptance of truth, the other firm confidence upon God's promises, but did not attain to a perception of the connection between the latter and forgiveness. Scotus Erigena denied forgiveness, since all that man needed to be reconciled with God was intellectual perception of the evil. The scholastic theologians were Semi-Pelagians. They taught that penance, which atoned for actual sin, consisted in contrition of the heart, confession of the mouth, and works of satisfaction, which were such as fasting, prayers, alms, flagellation, pilgrimaging. They taught also, in favor of the doctrine of purgatory, that, although guilt could be forgiven, punishment followed sin until the soul was cleansed by the purgatorial fire. They emphasized auricular confession and indulgences, the equivalent for penance, and thus perverted the doctrine of forgiveness. The mystics of the middle ages emphasized the inward connection between God and the heart. The Roman-Catholic doctrine, since the Council of Trent, is that forgiveness is received by man along with faith, hope, and love through Christ, in whom he is planted. It designates baptism as the only instrumental cause of justification, and hence of forgiveness. Roman-Catholic theologians, like Bellarmine, eliminate yet more decidedly from their systems the doctrine of forgiveness as removal of guilt.

The Lutheran theologians first lay the emphasis upon God's side, in that they teach that sin is atoned for by the vicarious death of Jesus Christ. The removal of guilt is the first effect of the declaratory and forensic act of justification. Faith (assent) in connection with baptism is the only condition of participation in the work of Christ. Among Reformed theologians Zwingli and Calvin present forgiveness as an act of God's grace to the objects of his electing love. The Reformed symbols, however, agree with the Lutheran in connecting forgiveness immediately with justification. The Socinians and Arminians emphasize the human side. They represent justification as forgiveness, and that God forgives sins when he sees faith in him, and obedience to his commands. The rationalists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries maintained that forgiveness depended upon repentance, and return to virtue. The supernaturalists re-affirmed the necessary connection between the objective fact of Christ's death and forgiveness, but weakened their doctrine respecting the latter by representing that its principal effect was removal of punishment.

The speculative theologians have endeavored to find how correctly to unite the human and divine factors in the work of forgiveness. Schleiermacher finds the unity thus: forgiveness (1) is an effect of justification, (2) exists whenever man in repentance and faith enters into fellowship with Christ, and (3) is no result of a divine decree; but every act of conversion which includes the consciousness of deliverance from guilt, and desert of punishment, is only a declaration of the general decree to justify for Christ's sake. Martensen and Rothe deny that forgiveness is possible out of Christ. Nietzsche considers forgiveness as a direct act of God, resultant upon faith in the atoning death of Christ. Lange also holds fast to the objectivity of the act, which, according to him, is judicial.

DOETENBACH.

SINAI, i. e., "sharp-pointed," "toothed," or "notched" (Exod. xvi. 1; Deut. xxxiii. 2), also Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 11, 18, 20, 23, xxiv. 16, xxvi. 18, xxxiv. 2, 1, 29, 32; Lev. vi. 38, xvi. 1, xxvi. 16, xxvii. 31; Num. xxxiii. 6), also Horeb, i. e., "dry," "dried up" (Exod. iii. 1, xvi. 6, xxxiii. 6), also "the mountain of God," and "mount of the Lord" (Exod. iii. 1, iv. 27, xliii. 5; Num. x. 33), denote, in the narrower sense, a single mountain, the historic mountain on which God revealed the law unto Moses, but, in a wider sense, the mountain range in the peninsula formed by the Gulfs of Suez and Akabah. On the north it is bounded by the upland plain of Er-Râhah and on the south by the Um-Shaumer mount. A distinction has been made between Sinai and Horeb; and Hengstenberg (Authentic des Pentateuch, ii. pp. 396 sq.), with whom Robinson (Researches in Palestine) agrees, explains the change in the names, in that he makes Horeb the mountain ridge, and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. Gesenius suggested that Sinai might be the more general name, and Horeb a particular peak; and in this conjecture he was followed by Rosenmüller. Ewald sees not a local, but a temporal, difference in the use of both names (Geschichte, ii. 89, note). According to Ewald, Sinai is the older name, therefore it occurs in the ancient song of Deborah (Judg. v. 5); whereas Horeb is not discoverable before the time of the fourth narrator, in whose time, however, it had become quite prevalent. But there really seems to be no local difference between Horeb and Sinai; but it rather belongs to the peculiarity of the author using the name. Josephus and the New Testament (Acts vii. 30, 38; Gal. iv. 21 sq.) only speak of Sinai; and modern Arabs call the whole mountain range in the peninsula Jebel-et-Tur, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely.

As to the locality, it is very difficult to designate a certain spot. Some, as Burckhardt and Lepsius, have claimed that the mountain on which the law was given was the Jebel Serbâl. But the nature of the country around Serbâl is against this hypothesis (comp. Dietrich: Reisebilder, ii. 51 sq.). A second hypothesis is the one which claims the Ras es-Sûsâth to be the Sinai of the Bible. This hypothesis was advocated by no less an authority than Robinson, who was followed by all writers and travellers till Léon de Laborde (in his Commentaire sur l'Exode Append., pp. 1, 41 sq.), who advocated the old tradition in favor of Jebel Mûsa, and was followed by Kraft, Strauss, Grunl, Ritter, and in part, also, by Tischendorf. Above all things, it is necessary to pay attention to the notices of the Bible. According to Exod. xix. 2 sq., the Israelites, after their departure from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai, and encamped before the mount. God sends his message by Moses unto the people out of the mount, to tell them how he will receive them as his covenant people. Barriers are put up, to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. "On the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. . . . And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up." And in Exod. xx. 18 sq. we read, "And all the people saw the thunders, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. . . . And Moses said unto the people, Fear not; for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness, where God was." And in Exod. xxiv. 1 sq. Moses is called up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. Moses alone was to come near to the Lord; the rest were to worship afar off. Moses does according to God's commandment, and then continues alone on the mountain forty days and forty nights. In the mean time Aaron makes the golden calf. On going down from the mount Moses hears the rejoicing of the people; and as he came nigh unto the camp, and saw the calf and the dancing, his anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. From this description we must infer that immediately at the base of the mount there was a large plain, where the camp of the Israelites was, and from which the mount ascended immediately, because barriers were put up to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. Robinson and those who follow him find this plain in the plain Er-Râhah, from which the granite wall of Sinai rises with the three-toothed peak Ras es-Sufâfeh, asserting at the same time that no such plain is found on the south side. Others, who are in favor of the Jebel Mûsa, claim the Wady Sebatiyeh to be that plain, which has been overlooked by Robinson, and from which, also, the cone of Sinai immediately rises like a gigantic altar of God. The plain Er-Râhah they claim as that spot of the camp, from which Moses brought forth the people to meet with God, through the Wady Sebatiyeh, and through which the people fled back into the camp.

It is remarkable that Sinai never became a place of Jewish pilgrimage. Elijah went there to escape the vengeance of Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 3-8). At a very early period, however, in the Christian era, Sinai began to be an object of reverence. It appears that refugees from persecution in Egypt first sought an asylum amid the mountains. Anchorites consequently flocked to it, and convents were at length founded. In the early part of the sixth century the Emperor Justinian caused a church to be erected, and a fortified convent [the present Convent of St. Catharine] to be built round it. The number of resident monks is now usually about twenty-four. They are ruled by a prior (Wakil), but there is an archbishop who always resides at Cairo. The library of the convent contains some fifteen hundred (according to Lepsius sixteen hundred) printed books, and about seven hundred manuscripts. [Among them Tischendorf discovered, in the year 1859, the celebrated Codex Sinaiticus.]

SINTRAM, monk, afterwards deacon, and finally presbyter, in the monastery of St. Gall; lived in the tenth century, and was so celebrated as a copyist, that every place of note was eager to have a manuscript by him. The so-called Evangelium longum, bound between the tablets of Charlemagne, is his work. He was, however, not a simple copyist, but a real artist, and combined in his art the vigorous but somewhat rough and awkward Lombard style with the refined and elegant style of the Irish monks. E. SION COLLEGE, or the college of the London clergy, which has been a religious house from the earliest times, under the domination of a priory or of a hospital, was dissolved under Henry VIII., but again organized. It now exists under charter of 1631, and is both a clergy house, and a hospital for ten poor men and ten poor women. See Dict. of the Church.

SIRACH. See APOCRYPHA.

SIRICIUS, Pope 384-398; condemned the monk Jovinian and Bishop Bonosus of Sardica, and suppressed the Manicheans and the Priscillianists in Rome. His Epistola ad Himerium Episcopum Tarraconensem is the first decretal concerning celibacy.

SIRMOND, Jacques, b. at Riom, Oct. 12, 1559; d. in Paris, Oct. 7, 1651. He was educated by the Jesuits at Billom; entered the order in 1576; was in 1590 called to Rome as secretary to the general; returned in 1608 to Paris; became rector of the Jesuit college in Paris in 1617, and was appointed confessor to Louis XIII. in 1637. He edited works of Eusebius, Flodoardus, Fulgentius of Ruspe, Petrus Cellensis, Apollonius Sidonius, Paschasius Radbertus, Hincmar of Rheims, and others.

SIX ARTICLES, The, passed by the English Parliament, June 28, 1539, mark the retrograde movement of Henry VIII. from the principles of the Reformation. They imposed upon the English people the doctrines of transubstantiation, the usefulness of private masses, auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communion in one kind. They were popularly called the "Bloody Articles" and the "Whip with six strings." See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

SIX PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS, so called from their six doctrines, contained in Heb. iv. 1, 2; viz., (1) repentance from dead works, (2) faith toward God, (3) the doctrine of baptisms, (4) the laying-on of hands, (5) the resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Their "laying-on of hands" is similar to episcopal confirmation. They refuse to fellowship with those who do not practise it. Their general type of theology is Arminian. They claim to date, as an organization, from 1639, and have always been, for the most part, confined to Rhode Island. In 1700 they formed a Yearly Meeting. In 1880 they had not more than a dozen (very weak) churches in New England, all but two in Rhode Island. They have no periodical organ, and no institutions or societies. See CATHART'S Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v.

SIXTUS, the name of five Popes. — Sixtus I., the successor of Alexander I., ascended the Papal throne either 116 or 119, and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the celebration of Easter at Rome, and was the author of the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar. — Sixtus II. (Pope 257-258) was executed in the reign of Valerian. — Sixtus III. (432-440) was appealed to by the metropolitans of Tyana and Tarsus, who were afraid of being deposed. The erection of several churches is ascribed to him, especially the Basilica of St. Maria Maggiore. — Sixtus IV. (1471-84), whose family name was Francois d'Albescoia della Rovere, a man of humble origin, was b. July 22, 1414, at Celle, near Savona; d. Aug. 14, 1484, at Rome. Entering the Franciscan order, he became its general, was elevated to the cardinalate by Paul II., and chosen pope, Aug. 9, 1471. He was one of those popes who showed a deep interest in art and church architecture, and promoted the interests of the conventual orders, but who, incited by ambition and lust, filled Italy with blood, wrought confusion in the church, and secured the contempt of their own generation. He studied to raise the fortunes of his family, [and made five of his nephews cardinals]. Peter Riario, who was looked upon as the Pope's son, an immoral and extravagant fellow, was made cardinal; and for another supposed son, Hieronymus, he sought to secure a princely inheritance. In order to accomplish this, and out of jealousy and hatred for the house of Medici, he was an accessory to the plot of the Pazzi to murder Julian and Lorenzo Medici in the St. Rappazuta Church at Florence. Julius was killed; Lorenzo escaped with a handless wound. The Florentines fell upon the murderers, and put to death some priests who had participated in the plot. Sixtus hurled the ban at all who had taken part in the uproar against the conspirators, and laid the province of Florence under the interdict. The Florentine clergy appealed to a general council; the corporation sent a vigorous letter to the Pope (July 21, 1478); and Bishop Gentilis of Arezzo declared him to have been in collusion with the conspirators. Louis XI. of France sent a deputation to Rome, accusing the Pope of stirring up strife, and calling upon him to summon a general council. The Pope refused to call a council, but the demand was again made by a synod of French prelates at Lyons (1479). Other princes expressed themselves in positive language; and, threatened with an invasion of the Turks, Sixtus concluded peace with Florence. The fear of the Turkish invasion led him to the resolve to emigrate to Avignon. He, however, did not carry out this resolution. The danger was hardly over, before he again began to intrigue in the interests of his relations. Seeking to secure the possessions of the house of Este in Ferrara for Girolamo Rimio, he concluded an alliance with Venice against Ferrara. When King Ferdinand, who was an ally of Ferrara, made a treaty with Rimio, Sixtus endeavored to induce Venice to relinquish its conquests. Failing in this, he laid the interdict upon the city (May 23, 1483). The wars which Sixtus began in the hope of promoting the interests of his family and favorites led him to exact tithes from the prelates, to sell ecclesiastical positions, etc. He built the chapel named after him, founded churches, beautified Rome with magnificent structures, built the bridge over the Tiber; but the damage he did the church by his ambition overbalanced the good that accrued from these works. In a bull of 1477 he recommended the celebration of the feast of the Immaculate Conception, confirmed the Franciscans and Dominicans in their privileges in two bulls (1474), which these orders call their mare magnum (great sea), etc. — Sixtus V. (1585-90) combined with unusual energy and vigor great and statesmanlike versatility and foresight, revived the glory of the Roman chair, built splendid buildings, and filled the Papal treasury, but subordinated religions to political interests. He, without doubt, is one of the most distinguished of the bishops of Rome. He was a descendant of a family of Slaves which had emigrated to Italy, and settled at Montalto. Felix Perotti, who later became Sixtus V., was b. Dec. 18, 1521, at Grotte-a-Mare, a village near Fermo; d. Aug. 21, 1590, at Rome. He visited the universities of Ferrara and Bologna, and was made professor of canon law at Rimini in 1541, and at Siena in 1546. He was a Franciscan. From Siena he went to Rome, became noted as a preacher, secured the friendship of men in power, but, on account of complications, went to Venice (1556), where he held high positions in the Franciscan order. Paul IV. showed him favor; and in 1565 he accompanied the Papal legate to Spain, where he secured the confidence of Philip II. by his preaching. Paul V. also showed him favor, and appointed him vicar-general of the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of Agathia de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1570, he retired to Montalto, lived a solitary life, expended his means in deeds of charity, engaged in the preparation of an edition of Ambrose (1580), and gave the appearance of disinterested and saintly humility. This policy disarmed the cardinals, who, at the death of Gregory XIII., elected him Pope (April 24, 1585). An unreliable tradition states, that, as soon as the majority of the votes had been given in his favor, he arose in the conclave, erect and resolute, threw away the staff with which he had been wont to support himself, and sang the T. Deus with great energy, so that the cardinals, carried away with astonishment, could hardly trust their eyes. Sixtus had hold of power with a firm hand, suppressed the banditti bands, insisted upon the execution of the laws, promoted commerce, the manufacture of silk and wool, sought to drain the Pontine marshes, etc. By the bull Immensa (1587) he appointed fifteen congregations, made up of cardinals, for the more expeditious transaction of business, fixed the number of cardinals at seventy, ordered that all bishops should appear at Rome once in three years, etc. His administration was frugal, and left a well filled treasury to his successor. He did much for the adornment of Rome,—built the dome of St. Peter's, placed the obelisk in its present position, built the Lateran Palace, removed the Vatican Library to new and splendid quarters, and ordered an edition of the Septuagint (1587) and the received edition of the Vulgate. He was also involved in political matters. He supported the Duke of Guise, the author of the league for the extermination of the Huguenots, declared Henry of Navarre a heretic (Sept. 9, 1585), later, pronounced the ban upon Henry III. of France, and, when that sovereign was murdered (Aug. 1, 1589) by the Dominican Clement, approved of the bloody deed. He encouraged Philip II. in the war with Elizabeth, but refused Philip's request to pronounce the ban upon Henry IV. of France. The people of Rome hated Sixtus, and tore down the monument the Senate erected to his memory on the Capitol. He wrote Aids to Preaching and Hearing (1819), Hints to Christians (1811), Life of Francis Marlow, Discussions in Theology (1868); he also translated and edited Vinet's Pastoral Theology and Homilies (1851). Dr. Skinner was a leader in the New-School branch of the Presbyterian Church, a preacher of great spiritual power, an able theologian, and a pattern of saintly goodness. SLATER FUND FOR THE EDUCATION OF FREEDMEN. In the spring of 1882 a fund of one million dollars was given to trustees by John F. Slater of Norwich, Conn., for the purposes of educating and uplifting the freedmen of the United States, and preparing them for the duties of citizenship. The trustees were incorporated by the State of New York, and were organized with ex-President Hayes as their chairman, and Chief Justice Waite as their vice-president. It is expected that the income only of the fund will be distributed, and that schools which combine industrial training with mental and moral instruction will receive particular encouragement. The donor of the fund is a descendant of William Slater, to whom is largely due the establishment of cotton manufactures in this country; and he acquired a fortune by business-pursuits in Connecticut and Rhode Island.

SLAVERY AMONG THE HEBREWS. According to the Old Testament, which ascribes to man the inalienable trait of his nature, because of his being created in the image of God, and which presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears among Gentile nations is inadmissible from the very beginning. That one tribe, however, at the very beginning of the history of men, is dedicated to slavery (Gen. ix. 27), is only because of a curse effected through a special depravity. Yet the Old Testament presupposes slavery, according to which servants, like other possessions, formed a part of property (Gen. xxiv. 35, xxvi. 14; Job i. 3); and also the sale of slaves, as something which was customary in the patriarchal age. The servants of the patriarchs were of two kinds,—those "born in the house" (Gen. xiv. 14), and those "bought with money" (Gen. xvii. 13). Abraham appears to have had a large number of servants. At one time he armed three hundred and eighteen young men "born in his house." The servants born in the house were, perhaps, entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xxiv. 1 sq.), who would have been Abraham's heir, should the latter have died without issue (Gen. xv. 2 sq.). The servants of Abraham were admitted to the same religious privileges with their master, and received the seal of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 9, 11, 24, 27). Slavery, as far as it was allowed by the Mosaic law, was regulated by laws, which, on account of their humane character, form a contrast to that degradation of human nature which was so prominent in heathenism. The laws regulating slavery may be divided into two classes,—such as relate to the Hebrew slaves, and such as relate to non-Hebrew slaves.

1. Hebrew Slaves.—The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were, (a) poverty (Lev. xxv. 39, 47), (b) the commission of theft (Exod. xxii. 1, 3—in that case the thief could not be sold to a foreigner, Jos. i. Autt., XV. 8, 27), and (c) the exercise of paternal authority (Exod. xxi. 7—and in that case the authority was only limited to the sale of a daughter). The servitude of a Hebrew might be terminated in three ways, (a) by the satisfaction or the remission of all claims against him, (b) by the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 10), which might arrive at any period of his servitude, and, (c) failing either of these, by expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Exod. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12). There can be no doubt that this last regulation applied equally to the cases of poverty and theft. The period of seven years has reference to the sabbatical principle in general, but not to the sabbatical year. We have a single instance, indeed, of the sabbatical year being celebrated by a general manumission of Hebrew slaves (Jer. xxxiv. 14). If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judges; and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl, thus establishing a connection between the servant and the house in which he was to serve. A servant who had submitted to this operation remained a servant "forever" (Exod. xxi. 6). The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished to treat him, not "as a bond-servant, but as a hired servant and as a sojourner;" and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 39, 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming the servant of a "stranger" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), the servitude could be terminated only by the arrival of the year of jubilee, or by repayment to the master of the purchase-money paid for the servant, after deducting a sum for the value of his services proportioned to the length of his servitude (Lev. xxv. 47-55). The servant might be redeemed either by himself or by one of his relations. A Hebrew woman might enter into voluntary servitude on the score of poverty; and in this case she was entitled to her freedom after six years' service, together with the usual gratuity at leaving, just as in the case of a man (Deut. xv. 12 sq.). Different is the case with a young daughter whom a father sold to a Hebrew with a view either of the latter's marrying her himself, or of his giving her to his son. Should the master be willing to fulfil the object for which he had purchased her, she remained with her master forever; if not, she was subject to the following regulations: (1) Should he not wish to marry her, he should call upon her friends to procure her release by the repayment of the purchase-money; (2) If he betrothed her to his son, he was bound to keep her as one of his own daughters; (3) If either he or his son, having married her, took a second wife, it should not be to the prejudice of the first. If neither of the three above-specified alternatives took place, the maid was entitled to immediate and gratuitous liberty (Exod. xxi. 7-11).

II. NON-HEBREW SLAVES.—The majority of non-Hebrew slaves were war-captives, either the Canaanites who had survived the general extermination of their race under Joshua, or such as were conquered from the other surrounding nations (Num. xxxi. 26 sq.). Besides these, many were obtained by purchase from foreign slave-dealers. That the law in general did not favor the increase of foreign slaves may be seen from the enactment in Deut. xxiii. 16 sq.; and after the return from Babylon the Jews had only 7,337 slaves, or about one to six of the free population (Ez. ii. 65).

The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised, and hence was entitled to partake of the paschal sacrifice (Exod. xii. 41), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). He was to rest on the sabbath-day (Deut. v. 14); and, in case the master had no male issue, he could give him his daughter in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 35). As to the treatment of female slaves, see Deut. xxi. 10 sq. The master had no power over the life of a slave (Exod. xxi. 20). Wilful murder of a slave entailed the same punishment as in the case of a freeman (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22); but no punishment at all was imposed if the slave survived the punishment for a day or two (Exod. xxi. 20), because he is his master's "money" (Exod. xxi. 21). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be recompensed by giving the servant his liberty (Exod. xxi. 26, 27). The general treatment of slaves appears to have been gentle, occasionally too gentle, as we infer from Solomon's advice (Prov. xxix. 19, 21). The slave was considered as entitled to justice (Job xxxi. 13-15). The Essenes entirely abolished slavery. Cf. Philo: Quod omnis probus (Mangey's ed.), ii. 457.

SLAVERY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The New Covenant declares all mankind equal sharers in salvation (Tit. ii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4); and this principle was in itself sufficient to determine the view concerning slavery (Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11), and to bring about its extinction. Since Christianity does not deal with nations, and masses of people, but with individuals, whom it severally invites, exhorts, and receives into its communion, by setting forth faith as an inward, liberating life-principle (John viii. 36) through which the individual lays hold on Christ, and becomes united with him, it recognizes the rights of the inner man (Acts ii. 11, xiii. 16; Gal. ii. 19-21), which the heathen nations never apprehended, and which were veiled in the Old Testament, but which, in their progress and complete realization under Protestantism, must ultimately bring about the utter extirpation of slavery from the earth. Christ postulated the law of liberty, and made freedom the privilege of believers (John viii. 32; Jas. i. 25, ii. 12; Rom. viii. 2), thereby accomplishing the predictions of the Old Testament (Luke ix. 48-51; Isa. lxi. 1 sq.); and, though the proclamation of liberty by the apostles had primary reference to the inward states of the soul (1 Cor. vii. 23; Gal. v. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 16; comp. Gal. ii. 1, v. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 19), it necessarily led to the great principle, that, with Christ, liberty in general had come to man (Luke i. 79; 2 Cor. iii. 17), which, like a heaven, was to permeate all relations of life.

With regard to slavery, the passage in 1 Cor. vii. 21 is of especial importance; and, whatever explanation may be given, certain it is that Paul did not intend to subvert by force the then existing condition, however adverse to the spirit of Christianity, but that first the inner freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the course of time, the outer freedom was to proceed. It is evident from Rom. xiii. 1 sq., that a disposition to refuse obedience to government existed, to some extent, in apostolic times, and, from the case of Onesimus, that bondmen sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Philem. 10-16).

Similar tendencies we find among the slaves at Corinth, where many had no doubt become converts to Christianity (1 Cor. i. 20, 26-28). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that converts to Christianity were to continue in the station and condition of life to which the providence of God had assigned them (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20). The argument by which that rule is enforced—that the present is a time of distress, in which it becomes prudent for the unmarried to retain their virgin state, and the slave to remain contentedly in his bondage—indicates its primary reference to the Corinthian Christians of that day; but the further considerations adduced—that the time is short, and the grand catastrophe through which the world's conditions shall be changed is drawing near—have universal force, and adapt the rule to the conditions of all Christians. It is, however, evident that the apostle does not strike at the right to liberty and personal independence in these instructions. 1 Cor. vii. 23 asserts that right most forcibly, and shows that the saving grace of the Lord involves a setting-aside of all human bondage. A denial of that right would bring him into conflict with his own claim to freedom (1 Cor. ix. 1) and with his fundamental statement, that in Christ all things must become new (2 Cor. v. 17). The principles of Christian liberty were already then exhibited in such a manner that Christian masters, even if they were not to give freedom to their slaves, as Philemon to Onesimus, were exhorted to treat their slaves kindly and as brothers (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iv. 1; Philem. 16). [Bishop Lightfoot says, "The gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution; the apostles never command the liberation of slaves as an absolute duty. It is a remarkable fact that St. Paul in this Epistle (Philemon) stops short of any positive injunction. He tells him (Philemon) to do very much more than emancipate his slave, but this one thing he does not directly enjoin" (p. 389).] J. G. VAHINGER.

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY. Christianity and slavery seem to the present generation, with its settled opinions concerning natural rights and the teachings of the New Testament, to form the opposite poles of the moral sphere; and yet it is certain that society in antiquity was based on slavery, and that at no period of history was the slave system more completely organized than in the Roman Empire during the life of Christ in this world. It may be affirmed, also, that the Master never commanded that slavery as it then existed should be abolished, like other evils,—idolatry, for instance,—by the direct act of his followers; and further, that, for three hundred years after his advent, no writer among either the defenders or the enemies of Christianity ever spoke of the abolition of slavery as a consequence of the new doctrine (Biot, 126). It seems, however, equally clear that the total change which has since taken place in the opinion of the civilized world in regard to slavery has been mainly due to the gradual outgrowth of Christian doctrine, morals, and example. This inconsistency can only be explained by a view of the history of the opinion of the church on this subject.

1. Relations of Christianity towards Slavery in the Reign of Constantine.—Among the early converts there were, of course, masters and slaves. The apostle Paul preaches liberty to the individual; because the gospel fully sets forth the folly of human distinctions in a race which had a common Father, and were the subjects of a common redemption. He insisted, also, that in the new kingdom all men were equal in the sight of God, who was no respecter of persons, whatever they might be as subjects of the Roman emperor; nevertheless, he maintained the duty of obedience on the part of the slave, and the claim of authority on the part of the master, as not only sanctioned, but commanded, by the new doctrine. The apostle, and his followers during the first three centuries, accepted slavery as a fact, a settled condition of Roman society which they were as powerless to change, had they so desired, as to change the imperial government itself. The object, the only object which was then practicable, was to remedy moral evils under existing institutions. The apostles and fathers addressed their exhortations to the heart rather than to the intellect of the down-trodden classes. They taught meekness and humility, and consecrated for the first time in history the servile virtues. They seem to have regarded the service of God by slaves as conferring upon them, in an important sense, perfect freedom, and as placing them on a footing of equality with their masters in the new "City of God." In this city all slaves and free, worshipped the same Father; they were bound by the same law; their religion taught them that they were all brethren, sharing in the offices of the church and the administration of its charities, members of the same collegium in the old Roman sense, with equal rights as such, and, above all, with the same hope of a common reward in the life to come.

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by protesting by voice and example against the iniquities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

2. Opinions of the Christian Fathers in regard to Slavery.—It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose sees above all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means,—the sin of Adam. So Chrysostom thinks that the apostle did not recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that great human family of which tyranny, and not nature, had made two races, of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of the noble destiny of man, who, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquité, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

While Christianity did not attack what may be called the principle of slavery in the Roman Empire, it did not content itself with preaching merely moderation to the masters, and resignation to the slaves; it favored the manumission of slaves (Const. apost., iv. q. i. l. p. 297), and strove to suppress or mitigate those features of slavery which made men forget that they were all children of the same Father, and heirs of the same promises (see Wallon, iii. 381 sq.); it sought to narrow the area of slavery by restricting as far as possible the sources of supply; it redeemed captives taken in war; it purchased the freedom of debtors about to be sold into slavery; and it strove by its charity to succor those families who had been reduced to the condition of slaves by the misfortunes of their fathers (Ambrose: De Officiis Ministr.; Greg. Magnus: Dial., iii.); above all, it brought into the Roman world a principle which had been unknown there for ages,—the dignity of human labor. There is no more striking difference between Roman and modern society than that caused by the different ideas prevailing at the two periods in regard to the social status of the workman. In Rome, as soon as she began to conquer the world, all labor became servile, and laborers were despised outcasts, because they were slaves. Christianity changed all this. It dignified and ennobled labor. The obligation to labor was inseparable from the law of love. The early Christians followed the example of the Master and his apostles in this respect, working and doing good at the same time and from the same motive. Work was regarded as quite as indispensable to the perfection of Christian character as prayer itself (Laborare est orare).

Under the Christian emperors, Constantine and his successors, the principle of slavery was still maintained, and no slave-code ever existed which defined more sharply the line separating freemen from slaves than that of Justinian (A.D. 529). The Christian Fathers, at the Council of Nicea and afterwards, procured some legislation which forbade the employment of slaves as gladiators, and of women as actresses; but in practice these prohibitions were of no avail, such was the passion of the populace for theatrical spectacles. By the same influences, Constantine was moved to direct that manumissions should be henceforth made in the church, in the presence of the bishop, rather than in that of the praetor, in order to give greater sacredness to the act. This custom was transmitted to the mediæval church.

So Constantine gave the right to the parents of new-born children to sell them into slavery; and this law, which was in direct opposition to the provisions of the old Roman code, was, it is said, rendered necessary by the increasing misery of the times, and was adopted as an alternative against permitting the children to perish from neglect and starvation.

From the time of Constantine to that of Alexis Comnenus (1095), there was, it is now apparent, in the Eastern Empire, a secret conflict of opinion between the Christian authorities and the imperial government concerning slavery. A strong illustration of the nature of this conflict is found in the general opinion that the marriage of a slave in the church made him ipso facto a freeman. Up to the time of Basil the Macedonian, no such marriage was permitted to take place; the union of male and female slaves being still regarded as contubernium, not having the sanction of the connubium, essential to the valid, legal marriage of the Romans. Basil (867-886) directed that the priestly benediction should hallow the marriage of slaves. This enactment met with violent opposition from the deeply rooted prejudices of centuries, and was often evaded. Alexis Comnenus renewed the edict, invoking for its support the Christian maxim, "one God, one faith, one baptism," and directed that all slaves whose masters forbade that they should be married in the church should become at once free. See Wallon, iii. 462, and Milman's History of Latin Christianity, i. p. 494.

In the Western Empire, after it was conquered by the Teutonic tribes, domestic slaves were still to be found; although the vast majority of the bondmen were serfs, who, like the Roman coloni, were adscripti glebe, and could not be sold apart from the land, of which they formed, in legal phrase, an incident. Many of the harshest features of the slave-code of the empire and of the Barbarians were kept up for the government of these serfs. The tendency, under the feudal system during the middle age, was to replace slavery by serfage; and this last form of servitude died out gradually in Europe, when the employers of labor, from a variety of motives, chiefly economic and selfish, found it to their advantage to pay wages, and to agree with their serfs that they should hold their lands on condition of rendering services therefor, certain in kind, and fixed in amount.

We are not to suppose that either the church or the clergy (who were all, in the earlier period, of the conquered races) were unmindful of the treatment of the serfs and bond-laborers during this age. The church did not attack mere slaveholding;—indeed, under the operation of the feudal system, churches and monasteries became, by the gifts of the faithful, among the largest slaveholders and proprietors of serfs,—but it constantly protested against abuses of the system, and in favor of humane measures. Charles L. Brace (God and Christ, p. 229) says that thirty-seven church councils passed acts favorable to slaves. In the middle age no Christian captives were permitted to be sold into slavery; the right of asylum in the churches was offered to fugitive slaves; large sums were spent for their ransom; manumissions were frequent, and were encouraged by the church as acts inspired "by the love of God" for the benefit of the soul of the master. Still, the noble declaration of Pope Gregory the Great, towards the close of the sixth century, "that slaves should be freed because Christ became man in order to redeem us," does not seem to have been the guide if the church's policy during the middle age. Larroque (L'Esclavage chez les Nations Chrétiennes,

Personal slavery having disappeared in Europe in the fourteenth century, it was revived upon a gigantic scale on this continent shortly after the discovery of America. The scarcity of labor in the New World, and the necessity for it, seem to have overcome all objections to the system, whether founded upon motives of Christian duty, or upon economic considerations. All the European nations, Catholic and Protestant, who had colonies in America, engaged in transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to this continent. The result was, that, according to the calculation of Sir Arthur Helps, there were carried between the years 1579 and 1807 more than five millions of human beings from Africa to America, where they and their descendants became slaves. For more than two centuries and a half no voice, either in the church or out of it, was publicly heard against the slave-trade and its consequences. About the middle of the eighteenth century, however, two distinct movements became apparent. They are distinct: because one was based on philosophical, and the other on Christian, grounds, and because one was confined to France, and the other to England. Upon one or the other of them, modern opinion and legislation in regard to negro slavery have been based. The philosophical basis is found in that portion of the celebrated work of Rousseau, Emile, called Profession de foi d'un Vicaire Savoyard. The views there laid down made a profound impression upon all writers on theories of government during the remainder of the century, and formed the element of strength in the French Revolution. According to Rousseau, man is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other,—equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

These doctrines, and the vast system which grew out of them, were, for various reasons, embraced with the utmost enthusiasm in France. People looked for the millennium as a consequence of their adoption to an age, when, according to Condorcet, "the sun shall shine only on freemen, when tyrants and slaves and priests shall survive only in history and on the stage." It is curious that the first public official document in which these opinions are clearly set forth should be our own Declaration of Independence: for it is there proclaimed that all men are "equal," and that "they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." So in France, the first article of "The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen," adopted in 1789 at the beginning of the Revolution, asserts, "Men are born free and equal, and have the same rights." And as a logical result of this declaration, based upon the teaching of Rousseau, the French Convention (Feb. 4, 1794) decreed that negro slavery should be abolished in all the French Colonies, and that all men therein should have the rights of French citizens. Two things are worthy of remark concerning this decree: (1) That it was the first act by which any nation in Europe decreed the abolition of slavery; and, (2) That the men and the nation adopting it were so far from being Christians, that they had, only three months before its date, enthroned and worshipped a woman as the goddess of reason in the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris.

By the side of these attacks of the French philosophers on slavery as a violation of natural rights, there began a movement about the same time, chiefly in England and in this country, having the same object in view, but founded wholly upon convictions of Christian duty. Conscience was here substituted for mere sentiment, as the impulse to action; and the result was that earnest, persistent, and personal work which is prompted by deep, conscientious conviction of duty. The African slave-trade was made at first the main point of attack by the abolitionists. In 1772 Granville Sharp urged its suppression on religious grounds. Just before the Revolution, Virginia petitioned that no more African slaves should be sent into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, a man of deeply religious nature, gave up his whole life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, as violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in this work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Commons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1781. By incessant work, and constant agitation of the subject in the press and at public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained the support of many prominent public men in England, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the discussion of the subject, and especially the general conviction of the violation of Christian duty in maintaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the outcry of the public conscience, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In the United States the foreign slave-trade was prohibited in 1808 by virtue of a power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Shortly afterwards, all the maritime nations of Europe followed the example of England and of this country; and the work was fittingly crowned by the declaration of the European Congress of Vienna in 1815, engaging all the powers to discourage the traffic, as one "reproved by the law of religion and of nature;" thus recognizing the two forces, religion and philosophy, which had combined to bring about the result.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as a religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1688 the German Friends residing in Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, petitioned the Yearly Meeting to take measures against slaveholding. From 1696 to 1776, the society nearly every year declared "the importing, purchase, or sale of slaves" by its members to be a "disownable offence." John Woolman and Anthony Benezet, illustrious as Quaker philanthropists, were the pioneer abolitionists of modern times. In 1776 the holding of slaves was prohibited by the discipline of the Society of Friends, and since that time its members have always been conspicuous in supporting antislavery opinions and legislation.

The highest judicatory of the Presbyterian Church in this country is said (Stanton: The Church and the Rebellion, p. 398) to have made a formal declaration in favor of the abolition of slavery no less than six times between 1787 and 1836; viz., in 1787; in 1793, re-affirming its action in 1787; in 1795, by expressing "the deepest concern that any vestiges of slavery remained in the country;" in 1815, and again in 1818, denouncing slavery "as utterly inconsistent with the law of God." In 1815 and in 1819 the General Assembly (Old School) in its action, without avowing any change of opinion as to the sinfulness of slavery, dwelt more particularly upon the formidable obstacles to the practical work of emancipation. In 1861, during the Rebellion, that body being no longer hampered by complications of this kind, proclaimed openly "the evil and guilt of slavery," and its earnest desire for its extirpation.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church has been opposed to slavery from the beginning. At the organization of the General Conference in 1784, a general rule of its discipline was adopted, declaring slavery contrary "to the golden law of God and the inalienable rights of mankind," and directing that preachers holding slaves should be expelled. Still, the rule was often evaded, and not executed, out of regard for the position of the Southern members of the denomination. After 1808 slaveholding among the private members of the society was not made a subject of discipline, notwithstanding that the old rule affirming slavery to be a great evil, and that slaveholding should be a bar to office in the church, was still unrepealed.

The aggressive antislavery sentiment at the North was always very powerful among the Methodists; and in the General Conference of 1811 it was strong enough to effect the passage of a resolution by which Bishop Andrew, who had come into the possession of certain slaves in right of his wife, was requested to suspend the exercise of all episcopal functions until the slaves were freed. This led to the disruption of the conference, and the formation of two Methodist-Episcopal churches in this country, — one at the North, and the other at the South.

It must be remembered that there were, before the war, in the Northern States, vast multitudes of Christians of thoroughly antislavery sentiments who took no active part in the abolition movement, because they were restrained by conscientious convictions as to their duties as citizens; but when slavery was made the pretext of rebellion, and war against the government, and an attempt was made to found an empire the corner-stone of which was slavery, and especially when the National Government had decreed the emancipation of the slaves, every motive for its further toleration was removed.

SLEIDAN (originally PHILIPPSOHN), Johannes, b. at Sleiden, near Aix-la-Chapelle, 1506; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 31, 1556. He studied ancient languages and literatures at Liege and Cologne, and afterwards jurisprudence and history in Paris; embraced the Reformation; settled at Strassburg, and was much used by the Protestant princes of Germany in diplomatic missions to England, the Council of Trent, etc. His celebrated work on the history of the Reformation in Germany (De statu religionis et reipublice Carolo Quinto Cæsare commentarii, Strassburg, 1553-56) he wrote at the instance of the leaders of the Schmalcaldian League. It was translated into German, Dutch, Italian, English (with his life, London, 1689), and Swedish, and appeared in eighty editions before 1780. His De quatuor summis imperiis libri tres (1557) was very much read. On the Roman-Catholic side, Fontaine, Gennep, Surius, and Maimbourg wrote against him. [See BAUMGARTEN; *Ueber S's Leben u. SMALLEY, John, D.D., b. in Columbia, Conn., June 4, 1734; d. in New Britain, Conn., June 1, 1820, within three days of being eighty-six years old. He was prepared for Yale College by his pastor, Eleazer Wheelock, afterward president of Dartmouth; was befriended while at Yale by Ezra Stiles, afterward president of the college; was graduated in 1756. He was thought by Dr. Wheelock to have been converted in early childhood. At the age of six years he had been deeply affected by the preaching of Whitefield. In college, however, he began to doubt the genuineness of his conversion, became painfully despondent, and at length ascribed what he sometimes called his actual, and sometimes his second, conversion, to the reading of Edwards on the Will. This was one of the facts which led him through life to oppose all religious excitements which did not spring from the influence of religious doctrine. It led him to become a leader in the contest against the fanaticism of the Separatists, against the Half-way Covenant, — a leader in defence of the New-England theology.

Having pursued his theological studies with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, he was ordained April 19, 1758, over the Congregational Church in New Britain, Conn. He remained in this pastorate more than fifty-five years — without a colleague, more than fifty-one years. In the pulpit he fixed his eyes on his manuscript, read it with a harsh and nasal voice, with few, and those awkward, gestures; yet he enchaind the attention of his hearers by his exhibition of naked doctrines, — often the distinguishing doctrines of Calvinism. The marked success of his pastorate is a matter of historical interest. His success as a theological instructor was yet more remarkable. Twenty of his pupils can now be remembered. One of them was an eminent revivalist, and was accustomed to read in the pulpit a printed sermon of Smalley, and to read it with such impressive elocution that the reports of its influence are well-nigh fabulous. Two of Smalley's pupils were Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, and Ebenezer Porter, who, as a professor at Andover, exerted a formative influence on the seminary. Two other theological pupils of Smalley turned their attention afterward from the ministerial to the legal profession. One of these was Oliver Ellsworth, who became chief justice of the United States; the other was Jeremiah Mason, to whom Daniel Webster ascribed much of his own success at the bar. The pupils of Smalley were charmed with his wit, but often awed by the severity of his criticisms. He studied fourteen hours a day, yet made no parade of learning. He was confident in his opinions, and impatient of contradiction, but was venerated for his profound and simple-hearted piety.

Four of his sermons had an epochal influence. Two of the four were on Natural and Moral Inability, published in 1769, republished in England. Two were entitled Justification through Christ an Act of Free Grace, and None but Believers saved through the All-Sufficient Satisfaction of Christ, 1786, 1787, repeatedly republished. In addition to other sermons in separate pamphlets, Dr. Smalley published in 1803 a volume of Discourses, and in 1814, when he was eighty years old, a second volume. EDWARDS A. PARK.

SMARAGDUS, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael, situated on the Meuse, in the diocese of Verdun, was one of the most learned theologians of the Carolingian age, and held in great esteem both by Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious. His writings, however, consisting of commentaries on the New Testament, on the rules of St. Benedict, etc., are mere compilations, altogether without originality. They are found in Migne: Patrol. Lat., vol. 102. — Another Smaragdus, whose true name was Ardo, was a friend of Benedict of Aniane, and wrote his life. See Act. Sanct., and Migne: Pat. Lat., vol. 103. ZÖCKLER.

SMART, Christopher, b. at Shipbourne, Kent, 1722; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1771; fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1745; followed literature in London, and led a disorderly and dissipated life, which did not quench his religious feeling. Among his works are The Parables of Christ done into Verse, 1765; On the Divine Attributes; and A Translation of the Psalms of David attempted in the Spirit of Christianity, with Hymns for the Fasts and Festivals, 4to, 1765. These are piously intended, and curious, but met with no success. More memorable is his Song to David, written on the wall of a madhouse, or, according to the old tradition, indented with a key on the wainscot, he being debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper. F. ble remonstrance from the unjust imputations of frivolousness and falsehood; wherein the cause of liturgy and episcopacy is further debated. The debate was upon these two heads: (1) of the antiquity of liturgies, or forms of prayer; (2) of the apostolical institution of diocesan episcopacy. See NEALE: *Hist. SMITH, Eli, a distinguished American missionary, and translator of the Bible into Arabic; was b. at Northford, Conn., Sept. 15, 1801; d. at Beyrout, Syria, Jan. 11, 1857. He graduated at Yale College, 1821, and at Andover Seminary in 1826; and in May of the same year embarked as a missionary of the American Board to Malta. In 1827 he went to Beyrout, and in March, 1830, undertook with Mr. Dwight, under directions from the American Board, a journey through Persia, to get information concerning the Nestorian Christians. The expedition, which lasted a year, and during which the travellers visited the grave of Henry Martyn at Tocat, resulted in the establishment of a mission among that people. Smith published an account of the journey, in Missionary Researches in Armenia, of the Rev. Eli Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, etc. (Boston, 1833, 2 vols., London, 1831). In 1838 Dr. Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey from Suez through the Sinaitic peninsula and up the Jordan. He accompanied the same scholar on his journey in 1852, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1846 he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Butrus el-Bistany and Nasif el-Yasijee. By August, 1853, he had completed the translation of the four Gospels. Before his death he succeeded in translating the entire New Testament, and the Pentateuch, historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other portions of the Old Testament. His labors have been supplemented by the scholarship of Dr. Van Dyke. Dr. Smith possessed eminent attainments in Arabic, and will always have a distinguished place in the annals of the American mission at Beyrout. For a good account of his life, see Missionary Herald, 1857, pp. 224-229.

SMITH, George, b. in England about 1825; d. at Aleppo, Aug. 19, 1876. He began life as bank-note, copper and steel plate engraver; taught himself the Oriental languages, and first came into prominence in 1866 by a contribution to The London Athenaeum, upon the Tribute of Jehu, which revealed his studies, assiduously carried on at leisure moments, of the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum. In 1867 he was appointed a senior assistant of the Lower Section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, and from thence on stood in the first rank of Assyrian scholars. He made expeditions to Nineveh in 1873 at the expense of the London Daily Telegraph (newspaper), and in 1871 and 1875 on behalf of the British Museum, and obtained immense treasure in cuneiform inscriptions, etc. His popular works were Assyrian Discoveries (1875), History of Assyria from the Monuments (1875), The Assyrian Epigraphic Canon (1875), Chaldean Account of Genesis (1876, new ed. by Sayce, 1880), History of Sennacherib. SMITH, Henry Boynton, D.D., LL.D., an eminent American scholar and divine; b. in Portland, Me., Nov. 21, 1815; d. in New York, Feb. 7, 1877. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in the class of 1831; studied theology at Andover and Bangor, and then spent a year as tutor in Greek, and librarian, at Bowdoin. Late in 1837 he went abroad on account of ill-health, and passed the winter in Paris, hearing lectures at the Sorbonne, at the Institute, and at the Royal Academy. The next two years were spent chiefly at Halle and Berlin, in enriching his mind with the treasures of German thought and culture. The friendships formed at this time with Tholuck, Ulrici, Neander, Twisten, Baron von Kottwitz, Kalnis, Besser, Godet, and others, eminent then or since as theologians and men of faith, he counted among the greatest blessings of his life abroad. After a short visit to England, he returned home in the summer of 1840, and was at once licensed to preach the gospel. But his health again gave way, delaying his settlement until the close of 1842, when he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at West Amesbury, Mass. Here he labored four years with zeal and success, supplying also during two winters the chair of Hebrew at Andover. In 1847 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Amherst College. In 1850 he accepted a call to the chair of church history in the Union Theological Seminary of New-York City. Three years later he was transferred to the chair of systematic theology. In both departments he wrought with the hand of a master, and, alike by his teaching and his writings, won a commanding position as one of the foremost scholars and divines of the country. His influence was soon felt throughout the Presbyterian Church, and was especially powerful in shaping opinion in the New School branch of it to which he belonged. He wrote a good deal for the editorial columns of The New-York Evangelist, on religious and ecclesiastical topics of the day; while in The American Theological Review, in The American Presbyterian and Theological Review, and, later, in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, he discussed the leading philosophical and theological questions of the age. Of the first-named review he was the sole editor, and of the other two he was joint editor. He contributed articles on Schelling, Hegel, Calvin, Pantheism, the Reformed Churches, and other subjects, to Appleton's Cyclopaedia. In 1859 he published Tables of Church History, a work embodying the results of vast labor. In 1863 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, and the next year, at Dayton, preached a sermon before that body on Christian Union and Ecclesiastical Re-union, which did much to bring together again the two severed branches of the Presbyterian Church. He took a leading part in the memorable Union Convention at Philadelphia in 1867. During the war he wrote very ably in support of the national cause. In 1859 he revisited Europe, also in 1866, and again in 1869. The latter visit, which was caused by overwork and the breaking-down of his system, lasted a year and a half, and included a journey to the East. After his return he resumed his labors in the seminary, but with health so greatly enfeebled, that early in 1874 he resigned his chair, and was made professor emeritus. After long struggles with disease, and severe suffering, he entered into rest.

Whether regarded as a theologian, as a philosophical thinker, or as a general scholar and critic, Dr. Smith was one of the most gifted and accomplished men of his time. Such was the opinion of him often expressed by those best qualified to judge, both at home and abroad. Unfortunately, with the exception of his invaluable History of the Church of Christ, in Chronological Tables, his writings consist chiefly of occasional discourses, essays, and reviews. But, although occasional, they discuss many of the most important and vital questions of the age; and they do it with such exhaustive power, that in several instances the discourse or essay might readily be enlarged into a book, with no other change than that of greater fulness of statement and illustration. His address at Andover in 1849, on The Relations of Faith and Philosophy, may serve as an example. The strong points are so vividly presented, the principles involved are set forth with such distinctness, the discussion is so luminous and complete, that a whole treatise on the subject could hardly add to the force of the argument. This address was greatly admired, and at once attracted to its author general attention. It was reprinted in Edinburgh, and elicited the highest praise from such men as Sir William Hamilton and Rev. Dr. John Brown. Referring to this address, and to the inaugural discourse on Church History, Mr. Bancroft, the eminent historian, wrote to Dr. Smith, "I know no one in the country but yourself who could have written them." It is not too much to say that the United States has produced no theologian who combined in a higher degree than Dr. Smith great learning, the best literary and philosophical culture, wise, discriminating thought, and absolute devotion to Christ and his kingdom.¹ It is deeply to be regretted that he was not spared to give to the public his theological system. It had been elaborated with the utmost care, contained the ripe fruit of his genius, as well as of his faith and his lifelong studies, and would have been a lasting boon to the world. Its informing idea is happily expressed in his early address at Andover; as, e.g., in the passage, "Christianity is not only an historic revelation and an internal experience, but also an organic, diffusive, plastic, and triumphant force in human history; and in this history, as in the revelation and as in the experience, the centre around which all revolves is the person of Jesus Christ." Professor Smith was specially gifted as a theological teacher, arousing enthusiasm in his students, inspiring them with reverence for the Holy Scriptures, fostering in them a devout, earnest, catholic spirit, dealing gently and wisely with their doubts; and impressing upon them continually, alike by example and instruction, the sovereign claims of their Redeemer, the glory of his kingdom, and the blessedness of a life consecrated to him. His services to the Union Theological Seminary were varied and inestimable. The Presbyterian Church in the United States also owes him a lasting debt of gratitude. He has been called "the hero of re-union," and certainly no man better merited the praise. His genial influence as a teacher of divine truth was equally wide and strong, and, wherever felt, it was an ennobling and irenic influence, tending to exalt the faith once delivered to the saints, and to draw closer together all sincere disciples of Jesus. Nor did his influence cease with his death. His name continues to be spoken with love and reverence; his opinions are still full of vital force; and all schools of Christian thought appeal to him as to a master in Israel. A very full and admirable account of him will be found in Henry Boynton Smith; his Life and Work, edited by his wife, New York, 1881. SMITH, John, the Cambridge Platonist; b. at Aclurch, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire, 1618; entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, April, 1638; chosen fellow of Queen's, 1644; d. there Aug. 7, 1652. His fame rests upon his posthumous Select Discourses (London, 1660, 4th ed., Cambridge, 1859), which "show an uncommon reach of understanding, and penetration, as well as an immense treasure of learning in their author." See his biography in the Discourses: JOHN TULLOCH: Rational Theology, vol. ii.; art. PLATONISTS (CAMBRIDGE).

SMITH, John Cotton, D.D., Protestant-Episcopal; b. at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826; d. in New-York City, Monday, Jan. 9, 1882. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather, and a grandson of Dr. Leonard Woods; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me.; from 1852 to 1859, assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston; and from 1860 till his death rector of the Church of the Ascension, New-York City. He was an able scholar, an eloquent preacher, a most influential leader of thought in his church, and one of the originators of the "Church Congress;" while in his public relations he was a large-hearted philanthropist, ready to do all in his power for the general good; prominently connected with the Bible Society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Board of Missions, and particularly interested in tenement-house reform. He edited Church and State, was a frequent contributor to the press, and published Miscellanies, Old and New (New York, 1876), and Brier Hill Lectures on Present Aspects of the Church, New York, 1881. By his writings, sermons, and addresses, and by the attractive influence of his personal character, he did more, perhaps, than any one person of his time to develop a generous spirit of toleration between various schools of thought, and that state of harmony which now prevails in the Episcopal Church. SMITH, John Pye, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, May 25, 1774; d. at Guildford, Surrey (London), Feb. 5, 1851; an English Congregational divine and author; studied theology at Rotherham College, under Rev. Dr. Edward Williams; was professor of theology at Homerton College from 1805 to 1850. A man of unusual learning, and of most admirable Christian spirit. He was one of the earliest among dissenters to recognize the value of the contributions to theology made by German scholars, and to essay a reconciliation between modern science and divine revelation, bringing on himself thereby no small suspicion on the part of less enlightened brethren. His Scripture Testimony to the Messiah (London, 1818-21, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1868) is an elaborate exegetical study of all the passages of Scripture referring to Christ. In Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (London, 1828, 5th ed., Edinb., 1868) he defends the Evangelical against the Socinian doctrine. Scripture and Geology (London, 1839, 5th ed., 1851) was the Congregational Lecture for 1839. His First Lines of Christian Theology was published after his death (1851, 2d ed., 1860), and contains his lectures to his classes, in syllabus form. See J. MEDWAY: Memoirs of the Life and Writings of John Pye Smith, London, 1853. F. H. MARLING.

SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian; b. at Pequea, Penn., March 16, 1750; d. at Princeton, N.J., Aug. 21, 1819. He was graduated from Princeton College, 1767; tutor there, 1770-73; first president of Hampden-Sidney College, 1775; professor of moral philosophy, 1779; and president, 1791-1812. In 1786 he was a member of the committee which drew up the Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church. He had a high reputation as a pulpit orator and a college president. He published Sermons, Newark, N.J., 1799; Evidences of Christian Religion, Phila., 1809; Moral and Political Philosophy, Trenton, N.J., 1812; Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, New Brunswick, N.J., 1815; (posthumous) Sermons, with Memoir, Philadelphia, 1821, 2 vols. SMITH, Sydney, Church of England; b. at Woodford, Essex, June 3, 1771; d. in London, Feb. 22, 1815. He was graduated at Oxford, 1792; took holy orders, 1794; was minister of Charlotte Episcopal chapel, Edinburgh, 1797-1802; canon of Bristol, 1828; and canon residentiary of St. Paul's, 1831. He is one of the most famous of English wits; but he was also a forcible, earnest preacher, and a sagacious critic and reviewer. He was the first editor of The Edinburgh Review. Besides numerous Sermons, he published Lectures on the Subject of the Catholics by Peter Puley, London, 1808, which did much to promote Catholic emancipation, and Elementary Sketches of Moral Philosophy, 1850. See his Memoir by his daughter, Lady Holland, London and New York, 1855, 2 vols., and the art. in ALTHOUSE.

SMITH, William Andrew, D.D., a leading minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 29, 1802; d. at Richmond, Va., March 1, 1870. His parents dying when he was quite young, he was kindly cared for and brought up in the family of Mr. Hill, a worthy merchant of Petersburg, Va. He professed religion at seventeen years of age, prepared for the ministry, and was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1825. He rose rapidly to eminence in the conference. In 1833 he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College, then in its infancy. In September of that year, by a painful accident, he was made a cripple for life. He continued to fill many of the most important stations in his conference until 1846, when he was called to the presidency of Randolph-Macon College, and while here he raised, largely by his own personal efforts, an endowment of one hundred thousand dollars. This position, as well as that of professor of mental and moral philosophy, he filled with great acceptability and efficiency until 1866, when he moved to St. Louis, Mo. After serving here as pastor of Centenary Church for two years, he became president of Central College, located at Fayette in that State, and raised for the institution at once, by his personal exertion, about a hundred thousand dollars. About this time he became the victim of a fatal malady, which two years later, while on a visit to Richmond, Va., terminated in his death. He was a member of every general conference from 1832 till his death. At the eventual general conference of 1844 he took a specially prominent part; and in the celebrated appeal of Rev. Francis A. Harding, and in the extra-judicial trial of Bishop James O. Andrew, he won a national reputation for deliberative and forensic eloquence and for rare powers of argument and debate. From that time he became one of the foremost men in Southern Methodism. He was a hard student and an earnest thinker. His sermons were clear, forcible, and instructive, being able discussions of the cardinal doctrines of the gospel. He was more of a logician than of an orator, yet his logic was not cold and dry, but steeped in emotion, and aglow with zeal. His ministry was blessed with powerful revivals. He was always bold to avow and defend his sentiments, regardless of consequences. The vigor and clearness of his intellect, his candor, independence, energy, and unquestioned ability, caused him to stand in the front rank of the leading minds in the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. (See biographical sketch by Bishop J. C. GRANTLEY, in the General Minutes for 1870.) His Philosophy and Practice of Slavery (Nashville, 1857) attracted wide attention, and was universally recognized as one of the ablest presentations of the Southern side of the slavery question ever published. SMYRNA, situated on the Herman Gulf on the coast of Lydia, became very prosperous after the time of Alexander the Great, and was, during the first two centuries of the Christian era, one of the principal commercial centres of the world, and the richest and most beautiful city of Asia Minor. It contained a Jewish and a Christian congregation, and the latter had occasion to prove its faith under persecutions instituted by the former (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8). Its venerable bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius in 169. The city was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 178. It has now a mixed population of about 180,000.

SMYTH, John, founder of the General Baptists; date of birth unknown; d. in Holland in 1612. Like many of the separatists he was a Cambridge man; matriculated as a prizeman of Christ's College, 1571, where John Milton afterwards studied; took his B.A. 1575-76; was elected a fellow, and commenced his M.A. 1579; afterwards he was lecturer at Lincoln, and then became vicar of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, Eng. Seized by the time-spirit, he was restless, fervid, earnest, and thoroughgoing. At the university he was cited before the vice-chancellor for defending Sunday, and at Gainsborough he battled against the separatists in defence of the English Church. But his persistent pursuit of truth precluded content with Puritanism. For "nine months" he was perplexed about the "separation," and disputed with the chief Puritan leaders, but only to become pastor of a church of the separatist or independent type in the year 1602. How he became a Baptist is not clear. An old church book at Crowle, Lincolnshire, whose authentic character Dr. Dexter vehemently denies, says he was baptized in 1606, at midnight, in the River Don, by Elder John Morton. But his adversaries charged him with baptizing himself. Be that as it may, it is clear that he emigrated, along with his little flock, to Amsterdam, where "he was sometime pastor to a company of honest and godly men," forming "the Second English Church at Amsterdam," and sustaining himself by practising physic. Since 1591 James Arminius had been setting forth his theological theses in opposition to Gomarus; and the "First English Church," a Barrowist or separatist Church, of which Francis Johnson was pastor, and Henry Ainsworth teacher, was vigorously discussing the burning question of the hour, — the nature of a visible church. In these circumstances Smyth accepted Arminian doctrine, took an anti-Pedobaptist view of baptism, and, along with Thomas Helwys, published a "Confession of Faith" in twenty-six articles, of the General-Baptist pattern. Smyth died; but Helwys and some of his comrades came to London, and founded the General-Baptist Church of England. Smyth was a man of incorruptible sincerity, beautiful humility, glowing charity, a fair scholar, and a good preacher.

Smyth wrote Principles and Inferences concerning the Visible Church (Amsterdam, 1607), Parables, Censures, Observations (1609), Character of the Beast (1609), Differences of the Churches of the Separation, Amsterdam.

JOHN CLIFFORD, M.A., D.D.

General Baptists, also called Arminian, Free-will, and Free Baptists. 1. Origin. — Traces of churches of the General-Baptist type are found in the reign of Henry VIII., at Eyethorne, Kent, Eng., and Bocking, or Braintree, in Essex. But the organized life of the General Baptists dates from 1611 (that of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists from 1633), and becomes a distinct historical and continuous force under the leadership of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, John Morton, Leonard Busher, Henry Donne, and Dr. Du Veil.

II. Their Doctrinal Basis embraced, (1) the universality of redemption, hence the name of "General," (2) the obligation of baptism on all believers in Christ, (3) the essentially spiritual character of the church, and (4) the principle of absolute religious liberty, along with other doctrines common to the Reformed Faith of the opening years of the seventeenth century. Professor Masson, in his Life of Milton, vol. iii., states that the General Baptists were the first to pronounce with energy and distinctness in favor of the great modern idea of absolute liberty of conscience. Cf. Busher's book quoted at end.

III. Their organization embraced, (1) "assemblies," for the transaction of business common to the welfare of all the churches, not annual at first, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or "apostles," who visited the churches to "stir them up," and were also sent out to preach, not only in different parts of England, but also to Ireland, and even to Virginia and South Carolina (MSS. Proceedings of General Baptist Assembly, vol. ii. 32); (3) "elders," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helpers in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." The discipline was most rigid, and extended to speech and dress. In this and other matters they were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

IV. Growth. — The General Baptists spread rapidly in the first quarter of a century of their existence. In 1645 there were forty churches in London. During the Commonwealth they were planted in most of the midland and southern counties of England, and had grown so extensively, that Thomas Grantham (1634-92), author of Christianismus Primitivus (published 1678, London), describes a petition presented to Charles II. in 1662, as representing 20,000 General Baptists. Increased to 30,000 in 1692, they must have been one of the most numerous, as they were one of the most vigorous, of the English religious bodies.

V. Decay. — Several causes contributed to the rapid decline which followed. (1) They lacked organizers, like George Fox and John Wesley, and not a few General-Baptist churches passed over to the Quakers. (2) Men of culture and ability were rare in the ministry. An educated pastorate was slighted. (3) They made their centre rural, and not metropolitan. (4) But chiefly they fell under the blight of that negative and critical spirit which nearly destroyed English Presbyterianism, enervated the Particular Baptists, Independents, and Episcopalians, and made the eighteenth century one of feeble convictions and sharp debate, of acute reasoning and practical godlessness. Matthew Caffyn, one of the "messengers," and elder of Horsham Church, in Surrey, was charged with Arianism. Discussion concerning the person of Christ became heated and hurtful; and in 1696 a rupture took place, and a fresh body, called "The General Association," was formed, in repudiation of Arianism. Three years afterwards a reconciliation was effected on a seemingly orthodox basis; but it was not enduring, and in 1709 the friends of comprehension withdrew, and re-organized themselves on the "Six Principles" of Heb. vi. 1, 2, and the declarations of the Assembly of 1663. This division lasted till 1731, when they came together again on the understanding that difference of opinion concerning the Trinity and the person of Christ should be allowed.

VI. The New Connection.—For the next forty years Arianism was quietly gaining sway, when in 1770 the New Connection of General Baptists was formed in Whitechapel, London, out of (1) ten churches, containing 659 members, belonging to the assembly, and located in the south; (2) five churches, embracing 870 members, in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and Warwickshire, that had formed themselves on the General Baptist type solely by the study of the Scriptures; and (3) a community of 69 members, which arose in a similar fashion in Yorkshire under the Methodist Dan Taylor (q.v.), who forthwith became the leader of the New Connection. The object of this new federation was "to revive experimental religion or primitive Christianity in faith and practice;" and the basis of agreement added to the principles above named (§ii.) the declaration that "our Lord Jesus is God and man united in one person, or possessed of divine perfection united to human nature in a way which we pretend not to explain, but think ourselves bound by the word of God firmly to believe." The 1,600 members were 3,175 in 1795, 7,973 in 1820, 17,913 in 1845, 21,066 in 1870, and 26,621 in 1883. A college (now at Nottingham, Rev. Thomas Goady, B.A., principal) was started in 1797 by Dan Taylor. It has two scholarships (value, £30 each), a large library, thirteen students, an income of £800 per annum, and is affiliated for classical and scientific tuition with the Nottingham University. Home-mission work was started in 1811, and last year received over £2,000. Missions to Orissa, India, sprang in 1816 from the impact of the earnest spirit of the Rev. J. G. Pike (1784-1851), author of Persuasive to Early Piety, etc., and were greatly promoted by Francis Sutton, D.D. (1802-51), author of the hymn "Hail, sweetest, dearest that binds," and originator of the missions of the Free-will Baptists of America to Northern Orissa, and of the Baptist mission to the Telugus. The society also works in Rome, Italy. Income, £8,000 per annum. The Building Fund, established in 1865, has a capital of £6,000. Four thousand pounds were spent on Sunday-school work in 1882. The Magazine, started in 1798, has a large circulation (Rev. John Clifford, M.A., D.D., editor). There are 191 churches in England, with 25,131 members, and 113 ministers; in Orissa, 9 churches, 16 mission-stations, 16 missionaries, 22 native ministers, 5 ministerial students, 1,175 church-members, and a native Christian community of 3,061; in Rome there is one church of 18 members, two mission-rooms, a missionary, and an evangelist.

VII. In the original body an unaggressive Arianism has gradually gained the ascendancy; and for more than a century there has been a steady decline in numbers, interest, and power. Some of the churches have joined the new body; others have united with the Presbyterians; but more have become defunct. In 1801 they were reduced to thirty-five churches and 1,300 members. In 1883 there is not half a score of churches, nor 500 members; and the only two churches that are thriving have pastors from the New Connection, who have been accepted without any surrender of belief.

VIII. Present Numbers.—In England, 25,131; Orissa, 1,175; Rome, 18, in America, Free- will (date from 1770), 78,000; Church of God (1830), 30,000; Free Christian Baptists of New Brunswick, and Free Baptists of Nova Scotia, 11,000; Generals, of the West (1821), 13,000; Separate, 7,000; the Original Free-will or General Baptists of North Carolina, 10,000; Cumberland Free Baptists, 1,000; the Goldsbrough Baptists, 4,000. Total, over 183,000.

SNETHEN, Nicholas, Methodist-Protestant, at Fresh Pond (Glen Cove), Long Island, N.Y. Nov. 15, 1769; d. at Princeton, Ind., May 30, 1845. From 1794 until 1830 he was a minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; but in 1830 he joined in the organization of the Methodist-Protestant Church, and took thenceforth a prominent position in it. He preached in all parts of the country, and was much admired for his eloquence. He published Reply to O'Kelly's Apology, 1800; Lectures on preaching the Gospel, 1822; Sermons (posthumous edition, W. G. Snethen, 1846. See ALLIBONE, s. v., DRAKE, s. v.).

SOCIALISM. This word, of modern origin, does not explain itself fully. By its connection with social, socialize, it ought to denote a doctrine or system which aims to make men social, or, more exactly, to bring about the ends involved in the social nature of man; or, if we give prominence to the supposed abuses of society, the system of equity and equality by which the abuses which are found in society, especially in old, established societies, may be removed. Giving to it some such definition, we find it to be a broader term than communism, which, by rules freely adopted, or by public force, aims at a common life on principles of equality, as far as their application is possible amid the natural differences of human beings. But communistic experiments, although numerous if we glean them carefully out of the history of mankind, are all on the small scale, and, for the most part, are tried for particular purposes, such as for the pursuit of a religious life; or they are merely philosophical speculations, which seldom are put into practice. They are temporary, like the early Christian community at Jerusalem, where the exceptional poverty of many believers led to an equality of goods; or they are sanctioned by political communities, owing to a prevailing opinion of their religious character, or for some other use, like monastic brotherhoods.

or, whatever be the principle of their unions, they need the consent of the government and society to their existence, and thus depend on the general will of the great community around them, as well as on the permanent will of a succession of members, to keep up the same forms of common life. Thus, unless the society which surrounds them, although constructed on wholly different principles, defends and protects them, they will dwindle away, or will disband of themselves. Where they have been tolerably successful, their success seems to be partly due to an abridgment of the rights of the families of which they are composed, and to a mode of life, which, if adopted by all, would be far from promoting the ends of human brotherhood.

Communism, then, is no cure, on any theory, for the evils or corruptions of society. If it had a cure within itself, it could be of little avail, inasmuch as it withdraws its healing influences from society, and yet depends on society for protection. All separate communities, therefore, contain an anti-social principle. They are in spirit unlike families, and to a certain extent there is an opposition between their feeling and that of families. The family is so small a society, that it is obliged to look for the supply of a multitude of wants to the outside world, and feels the protection of society in all things and continually. "The union of family life and communal life," as we have elsewhere remarked, "is not fitted to make the community system flourish. The two are different, and, to an extent, hostile principles. The family must draw off the interests of its members from the larger or communistic body which encloses it, and concentrate them on itself." "The family implies a sort of privacy and seclusion from the world, without separation; the community implies separation from the world, and a new unity, inconsistent with, or controlling, the family union." Plato, in his republic, would not let the citizens of the warrior class know who their own children were, because they would thus have separate and personal interests. The communistic spirit, as distinguished from the socialistic, is indifferent to the good of the family, or hostile to it, and makes use of the power of society for its own protection, without doing any thing for society in return. If a whole nation were divided up into communities, the national strength and the family tie both would be weakened. A state so constituted would resemble, in important respects, one consisting of small brotherhoods, or gentes, or septs, but with much less of the family tie than is found in the latter when general society is as yet undeveloped.

We now come to consider the essence and genius of socialism: and here at the outset we labor under a serious difficulty: it has never been tried, and remains as yet a theory. Communistic systems have been tried, and one system learns from the failures and follies of an earlier system, without doing any great harm to society and the state; or it may remain untried, a beautiful vision, serving to show the distance of society at present from the perfect idea of a commonwealth. But a socialistic theory cannot be put to the test without becoming part of the public law, or, rather, without having a power given to a government, by which the state exercises control over labor and capital, and over every thing into which they enter. And, in order to do this, the existing capital must be prevented from doing what it does now: hence as capital, through the rights of testament and inheritance, now presents a firm front to sweeping changes of laws, and has continued to do this for ages, there must be a sudden or a gradual crippling of these rights, and a destruction of capital on a scale such as the world has never seen. No conquest of civilized lands by barbarians ever swept from a land its motives to industry, its landowners, its manufacturers, its capital in general, to such an extent as such a system of reform. A revolution in industry, in property, in ownership, more thorough than has ever been known, must be the preface of this new social system; and the principles on which the revolution would be begun would prevent the system of free competition, free movement and choice of work, free use of capital, from appearing again, except by a similar revolution long afterwards, begun on the ruins of a vast social experiment.

It is evident, that, in order to bring about such a revolution in the relations of capital to labor, the government itself must be invested with new power, such as no constitutional government has ever had, and no people has ever favored. The necessity of absolute power in the state has been acknowledged by socialists to be indispensable, as a means of overthrowing the existing relations of capital to labor. And, indeed, the necessity is too apparent to be doubted. If the state itself is to take the office of being sole capitalist, all other proprietors must be sooner or later "expropriated." If it is to be the sole producer, through its capital invested in machinery and land, it can have, of course, no competitor. If, for instance, it decides what kinds of stuffs for wear shall be made, of course no others from abroad can be imported and sold in the land. It must determine the quality and quantity of things made. It must own the manufactories, it must put an end to all money-lending by private persons. Its power is shown to be tremendous by the single consideration that it must be authorized to remove laborers en masse from place to place, and to decide practically what objects shall be made in all the employments of life.

The experiment of modern times which comes nearest to socialism is that initiated by Louis Blanc, who has recently died, after winning distinction by his historical writings, and who was so prominent in his party at the downfall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, as to be chosen a member of the Provisional Government in France. He had, however, but a brief opportunity to put his plan of organizing labor into practice. Being compromised in the disturbances of May, 1848, he fled to England, where he lived many years. His social starting-point is not a new one.

"It is not the man who is responsible for his wrong-doings, but society; and hence a society which is strong, and settled on a good basis, will make the individual good. The evils of slavery flow from inequality, and that from property. Property, then [i.e., personal or family property], is the great scourge of society: it is the veritable public crime.

"Government should be the supreme regulator of production, and be invested with power enough to accomplish its task. It should raise money, which should be appropriated without payment of interest, for the creation of social workshops (ateliers) in the most important branches of national industry. In these workshops there should be the same wages for all. They should form a solidarity among themselves, and thus, when united with agricultural labor, would consolidate in one the whole industry of the country. The funds necessary for this organization of labor could be in part derived from lapsed collateral inheritances. The effect of thus aiding the ateliers would obviously be to render it impossible for private undertakers to compete with the national shops. This concurrence would cease, and private work would yield to the public, or socialistic system.

"In 1848 this system of Louis Blanc was so far put to the test that public ateliers were opened; and in Paris a hundred and fifty thousand workmen were employed in them at a daily expense of fifty thousand dollars. National ruin was near, if the system should continue. The workmen proved to be a dangerous element in the population. The events of May and that of June, in which many of the workmen in these national ateliers took part, furnished a pretext for putting an end to the experiment."—See COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM, pp. 123, 124, by the writer of this article.

The importance of what Louis Blanc projected lay, not in the novelty of his suggestions, but in his bringing the minds of men to a practical point, where the transformation of society could begin without any preparatory overturning. It was also instructive in showing what could be easily foretold,—that the difficulties of a transition from a condition of individual property and free acquisition to the abolition of individual property is no easy one. In fact, a change like this could not be accomplished without a struggle of classes and interests such as has seldom, if ever, been known in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own prosperity, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. Yet the danger in a number of European states from socialistic doctrines was soon shown to be serious. A class of society, which was now called the proletariat, or the laboring-class, began to take an attitude of hostility to the bourgeoisie, or class of employers, in many parts of Europe, and a division of society began to arise which had been unknown on so large a scale and in such favorable circumstances before. One peculiarity of the new movement was that the modern science of political economy had come to be propagated among the operatives of the towns; another was the free movement of opinions from one country to another; a third, the increasing decay of religious faith and the spread of free thinking; another still, the impunity with which demagogues could spread revolutionary opinions through the lower strata of society, and, again, the greater ease of co-operation, not only among the laborers of the same crafts in the same centres of industry, but also among workmen of all civilized lands. These causes, appearing not suddenly, but by slow degrees, together with the increased communication between different lands, with the growth of individual liberty, and, to an extent, with the progress of education, seemed to be leading society into new breakers on a great scale, and to be bringing on an antagonism between governments and large masses of their subjects.

Before the February revolution in 1848, there had been workmen's associations in several countries of Europe, and some very able leaders began their career before that period, such as, among the Germans, Marx (recently dead), Engels, and Liebknecht; but the International Workingmen's Association was not formed until 1864. Long before this, Marx aided in a manifesto of the communist party, which called on the proletarians of all lands to unite. "It demanded the abolition of private property in the soil, centralization of credit in a state bank, union of the means of intercourse in the hands of the state, national workshops, fertilizing and tilling the soil on a common prescribed plan, and gratuitous instruction." The plan of the General Association contemplated an annual congress of deputies, consisting of one from each branch association, section, or group, or of two when the members of the primaries amounted to more than five hundred. A general council of fifty was to meet at London, and every subordinate union, also, was to have a committee or council. The union spread through nearly all the countries of Europe, except in the German lands and in Austria, where the Workingmen's Union, founded by Lassalle, had pre-occupied the field.

Our limits forbid us to speak of the proceedings of this union at any length. At the congress of Lausanne, in 1867, it was maintained that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that the state ought to be made the holder of the means of transport and circulation in order to annihilate the powerful monopoly of great companies." At the congresses of 1868 and 1869 a report on property revealed a difference of opinion, proving that the extreme theorists had not yet got complete ascendancy. In 1868 it was decided that the ways of communication, and forests, soil, mines, coal-pits, and railroads ought to be common property. Dupont, general secretary of the International, used at this congress the following language: "We want no governments any longer, for governments oppress us by taxes; we want no armies any more, for armies butcher and murder us; we want no religion any longer, for religion stifles the understanding." At the congress of Basel, in 1869, it was moved and carried that society may abolish individual property, putting collective property in its place in the soil. On the same occasion a motion that the right of inheritance ought to be completely and "radically" abolished did not meet with entire acceptance.

In consequence of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, no congress of this union was held in 1870; and the horrors during the siege of Paris in 1871, which were, without due cause, ascribed to the members of the International as originators, put the International under the ban of Europe. Socialism could not stand under the crimes of those with whom it sympathized.

The Workingmen's Union was founded a little after the International, by a brilliant and accomplished man, Ferdinand Lassalle, whose early death was followed by the division of his adherents. Universal suffrage adopted by the North German Confederation weakened it again by satisfying the more moderate of the German socialists. In 1869 Liebknecht, an old socialist, founded the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party; and this was succeeded by the Socialistic Workingmen's Party, at Gotha, in 1875. The extreme principles of the International prevailed in this new organization, as they have done in Germany ever since, over the more moderate form of socialism that was in vogue before.

Meanwhile, in 1871, the new empire was established; and, in the Reichstag, socialistic representatives, few, yet in increasing numbers, have had an opportunity to ventilate their opinions. Outside of the political arena, several professors of political economy have some leaning toward socialistic doctrines, although disagreeing among themselves. Such are Brentano, Schmoller, Schaeffle, F. A. Lange. The socialistic party is also extremely active in propagating its opinions through the press. Its strength at the polls has been estimated as being in 1877 from six to eight hundred thousand.

We close our sketch of socialism with considering some of the results to society from the system, if it should ever become predominant.

1. At present the instruments of work belong to the class of the capitalists. The dependence of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery and servitude in all its forms. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into terminable annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden.

2. The reward of work, or wages, is, according to the doctrine of Marx, to be measured by time spent in work. Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

3. Tickets of work are to be given to each workman, which will entitle him to the value of his day's work, estimated in the productions which he needs. As all production is for the state, and all wants supplied by the state, there is an infinite complication in the process, when the government takes the work of supply into its own hands.

4. By this process all money is superseded, except so far as dealings with foreign lands, where barter cannot be made use of, are concerned. Drafts must be issued by the government, and be payable in so many tickets of work.

5. The government, being the only employer, is free from all competition. But what is to prevent over-production, which is checked at present by want of sale? What is to prevent comparative over-production of articles in great use; for instance if too little food were produced to meet the amount of things manufactured?

6. The government, being the only transporter and distributor, will be liable to an infinity of mistakes, which are at present reduced to their minimum by individual caution. Wants of one thing, or in one place, cannot be supplied in another place, or of another thing, by competition; for competition is excluded by the system. Every change must be provided for by the government, and new wants be met by new supplies, according to its judgment. The present rapid movements of industry would be retarded by the clogs and breaks necessary in the action of central power.

Could so vast a city as London, or even as New York, be sure of not being exposed to famines on the plan of destroying private capital?

7. International exchanges would add to the difficulties of a socialistic state. It must own vessels, collect things produced elsewhere, and pay for them by barter of productions not needed at home, or by purchasing gold and silver. Here, again, the stimulus of competition being necessarily absent, the agents of a government would be brought into straits which might be of most serious injury.

8. It must not be supposed that all the final results of labor will accrue to the laborer. The certificates of work will amount to an immense sum; but the deductions from them must be immense also. The expenses of governments, the support of all transporters, of education, of the poor, the sick, the disabled, the police, of legislation, official salaries, — which in such a state would include the payment to all who buy, sell, or carry, — the prevention, trial, and punishment of crime, the care of roads, protection of every sort, would still continue, and would of course involve an amount of certificates of work, which must be deducted from the reward of work, to an extent which no one can foresee. Lawyers, it is true, would, for the most part, cease. Inheritance would, or might, cease also, — at least the savings from labor invested in certificates of work would be, no doubt, small; and the absence of private means of acquisition would take away a principal stimulus to work beyond the supply of pressing wants. A general equality just above the subsistence-point would, it is probable, prevail, and take away another most important stimulus.

But perhaps we have indulged in a useless method of looking at socialism on the industrial side, when there is so much uncertainty in the action of causes under new conditions. We turn to another side of the subject, — to its relations to the family, the state, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, whatever side we take, we can form opinions only which may prove to be wide of the mark. And first as to the family: if we judged from the free thoughts of many socialists in regard to marriage, divorce, free-love, and the like, we should not feel very hopeful that socialism would long retain in its purity the Christian idea of the family tie; nor should we be ready to think that a system which cut off the middle class of society altogether from existence would preserve the best models for a wholly new system. Yet there is at least no light or especial hope drawn from the prospect which socialism holds out. I can believe, that, in some places, every thing would be hopeful, while elsewhere the phalansteries of Fourierism would be realized with the fewest redeeming features.

The state, as we have seen, must be invested, in socialism, with all power over industry; which thus may be called practically unfree. It must be a state of serfs with a democratic government over them. Is it harsh or unjust to say that the slaves on a Southern plantation, under a slave-driver, were in some respects better off; for the master himself, over against the driver, might represent clemency and kindness?

Religion will not stand very high in the regard of socialists. Schaeffle says, in his Quintessence of Socialism, that it is "through and through irreligious, and hostile to the church." But perhaps this may be owing to the fact that the religious institutions of society have hitherto been bulwarks against revolutionary causes like socialism, and that religious feeling involves a spirit of subordination to existing order, except when such order strikes at the roots of religion itself. In the social state it would be wholly uncertain whether a nation of laborers could or would restore religious brotherhood on the foundation of the New Testament, when once state churches should be overthrown.

And again: how would socialism affect individual character? Here we notice, first, that mere equality, with no power to rise above the condition of birth,—a form of life where competition, and advantage from special energy or ability are cut off,—would deaden nearly all the motives by which human nature is at present carried forward. Do we not thus come back again to a state of serfdom? And, if all have an equal voice in the choice of the governors of society, are not all equally under a government most absolute? The monotony, listlessness, and want of hope, of such a state of things, are not likely to improve human nature, or become a remedy for evils handed down from the past.

But we may ask whether the system of socialism in which the destruction of private capital, entire equality, the government's absolute control, are essential features, can ever become a reality. Certainly not, we should say, unless it can be shown that society on its present basis is incapable of becoming better, or unless there is an inevitable tendency in every change, toward the point aimed at by socialism; for otherwise, society as at present constituted would rise en masse against the movement. The spirit of the household, the spirit of capital, all that is interested in the present, every landholder down to the smallest farmer, every one who has property, would resist to the death. And all governments would form a mutual insurance against the theorists who should demand universal change. If freedom of opinion on the most practical of subjects became explosive, it would be met everywhere by common resistance; for all have a common interest to shield each other from ruin. In such a case, there would be no middle ground between the ruin of socialists and the ruin of society.

SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE DE GENÈVE (the Evangelical Society of Geneva), the oldest of the Continental evangelical societies, was founded in 1831 for the spread of sound apostolic doctrine throughout Switzerland and France. It has a theological school at Geneva, supports numerous missionaries, pastors, and colporters, and is entirely dependent upon the funds yearly collected, not only in Switzerland, but in different parts of Europe, and from the United States of America. It is undenominational, having as its confession of faith substantially the creed of the Evangelical Alliance. It is the product of the revival of gospel truth which attended the labors of Robert Haldane (see art.). In the society's theological school, Gausson, Malan, Prouver, and Merle D'Aubigné have taught. In the year from March, 1881 to March, 1882, the receipts were, from gifts and sales, 251,187 francs. In 1881 it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and issued a memorial volume, Récits et Souvenirs de quelques-uns de ses ouvriers. See its Annual Reports.

SOCIÉTÉ CENTRALE PROTESTANTE D'ÉVANGÉLISATION. This society, connected with the Reformed Church of France, was founded in 1852. Its centre is Paris, but it operates in all parts of France. Its object is to develop the faith of Protestants, and in every way advance the Protestant cause. It supports theological schools at Tournon and Batignolles, and numerous churches, preaching-stations, and schools. It has also so fostered forty-two churches, that now they are independent of its help. During 1882 its receipts were 281,029 francs.

SOCINUS (Faustus) AND THE SOCINIANS. Faustus Socinus, or Fausto Sozzini, was b. at Siena, 1539; d. at Luckawice in Poland, 1601. Left an orphan at a tender age, his early education was neglected. Following the example of his ancestors, he at first devoted himself to the study of law, but corresponded with his uncle Lelio Sozzini about religious questions. In 1559 the misfortunes of his family forced him to leave Italy; and he went to Lyons, and then to Zurich, where he spent three years examining the manuscripts of his uncle. It was from there, as he himself says, that Socinus got the suggestion of some of the characteristic features of his later system. His literary activity was inaugurated with an exposition of the first part of the first chapter of John (1562), which appeared anonymously. From 1562 to 1571 he was again in Italy, and at the court of Francesco de Medici in Florence, who heaped honors and offices upon him. The most of the time between 1571 and 1578 he spent in Basel, occupied with the elaboration of his system and disputations. The latter were the occasion of two of his principal writings, — De Jesu Christo servatore, against the Protestant preacher Covet, and De statu primi hominis ante lapsum, against the Florentine Pucci. In 1579 he went to Poland, where the name of his uncle was still held in honor, and remained there till his death. At Cracow, Socinus applied for admission to the society of Unitarians, but was refused, except on condition of his being rebaptized, the Unitarians being leavened with Anabaptist notions. Socinus, not accepting admission on these grounds, employed his powers and influence to have the law changed in this regard. He was active with his pen and at synods, and he lived to see his view accepted at the synod of Rakow in 1603. In 1583 he married into a Polish family of noble birth. He was not free from abuse and persecutions, and in 1598, while ill, was taken out of his bed by Cracow students who had been incited by Roman-Catholic priests, dragged half naked through the city, and scourged, but was rescued by a university professor, Martin Vadovita. On this occasion, all of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the market-place.

In 1605, immediately after Socinus' death, the so-called Rakow or Socinian Catechism appeared in the Polish language, for which he had made preparations. It was completed, upon the basis of these and his writings, by Statorius, Schmalz, Moscorovius, and Volkel. A German translation was made in 1608, and a Latin one in 1609, of which a second, third, and fourth edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1665, 1680, 1684. This catechism is a very good compendium of the Socinian theology. At Socinus' death there were a number of Unitarian congregations in Poland, made up largely of noblemen. Good schools were connected with them. The city of Rakow was the chief citadel of Unitarianism, and the excellent institution of learning was attended at one time by nearly a thousand students, three hundred of whom were of noble birth. The general synod of the Socinians met there every year. Many of their theologians and preachers were celebrated. Among these were Schmalz (d. 1622), who wrote fifty-two works in defence of Socinianism; Volkel (d. 1618), a student of Wittenberg, and for a time amanuensis of Socinus, whose work, De vera religione, is a systematic presentation of the Socinian theology; Ostorodt (d. 1611), who advocated the specific Anabaptist principles of refusing to do military duty, serve in public offices, etc.; and Moscorovius (d. 1595), who, amongst other things, wrote the Defence of the Socinians, which he sent to the king. Among the more distinguished men of the succeeding generation were Crell (d. 1631), a very prolific author, whose biblical commentaries, two books De uno Deo patre (the keenest Socinian attack upon the doctrine of the Trinity), and other works, fill vols. iii. and iv. of the Bibl. fratrum Polonorum; Schlichting (d. 1661), the author of a confession of faith (1612), De trinitate, de moralibus V. et N. T. itemque de eucharistia et baptismi ritibus (1637), etc.; Ludwig von Wolzogen (d. 1661), a distinguished exegete, and author of Compendium rel. christ.; Wiszowaty (d. 1678), author of sixty-two works, editor of the Bibl. frat. Polon., etc.; and Morskowski, author of Politica ecclesiastica (1616). In the reign of Sigismund III., and his son Wladislaw IV., who were completely under the influence of the Jesuits, the Socinian congregations were persecuted and legally abolished. By a decree of 1638 the school at Rakow was suppressed, and the church taken away from "the Arians;" the immediate occasion of these harsh measures being the blasphemy of some of the students in stoning a wooden crucifix outside of the precincts of the city. Rakow, forsaken of the Socinians, is now a poverty-stricken village. John Casimir, who ascended the Polish throne in 1648, treated the remaining Socinians who dared to show their faces at the approach of the king of Sweden as traitors; and at the diet of Warsaw (1658) it was decreed that the confession and promotion of Socinianism should be punished with death. Two years were allowed to intervene before the execution of the edict, and during that time many Socinians emigrated. A fresh edict in 1661 confirmed the preceding one. In Germany, Socinian doctrines were first taught by Ernst Sener, professor of medicine and physics at Altdorf. He taught clandestinely, but with success, till his death, in 1612. His principal writing is a treatise upon the eternal duration of future punishment. Altdorf became the hearthstone of Socinianism, but the Council of Nürnberg forbade the publication of Socinian views there. Socinian synods were held in Kreuzburg in 1661 and 1663. Some of the Polish exiles were permitted to remain for a while at Mannheim. In Germany the movement was always very weak and insignificant. In Holland it was more successful; and, in spite of persecutions, the Socinians increased. In 1653 the States-General demanded a pledge of the University of Leyden that it would not tolerate Socinian teaching. Some of the Polish exiles found their way to Holland. Among them three especially deserve mention: Fellbinger (b. 1616), Sand (d. at Amsterdam, 1680), who wrote the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (1684), a full literary history of his sect, and Zwicker (d. at Amsterdam, 1678), whose work, Irenicum Irenicorum, produced a great excitement. The Socinians finally were identified with the Remonstrants. For the history of the movement in England and the United States, see art. UNITARIANS.

The doctrines of Socinianism are not to be regarded as identical with the doctrines of modern Unitarianism, and are laid down in the writings of Socinus, the Rakow Catechism, and the works of the principal Socinian writers down to the middle of the seventeenth century. The genuine Socinians held firmly to the authority of the Scriptures and to a very positive supranaturalism. The Rakow Catechism begins with the question, "What is the Christian religion?" Answer, "The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life." Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, which, clothed with divine authority, is the only source of religious knowledge. The authority of the Old Testament, which only has an historical value, rests upon the testimony of the New Testament. Both the Testaments are inspired documents. The sacred writers wrote under the impulse and dictation of the Divine Spirit (divino Spiritu impulsu eoque dictante). The Socinians, however, taught that only the essential parts, those pertaining to doctrine, were of immediate divine inspiration. The views concerning the relation of reason to revelation differ somewhat from those of orthodox Protestants. Reason is man's spiritual eye; and, in all controverted matters, it is judge, and not the Pope or the believing Christian. The truths of revelation are above reason, but never contrary to it. Miracles are above reason, and credible. The doctrines of the trinity and divinity of Christ are contrary to reason, and therefore incredible. Wiszowaty, in his Religio rationalis, went so far as to teach the agreement between the true philosophy and religion. Thus the latent rationalism in genuine Socinianism became more and more prominent.

In the department of theology proper the usual attributes are attributed to God. His omniscience is defined in such a way that it does not conflict with the contingency of events and the freedom of the will. God does not know in such a way that whatsoever he knows will surely come to pass. If God's knowledge, says Crell, were to make every thing to happen necessarily, which does happen, then there would be no real sin, or guilt of sin. In the doctrine of the mode of the divine existence, it is taught that God is one. This proposition is based upon such passages as Deut. vi. 4, Mark xii. 29, Gal. iii. 20, Eph. iv. 6, etc. The antagonism to the threefold personality of God forms the centre of the Socinian opposition to historical Christianity, and it is the special and single aim of many Socinian works to prove the doctrine of the Trinity irrational and unscriptural. The plural Elohim, Socinus explained, with Beza, as the plural of majesty. The three-repeated "holy" (Isa. vi. 3) is properly explained to be used for the sake of emphasis. In the case of the three men who appeared to Abraham (Gen. xviii.), it is shown that only one of them was called "Lord." To the argument from passages in the New Testament in which the Son and Holy Spirit seem to be placed on an equality with the Father, as in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19), it is replied that he in whose name believers are baptized is not necessarily God, as appears from the case of Moses (1 Cor. x. 2), etc. In regard to the apostolical benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14), it is asserted that the Son and Holy Ghost are distinguished from the Father. The genuineness of the passage of the three witnesses in 1 John is denied. The rational argument against the Trinity is specially emphasized, as would naturally be expected.

Man was created in God's image. That image consists essentially in the dominion which was given him over all creatures. Mind and reason are included under this head, as they are the efficient cause of this dominion. Socinus denied that immortality was a constituent in this image. Man was created mortal. The passage in Rom. v. 12 means that Adam's sin involved eternal death. Socinus expressly said that Adam would have died if he had not sinned. The first sin is treated almost exclusively as the result of ignorance and inexperience. So far as Adam's knowledge was concerned, he was armed against temptation. Original righteousness was not a created attribute, but subject to man's volition and voluntary activity. The reason was not absolute mistress of the sensual nature. Sin is an act of the free will, and as such it was not even known in advance by God. The sin of Adam did not entail upon his posterity the loss of freedom; that is, the ability to choose between the right and the wrong. So far as the doctrine of original sin is in opposition to this view, the Socinians most positively denied it. The 16th of Rom. v. 12 is explained to mean quoniam, quatenus. The doctrine of original sin is opposed to the Scripture which calls upon men to repent and be converted. The mere inclination to sin, Socinus held, might exist in all, but did not necessarily so exist. But this inclination is not a consequence of the sin of Adam; and, if this were the case, it would cease to be sin, for sin exists only where there is guilt. Hence no corruption came upon the human family by Adam's sin.

In the Socinian system, Christ is not divine. He was more than a mere man. His attributes were extra-human, but he was not of divine nature. He had to be a man in order to redeem. Immortality, the goal of the Christian religion, was mediated by the resurrection of Christ. If, on the other hand, his superiority to men had consisted in his divinity, he could not have died. The argument from Scripture and reason is pressed. The divinity of Christ cannot be derived from the affirmation that he was God's Son, for all men are called the sons of God (Rom. ix. 26); and, when Christ is called the only-begotten Son, it is simply meant that he was the chief and highest of the sons of God, as Isaac and Solomon are also known by this designation. The expression "I and my Father are one" (John x. 30) refers to unity of will and power, as in John xvii. 22. The passages referring to Christ's pre-existence are explained away easily. In John i. 1, the expression "in the beginning" is declared to mean "in the beginning of the gospel," or the Christian dispensation. The statement that "all things" were made by Christ (John i. 3; Col. i. 16) refers simply to all things pertaining to the gospel; and the statement, "the world" was made by him (John i. 10), has reference either to the reformation of mankind by the gospel, or to the future world. From such passages as John iii. 13, 31, vi. 36, xvi. 28, the conclusion is drawn that Christ was caught up into the heavens for a season, like Paul. Stress is laid, in the argument against Christ's deity, on his habit of praying to the Father, his being sent by the Father, his ignorance of the day of judgment, etc. Christ, however, was more than man. He had superior endowments to the mass of mankind. He was (1) conceived of a virgin, (2) was perfectly holy, and (3) was exalted to absolute power, all things being made subject unto him.

Christ's work is treated in the Catechism under his threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Christ ordained the Lord's Supper, which is simply a memorial feast, a declaration of that which we already possess by faith. He also promised the Holy Ghost, who is not a person, but a power or activity of God, and eternal life. Looking at the priestly office, Christ is regarded as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared to be false and pernicious. The Scripture teaches very often that God forgives sins gratuitously (2 Cor. v. 19, etc.), and the idea of satisfaction is at complete variance with a free gift (Eph. ii. 8, etc.). It is the resurrection upon which the stress is laid; and Socinus expressly declares, that it is the head and ground of all our faith and salvation in the person of Christ (caput et tanquam fundamentum totius fidei et salutis nostre in Christi personis). The obedience Christ rendered to the law was due from him, for God had commanded him to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. The reconciliation accomplished by Christ consists simply in this, that to us who were enemies of God he showed the way to become converted, and return to God. The meaning of the atonement is, that God in Christ has shown himself to be above measure gracious (propitius). Christ's high-priestly office consists in the help he gives us. He delivers us from the punishments of sin by reason of the absolute power which he received from the Father, and which protects us. He delivers us from the bondage of sin by keeping us from all manner of sins. This he does by presenting to our thought his own person, which remained sinless in temptation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as believe on Christ. Faith consists of assent to the doctrine of Christ, trust in God through Christ, and obedience to God's commandments. Justification consists in this, that God treats us as righteous; and it is not an imputation of Christ's righteousness. The theory of an apprehension of his righteousness is a human fiction.

In the Socinian theology scriptural and unscriptural elements strangely meet. It was the real forerunner of modern rationalism, and in this consideration lies its chief claim to prolonged attention.

LIT. — The complete Works of Socinus are contained in the Bibliot. Fratrum Polonorum, vols. i., ii.; they consist of commentaries, polemic tracts against Catholics, Protestants, and Unitarians, etc. The principal of these writings are, Prælectiones theologicae: Christiana religionis brevissima institutio per interrogationes et responsiones, quæ catechismus vulgo vocat. SOCINUS, Lælius, uncle of Faustus; b. at Siena in 1525; d. at Zurich, May 16, 1562. He was an antitrinitarian.

SOCRATES. The life and death, teaching and influence, of Socrates, were so remarkable, that although he was known as "the moral philosopher of Athens," and has always been known as "the parent of philosophy," he is also entitled to a scarcely less conspicuous place in the history of religion.

The events in the life of Socrates are so few and so familiar, that we need not dwell upon them. The following epitome will suffice for the purposes of this article. He was born in Paiania, a deme of Attica, 469 B.C. His father, Sophroniscus, was a sculptor; his mother, Phænarete, was a midwife; and as in youth he followed successfully, if we may believe Pausanias, the occupation of his father, so, as he playfully remarked, he devoted his manhood, even till old age, to the assiduous practice of the profession of his mother, in bringing to birth, like a spiritual midwife, the thoughts and characters of his youthful countrymen. In three battles — at Potidea, at Delium, and at Amphipolis — he proved himself a brave and efficient citizen-soldier. At the age of sixty, as a senator (member of the βουλή), — the only instance in which he accepted office, — he showed his moral and political heroism by withstanding alone the excited passions, and for the time thwarting the perverse and vindictive purpose, of the people in their popular assembly. At the age of seventy (B.C. 399) he was accused of corrupting the youth, and not worshipping the gods of his country, tried before the popular diacety, condemned by a small majority of votes, and died by drinking hemlock.

The philosophy of Socrates is not so much a system of doctrines as a spirit of inquiry, and a method of search for the truth. That method, the method of question and answer, was so characteristic of Socrates, and at the same time so full of life and power, that it was adopted more or less by all his disciples, and has ever since been known as the Socratic method. It is seen in its perfection in the Dialogues of Plato, which are the idealized conversations of the idealized Socrates. The subject-matter of the Socratic philosophy is ethics in contradistinction to physics; its aim is practical to the exclusion of barren speculation; and conscious ignorance, modesty, moderation, pure and high morality, humble inquiry at the oracles of God about humble "human things," in a word, that childlike spirit, which, as Lord Bacon says, is the key both to "the kingdom of science and the kingdom of heaven," is among its most marked characteristics.

The chief good, our being's end and aim, according to the Socratic ethics, is happiness; not, however, that which most men call happiness; not εὐτυχία, but εὐπραγία and εὐδαιμονία; not the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the will of God and with the blessing of Heaven. The true, the beautiful, and the good are all essentially identical with each other, since they all consist in the useful and the fitting; and that which is good for nothing is neither good nor beautiful nor true. Xenophon and Plato agree in making Socrates teach that he who knows justice is just, and the man who understands virtue is virtuous: in other words, he resolves all virtue into knowledge. But it is plain from both these writers that he used knowledge in a high and comprehensive sense unusual in ethical treatises, but strikingly analogous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures. He makes knowledge identical with wisdom, and ignorance with folly and sin, just as in the Bible piety is wisdom, and sin is folly: the wicked have no knowledge, while the righteous know all things. He who is truly master of the science or profession of virtue will be truly virtuous. In this high sense, knowledge is virtue, since really to know is certainly to do, and to do is the only way truly to know.

Socrates believed in the existence of one supreme Divinity, the Creator and Disposer of the universe, the Maker and Father of mankind, the Ruler and Governor among the nations, invisible, all-powerful, omniscient, and omnipresent, perfectly wise and just and good. His method of demonstrating the existence of such a being was strictly Baconian, the same argument which Paley uses in his Natural Theology: indeed, we almost seem to be reading Paley when we read the chapters in which Xenophon records his master's arguments in proof of the divine existence and benevolence. And when we read, in the same author, of those unwritten laws in the soul of man which execute themselves, and make it impossible for any man to be unjust, or impure, or licentious, without paying the penalty (which proves a greater and better than any human law-giver), we seem to be sitting at the feet of Bishop Butler himself.

The doctrine of Socrates touching the inferior deities, whose existence he admits, and whose agency he recognizes, particularly in the providential care of human affairs, probably did not differ essentially from the Christian doctrine of the angels; though it marks the greater elevation of the Christian revelation and the Christian consciousness, that what the most enlightened heathen called gods, and worshipped, Christians consider as only ministers of God, whom to worship were idolatry.

We have not space to enlarge upon the teaching of Socrates respecting providence and prayer. He believed himself to be under the constant guidance of a divine voice, which always warned him when he was in danger of going or doing wrong, and thus, indirectly, always led him in the right way; and he taught that every man might have the same divine guidance; and he could not but wonder at the folly and madness of men who preferred a blind and ignorant guide to one who was unerring, and perfectly acquainted with the way in which they should go. Hence his one only and constant prayer was, that God would guide him, and give him, not riches, pleasure, honor, power, which were as likely to prove a bane as a blessing, but what was best for him; since God only knew what was for his true and highest good.

Socrates held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future life as strenuously as Plato did, but without those dreams and chimeras of its pre-existence and successive transigrations by which the creed of the latter was disfigured; and, with these exceptions, he doubtless relied on the same arguments in proof of the doctrine which have been stated in the article on Plato and Christianity; and — what has been usually wanting in heathen philosophers, and too often in the lives of Christians also — it was the beauty and glory of Socrates' character, that his doctrine of providence and prayer and a future state was the controlling principle of his life. And so he died a martyr's death with a cheerful composure, in the full persuasion that it was God's will and the consummation of his mission, and that it was better for him to die than to live; not in the certainty, but in the belief, that death was not an evil, but the highest good and the richest blessing. "Bury my body as you please," he said to his friends, "but do not mourn as if you were burying Socrates. Think of me, rather, as gone to be with the wise and the good, and with God, the fountain of wisdom and goodness, in that world where alone wisdom is to be found." Such teachings, illustrated by a conscientious, unselfish, heroic, missionary life, and sealed by a martyr's death — these are the main secret of his power, and these exhibit him in his true relation to Christianity. It would not be difficult, on the one hand, to point out defects in his teaching, and imperfections in his life, nor, on the other, to magnify the points of resemblance between him and the founder of our holy religion. Such comparisons have been elaborately made by Priestley, for example, in his tract, Socrates and Jesus Compared, and by Baur, in his Socrates and Christus, the second of those three treatises (Drei Abhandlungen), which were re-edited by Zeller in 1876. But the disparity is so great as to forbid comparison. The intuitions of Rousseau, sceptic as he was, taught him this: "What prejudice," he says (Emile, bk. iv.), "what blindness, must it be to compare the son of Sophroniscus to the son of Mary! . . . If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God." Socrates himself would have aspired to no higher honor than that of being a forerunner of Christ among the Greeks. That honor justly belongs to him; and his propaedeutic influence can easily be traced, like that of Plato, and largely through him and his followers, in the history and philosophy of the Greeks and Romans before and after Christ, while the power of his teaching and his life is still felt in the literature, the philosophy, and the religion of all Christian nations.

SOCRATES, the Greek church historian, was born in Constantinople about 380, and lived there as scholasticus. His work is a continuation of that of Eusebius, and encompasses the period from 306 to 439. It is a simple and natural report of facts, supported by rich extracts from the sources, and marred by comparatively few mistakes; but it is not distinguished by an artistic form, nor is the author above his time with respect to a critical sifting of miraculous stories. It has been edited (Greek and Latin) by Valesius, Paris, 1659, together with the histories of Eusebius and Sozomen; by R. Hussey, Oxford, 1853, 3 vols., Greek text separately, with Introduction by W. Bright, Oxford, 1878. See DEUBEN, in his Nouvelle Bibliothèque, iv.; HOLZHAUSEN: De pontificis quibus S. et . . . usi sunt, Göttingen, 1825; and BAUR

SODOM, the most important of four cities (Gomorrah, Admah, Zebodim, and Sodom) in the vale of Siddim, which were destroyed by "brimstone and fire" out of heaven, on account of the great wickedness of their inhabitants (Gen. xix. 24). Lot lived there (Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 2), and there his daughters married (Gen. xix. 14). Chedorlaomer and his allies plundered the cities, but the captives and spoils were recovered by Abraham (Gen. xiv.). The fate of Sodom and the other cities of the plain is held up in the Bible as a warning (Deut. xxix. 23; Isa. i. 9, 10; Amos iv. 11; Matt. x. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 6-8; Rev. xi. 8), and so deeply impressed itself upon the neighboring peoples, that Strabo, in his description of the Dead Sea (16, 2), which he erroneously calls the Sirbonian Sea, and Tacitus (Hist. 5, 7), relate, that, according to tradition, there once were cities and fruitful plains where then there was death. The question, whether these cities of the plain were upon the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea,—for the old opinion, that the sea covers the site of the cities, is given up as contradicted by geology,—is one of the most vexed in biblical geography. For the southern end the arguments are: (1) Tradition from the time of Josephus (Antiq. I. 11, 1; J'ar. IV., 8, 4; Eusebius (Onomast. s.v.) and Jerome (Ep. cviii. 11; Comm. in Esa. xv. 5); (2) The mountain of salt at that end is called Jebel Ushum, apparently an echo of Sodom; (3) Pillars of salt detached from the great salt cliffs at that end have been called "Lot's Wife;" (4) Abraham, standing near Hebron, saw the smoke of their burning (Gen. xix. 27, 28); (5) Numerous slime-pits, i.e., bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10) are found at that end; (6) The portion of the sea south of the Lisan Peninsula is very shallow, as if it were beyond its original limits. If the sea now covered the site of the cities, this would be the case. This view has been advocated by Robinson, Lynch, Porter, Baedeker, Schaaff, and many others. For the northern end, the arguments are, (1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 11), which must have been at the northern end, for in that case only could Abraham and Lot have seen it from Bethel; (2) Since the hill near Hebron was midway between the two ends of the sea, Abraham could just as well have seen the burning if it was at the northern end as if it was at the southern; (3) The presence of numerous slime-pits in the vale of Siddim, at the northern end; (4) The account of Chedorlaomer's attack fits best with the northern site for Sodom. Prominent advocates for the northern site are Grove, Tristram, and Merrill.

The destruction of the cities of the plain was probably the result of natural causes under divine control. The explosion of gas would easily account for it all. The soil, soaked with bitumen, would easily convey the fire until all the cities were destroyed.

SODOR AND MAN, an English bishopric (Sodor comes from Sordur-gar, Southern Isles, corresponding to Nordur-gar, Northern Isles), is the name applied to the western islands of Scotland, especially to those contiguous to the Isle of Man; and hence the name of the bishopric. The income of the bishop is £2,000.

SOHN, Georg, b. at Rossbach, Dec. 31, 1551; d. at Heidelberg, April 23, 1589. He studied theology at Marburg and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1574, and at Heidelberg in 1581. He was a pupil of the Melancthonian school, and considered himself a member and teacher of the Reformed Church. His works,—the principal of which are Synopsis corporis doctrina Phil. Melancthonis, De verbo Dei, Methodus theologia, etc.—appeared in a collected edition at Heilbrun, in 4 vols., 1591. HEPPE.

SOISSONS, a town of France in the department of Aisne, was the seat of a number of important synods.—I. The synod of 743 was convened by Pepin the Short, and presided over by Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence. Besides a number of secular lords, twenty-three bishops were present; and the canons issued by Carloman in 742 were confirmed, forbidding the clergy to hunt, to marry, etc., prohibiting unknown persons from performing ecclesiastical duties, enjoining the counts to suppress Paganism, etc.—II. The synod of 852 numbered twenty-six bishops, and Charles the Bald was present. The Archbishop of Rheims, Ebbo, had some time previously been deposed for participation in a revolt against the king,—a quite frequent accusation against the Frankish bishops,—and Hincmar had been made his successor. As Ebbo, however, shortly after, was appointed bishop of Hildesheim by Lewis the German, and confirmed by the Pope, he continued to ordain priests. But there was a canon forbidding the transference of a bishop from one diocese to another, unless with the consent of his brother-bishops; and the validity of Ebbo's ordinations was now impeached on account of that canon. The synod declared them invalid.—III, IV., and V. The synods of 861, 862, and 866 treated the same subject.—VI. The synod of 1092 was convened to decide in the controversy between Anselm of Canterbury and Roscelin. The former accused the latter of tritheism, and the latter was compelled to recant.—VII. The synod of 1121 was convened by the Papal legate, Bishop Conon of Praeneste, to examine the writings of Abelard. As Abelard refused to attempt any defence of what he had written, he was compelled to throw his works into the fire with his own hands.—VIII. The synod of 1201 was convened by the Papal legate, Octavian, for the purpose of cancelling the permission to a second marriage which the French bishop had given King Philip August, and compelling the king to take back his first wife, the Danish princess Ingeborg, whom he had repudiated.—IX. The synod of 1449, finally, was convened by the Archbishop of Rheims, John Juvenal Ursinus. It adopted the decrees of the Council of Basel concerning liturgy, and treated a number of misuses which had crept into the church. See CUR. W. FR. SOLITARIUS, Philip, a Greek monk who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century in Constantinople, wrote a work in verse; and in the form of a dialogue, under the title Δοττιρα, "the mirror;" it is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. It found much favor, was commented by Michael Psellus, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuit, Jacob Pontanus, Ingolstadt, 1604; but the translation, which is also found in the Bibl. Mac. patr. Lugd., vol. xxi., is very incorrect. Of the Greek text, only a few fragments have been printed by Oudin, Lambecius, and Cotelierius.

SOLOMON, second son of David by Bathsheba, his successor upon the throne, and third king over Israel, who reigned forty years (1015-975 B.C.; according to Ewald, 1025-986). Compare 1 Kings i.-xi.; 2 Chron. i.-ix.; Joseph., Jutt., VIII. 1-7. His early education was intrusted to the prophet Nathan, who called him Jedidiah, i.e., the beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 24, 25). Through the influence of his mother, Nathan, and Zadok the priest, Solomon, at the age of twenty, was made king while his father was yet alive. Riding on the mule, attended by Nathan and Zadok, and by the king's special company of the thirty mighty men, and the body-guard under the command of Benaiah, he went down to Gihon, and was proclaimed and anointed king. His first acts, showing moderation, prudence, and energy, were well adapted to gain for him the esteem and confidence of his people. The death of Joab, who had insidiously killed Abner and Amasa, and who had openly sided with Adonijah, combined justice with prudence, fulfilling at the same time David's dying counsels. Shimei also is killed at David's wish; Adonijah is put to death; Abiathar is deposed and exiled, sent to a life of poverty and shame, and the high-priesthood transferred to another family, that of Zadok. To the descendants of Barzillai he shows kindness. Such a firm and circumspect appearance secured to the new king general obedience. Soon he displayed signs of wisdom which made him known throughout the country; and, as it was the king's intention to walk in all the ways of Jehovah, the God of his father granted his desire, and endowed him with true royal wisdom.

His name and his deeds made Solomon a prince of power, under whose sceptre the people and the country prospered. But at the beginning and towards the end of his reign, in the south, north, and west some princes rose. Hadad the Edomite, who had fled into Egypt, when he had heard that David and Joab were dead, returned into his country, of which he takes possession (1 Kings xi. 21, 22, 25). Rezon, also, gathered some men unto him, and took Damascus; but he had at last to yield to Solomon. The little kingdom of Gazer, or Geshur, between Israel and Philistea, rose also, but fell into the hands of the king of Egypt, who gave it to Solomon when he married his daughter. Solomon's success against the usurpers was sufficient to secure his authority, even beyond the confines of his own country; and for a long time peace reigned throughout his kingdom. In the beginning of his reign he married the daughter of King Pschemmes of Egypt.

Many structures which Solomon had erected made his name very famous in the east and in the west. Like his father, he secured builders from Hiram, king of Tyre. For the lower menial work he used at first the "strangers," the remnant of the Canaanitish races; afterwards his own people, too, had to help in the work. The first great building was the magnificent temple, built after the pattern of the tabernacle, but executed in accordance with the plans which David had received from the hand of the Lord (1 Chron. xxviii. 11, 19). After seven years and a half the work on the temple was completed. About the time of the feast of tabernacles, the temple was dedicated with great solemnities; the king himself addressed the assembly (1 Kings viii.). As the temple, like the Holy of holies, was intended to be the habitation of God, the "cloud," "the glory of the Lord," filled the house of the Lord. With the building of the temple a new organization of the order of the priests and Levites, which was made by David, undoubtedly took place. He appointed twenty-four orders for the service at the temple, and the same number for the choir of the temple-music. The second great building was his palace, which was built south of the temple (Neh. iii. 25). It consisted of many divisions, which served partly as magazines, partly as rooms for the king and his queens. The main building was a hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. In the porch stood a great throne of ivory, and overlaid with the best gold. It stood on six steps, and twelve lions stood on each side of the same, while two lions stood beside the stays (1 Kings x. 18-20; 2 Chron. ix. 17-19). The palace was connected with the temple by steps. A special seat was reserved for the king. That he also erected many other buildings, etc., we infer from 1 Kings ix. 1, 19; Eccles. ii. 4-6; Song of Songs viii. 11. He also fortified the capital, and many fortresses were built. In the organization of his army he imitated the Egyptians. He had a thousand and four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, or put them in small cities. The inner administration of the kingdom was also regulated. The highest officer was the chancellor; next to him was the "scribe," who also regulated the finances. Besides he had a captain over his body-guard. The king's enormous household was supplied with provisions by the provinces of his domain.

Trade and commerce became also very flourishing under Solomon, and the revenues from these commercial enterprises by land and by sea enriched the royal treasury. Besides these direct revenues, the kings and princes of the subject-provinces paid tribute in the form of gift, in money and in kind, "at a fixed rate year by year" (1 Kings x. 25).

Thus Solomon's reign marks the entrance of Israel on a nearer intercourse with the Asiatic peoples. That such an intercourse was not without an influence upon the intellect of the Jewish people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron.

In spite of his greatness, Solomon had his blemishes. Nathan his teacher was dead, without leaving another person in his stead to protect and guide the king. Outwardly Solomon appeared to have fulfilled the duties of the theocratic ruler, without exactly needing such a support as David had in Nathan and Gad. By and by the consciousness that such royal glory was incompatible with the advancement of the true theocracy was awake and alive; the prophets Ahijah of Shilo, Shemaja, and Iddo were not favorably disposed toward the king; the first sees the coming of the ruin. The people was dissatisfied on account of the many oppressive contributions which were laid upon it. The greatest stumbling-block, by which he wounded the religious feeling of the people, was his harem; for, whatever might have been the number of his wives, the harem was in opposition to the spirit of true Jehovah-religion, and the more so as most of these women were foreigners, "who turned away his heart after other gods." It was not Solomon's intention to change or abandon the religion of Jehovah, but "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God" (1 Kings xi. 4). Beside the worship of Jehovah, he allowed the worship of strange gods, and built altars for Ashtaroth, Milcom, and Chemosh. Thus Solomon came more and more in opposition with the true patriotic spirit of the people; and the pious Jew connects, therefore, his highest hopes, not with his name, but with that of his father David, whilst among heathen and Mohammedans Suleiman is still highly celebrated. SOMASCHIANS, The Order of the (or Clerici regulares S. Majoli Papir congregationis Somasche), the most important institution resulting from the anti-reformatory revival within the Roman-Catholic Church in the first half of the sixteenth century, received its name from the village Somaseho, between Milan and Bergamo, in which its founder, Girolamo Miani, or Hieronymus Emilianus, first established the association, and wrote its rules. Miani was born in 1481, and descended from a rich and distinguished family. He served in the campaigns against Charles VIII. and Louis XII.; but having been taken prisoner at the storming of Castelnuovo (1508), and shut up in a German dungeon, he was converted, and, after his release, he devoted himself to the nursing and education of poor orphans and the conversion of fallen women. In 1528 he formed the first orphan-asylum, and in 1532 the first Magdalen asylum in Venice; and soon similar institutions were established in Milan, Bergamo, Pavia, and other cities. In 1533 he founded an association to administer his institutions, and before his death (Feb. 8, 1537), the association had grown into a regular monastic order. It was confirmed by Paul III. in 1540, and by Paul IV. in 1563, and adopted the rules of St. Augustine. It was for a short time united with that of the Theatines (1546-55), and with that of the Fathers of the Christian Doctrine (1616-47), but succeeded best when alone. In 1661, under Alexander VII., it comprised three provinces. See HOLSTENIUS: Cod. regul. mon., vol. iii., and Vita Hieronymi Emiliani, in Acta Sanctorum, February, vol. ii. ZÖCKLER.

SOOTHSAYER. Soothsaying and oracles owe their origin to the natural human desire to know the future, or, in doubtful cases, the best. This desire, in turn, springs partly from unwillingness to think deeply, and partly from the notion that the divine intention can be found out or influenced; that it is directed haphazardly and arbitrarily at men. Soothsaying is therefore characteristic of nature-religions. It was forbidden in the sternest manner in the Mosaic law, and punished with death by stoning, as essentially idolatrous (Lev. xix. 26, 31, xx. 6, 27; Jer. xxvii. 9), particularly because the divine will had been distinctly revealed to Israel in its history. Yet there were legitimate ways by which the divine will could be known: e.g., by the Urim and Thummim, and by the seers. Soothsaying existed in Israel notwithstanding the law, and in one case Saul had recourse to a witch at En-dor. Here it was in the form of necromancy. The deceit practised is plainly revealed in the straightforward narrative (1 Sam. xxviii. 7-25). The king did not see the apparition of Samuel. The witch was apparently behind a curtain; and only after she had uttered her curse upon the king, who had done his utmost to extinguish her trade, did she come out. In some cases ventriloquism was perhaps employed. The Hebrews also employed the teraphim in soothsaying. In the New Testament a soothsaying slave-girl is spoken of in Acts xvi. 16 sq. This form was Greek, and characterized by raving and convulsions. See DIVINATION, NECROMANCY; SAALSCHÜTZ: Mosaiches Recht, Berlin, 1852, pp. 310 sqq., and the commentaries. L. DIESTEL.

SOPHIA (Gr., wisdom), a name which occurs very often in the catalogues of saints and martyrs in the ancient church; but the stories told there can in no case be verified. — One Sophia, a Christian widow, is said to have suffered martyrdom in Rome under Hadrian, about 120, together with her three daughters, Fides (faith), Spes (hope), and Caritas (love); but the very names of the daughters make the story suspicious. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 30. — Another Sophia, Sophia Senatrix, was married to a Byzantine senator, but retired, after the death of her husband and their six children, to the monastery of Enos in Thracia, became a nun, and devoted herself to deeds of charity. See Act. Sanct., June 4. — For other Sophias, see Act. Sanct., April 30 and June 4, and Martyrolog. Roman., Sept. 8. GASS.

SOPHRONIUS, a native of Greece; made the acquaintance of Jerome in Palestine, and is mentioned in De viris illustribus (cap. 134). He translated parts of the Old Testament, and some of Jerome's works, from Latin into Greek. His name has excited most interest, however, in connection with the Greek translation of De viris illustribus, which Erasmus and Fabricius ascribed to him, while Vossius simply considered it a Greek exercise of Erasmus. The translation is mentioned by Suidas, however, but can hardly be the work of Sophronius. See Vallarsius, in his edition of the works of Jerome, vol. ii. part 2, p. 818. — Another Sophronius, a monk from Damascus, is known from the Monothelite controversies as a violent adversary of the mediating attempts of the Emperor Heraclius. For a time he yielded to the admonitions of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople; but when, in 631, he was elected patriarch of Jerusalem, he issued an Epistola encyclica (see Harduin: Acta Conc., iii.), in which he rejected all concessions to the Monophysites, and caused thereby the emperor to promulgate the Isacian. Other writings by him exist in manuscript. GASS.

SORBONNE, The, was originally simply a college for poor students, connected with an elementary school for the philological and philosophical education of ecclesiastics, but succeeded so well, developed so great an energy, and exercised so decisive an influence, that in course of time it came to be quite generally identified, not only with the theological faculty, but even with the university itself.

The origin of the university of Paris may be dated back to the time of Charlemagne; but a real Corpus Universitatis, with distinct faculties and nations, and a sufficient number of colleges, was not in active operation until the twelfth century. When John of Salisbury arrived in Paris (1136), he found two flourishing faculties in the university, — artes (rhetoric and philosophy, or rather dialectics) and theologia (Scripture, the Fathers, the councils, and canon law). After Gratian's compilation of decretals had been accepted and confirmed by Eugenius III., in 1151, a faculty of law was established; and its professors, though theologians, lectured not only on canon law, but also on civil law, especially after the discovery of the pandects of Justinian by the surrender of Anagni. A faculty of medicine was not founded until 1180. In 1160 people who wanted to study medicine were still compelled to go from Paris to Montpellier. Celibacy was obligatory on all professors, also the medical.

A college was originally destined only for the material wants of the students; it was their home. They lived there under strict rules, yet with more freedom than in a monastery. The lectures were given in the schools; the theological generally in the Domas, the archiepiscopal palace, though William of Champeaux lectured in St. Victor, and Abelard in Ste. Geneviève. The oldest college in Paris was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas du Louvre. But as a course of theology comprised from seven to nine years, and the custom soon arose that the older students in a college instructed the younger, and as doctores issuing from a certain college often continued to reside there for a long time, and a library generally was formed in connection with the institution, the college naturally became a kind of minor university. Such was more especially the case with that of the Sorbonne, founded by Robert of Sorbon, or Sorbonne, in Champagne (d. 1277). He was chaplain to Louis IX., and very zealous for the promotion of the study of theology. From the king he obtained a suitable site in the Camp greg. ("Cut-throat" Street), — a rather significant name; and there he built a magnificent college for his Con- gregatio pauperum magistrorum studium in theologia facultate, which congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268.

After the example of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a teacher of theology was also appointed at the Sorbonne; and the happy choice of the first teachers — William of Saint-Amour, Eudes of Douai, and Laurent l'Anglois — contributed much to increase the reputation of the establishment. Afterwards a considerable number of great doctors took up their abode in the college; and, when the regular lectures of the faculty were removed from the archiepiscopal palace to the Sorbonne, it was quite natural that people in general should identify the college with the faculty; so much the more natural as its theology really determined the character of the theology of the faculty. The general tendency of that theology was that which must underlie all true theology, — a perfect mediation between faith and knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical misuses or sacerdotal eccentricities. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. Among its other merits may also be mentioned, that it established the first printing-press in Paris, 1470; and, as an indication of the high rank it held in the world's estimation, it may be added that it represented the university of Paris at the councils.

The decadence of the Sorbonne began when it fell into the hands of the Guises, and became the handmaid of Ultramontanism; and the public soon discovered the antiquated and re-actionary tendencies of its activity. In 1621 it obtained an edict of the Parliament forbidding, under penalty of corporal punishment, and even death, to teach any thing against the accepted authorities. The edict was directed against Descartes; and the Sorbonne was so far from learning any thing from Malebranche, Fénelon, or Leibnitz, that it wanted to have the edict renewed in 1671. The president of the Parliament, Lamoignon, found it difficult to refuse, until, one day, he found on his table Boileau's burlesque, Arrêt donné en la Grande Chambre du Parlement. That decided the case. In 1751 appeared Voltaire's Le fondau de la Sorbonne; and no voice was raised in its defence, when, in 1790, the state seized all its property, as belonging to the nation, and disposed of it for other purposes.

SOTER (pope 168–176 or 177), a native of Campania, is said to have written a work against the Montanists, which was refuted by Tertullian; but the work is lost, as is also his Epistle to the Corinthians, which was not uncommonly read in the congregations at Sunday service. The decretals bearing his name are spurious. SEE DECKER.

SOTERIOLOGY (ΣΩΤΗΡ, σωτηρια) is that branch of Christian theology which treats of the work of the Saviour,—the doctrine of salvation, so far as such salvation has been wrought out by the second person in the Holy Trinity. It is to be carefully distinguished from soteriology, or christology (v. CHRISTOLOGY), which treats solely of the person of the Redeemer,—his incarnation, his divinity, and his humanity, and the combination of these two elements in his single and perfect personality. Yet it should be borne in mind always, that any adequate conception of his soteriological work must be based on right views, antecedently obtained and established, respecting the Christ as he is in himself,—the appointed and qualified Saviour of men.

Soteriology does not include the concurrent work of the Son of God in other spheres, such as creation, or providence, or moral administration. Nor does it include those aspects of salvation which involve, on the one side, the elective purpose and love of the Father, or, on the other, the interior ministry of the Spirit in the application of saving grace. While the Son is concerned with the Father in the original plan of redemption and in the selection of those in whom that plan becomes effectual (v. PREDESTINATION), his specific work lies rather in the execution of that plan, and in the actual securing of redemption to all who believe. While, again, the Son is concerned with the Holy Spirit in the conviction of sinners, and in bringing them, through regeneration and sanctification, into the full enjoyment of the salvation provided (v. HOLY SPIRIT), his primary work is rather the provision itself on which, as a divine foundation, this subsequent work of spiritual restoration must be based. The Father creates, preserves, governs, plans, elects, as introductory; the Spirit enlightens, educates, sanctifies, and completes the saving process in the individual soul; the Son, acting as intermediate, represents, reveals, instructs, atones for sin, placates law, and lays a foundation in justice, whereby, under an economy of grace, every one who believes in him, the Father and the Spirit concurring, may be saved.

The most general conception of this specific work of the Son of God is expressed in the term mediation (v. MEDIATOR, MEDIATION). His peculiar mission is to interpose, in the temper of grace and for the purpose of both forensic and spiritual reconciliation, between man as a sinner, and the Deity against whom man has offended, and with whom he is morally at variance. As a mediator, the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, was amply qualified, both by inherent endowment and through official appointment; and in his work of mediation he is actually successful in removing alienation, in restoring the lost harmony between God and the sinner, and in securing to man a complete and blessed and eternal atonement with his heavenly Father. This generic work of mediation is generally described by Calvinistic theologians under the three specific forms indicated in the terms prophet, priest, and king (v. JESUS CHRIST, THREE OFFICES OF). It has been questioned whether this distribution is in all respects desirable, whether, by the division of the one work into these three parts or offices, our sense of the essential unity of that work is not impaired; and whether the underlying idea of mediation is not weakened by such multiplicity of particular functions and relations. (VAN OOSTERZEE: Christian Dogmatics, see cviii.) Is this central idea adequately expressed in these three forms? Do they contain neither more nor less than the underlying conception? And, where the distribution is made, are these three offices always kept in their proportionate place, and severally invested with their proper dignity and value in the one mediatorial work? Whatever answer may be given to these questions on exegetical or speculative grounds, there is no adequate reason for rejecting an analytic presentation which has gained such definite expression in current evangelical creeds (Heidelberg Catechism, Ans. 31; Westminster Confession, chap. viii.), and which has been so extensively adopted as a regulative guide in modern theology.

Studying soteriology in this triple aspect, we may first note the prophetic function of the Saviour, as including that entire revelation of saving truth which he, as the divine Logos, came among men to make (v. PROPHET, PROPHECY). All religious, and especially all inspired, teachers who were prior to him as revealers of sacred doctrine or duty, were only messengers to prepare the way before him; and all who followed after had it as their mission simply to elucidate and expand what he taught. Christ was the one perfect Logos, in virtue both of his eternal relationship within the Trinity (v. TRINITY) and of his specific appointment as the Word of the Godhead to man. In him resided all the qualifications requisite to the complete fulfilment of this prophetic work, and from him came in highest form, and with most commanding power, all the truth which man needs to know in order to his salvation. This prophetic function may be subdivided into direct and indirect,—direct teaching through the formal enunciation of saving truths, and indirect teaching through the superadded power of example and personality. Christ, as teacher and prophet, becomes an enduring pattern also. In himself, as well as in his message, was light; and the light was the life of men. It may be queried, whether, in consequence of the strong inclination of evangelical Protestantism to exalt the priestly work of our Lord as central, this prophetic mission has not been relatively too much ignored, and, more specifically, whether the biblical view of him as the true norm and example of our humanity has not been surrendered too much to the uses of those who altogether reject his priestly character and mission.

Concerning this priestly function, it is needless to repeat what has been said elsewhere (v. ATONEMENT, JUSTIFICATION, JESUS CHRIST (THREE OFFICES OF), PRIESTS, PRIESTHOOD, OFFERINGS IN THE OLD TESTAMENT, etc.). The essential fact in the case is the voluntary and vicarious surrender of himself by our Lord as a sacrifice before God for sinners, on account of their sin, and in order to expiate sin, and to render possible the reconciliation and restoration of man as sinful. As a sacrifice, Christ was inherently and judicially perfect, a lamb without blemish and without spot: as a priest, he was in every way qualified for the sacrificial work in which he was thus engaged; and his administration of the priestly office was voluntary, official, and acceptable. In him both the Aaronic priesthood and the peculiar priesthood of Melchisedec were singularly blended. He was, in his own person, the absolute culmination of the priestly as well as the prophetic order and idea. As priest and as sacrifice he was perfect.

That this vicarious intervention and offering of himself in behalf of sinners and for sin was an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Saviour, is too clearly revealed in Scripture to be questioned by any who receive its testimony in the case as conclusive. It was not a merely arbitrary scheme, resting on no recognizable necessity; it was rather a scheme imperatively demanded by the ethical nature of both God and man, and by the character of the salvation which man as sinful needed. The exigencies of that moral government against which the sinner had rebelled, the requisitions of justice as an eternal principle in the Deity, and the needs of the soul itself in order to its spiritual recovery, alike required—as the Bible in multiplied ways asserts—such a sacrifice of himself, even unto death, on the part of our Redeemer. Without this, mediation would have been both inadmissible and ineffectual.

Whatever may be the precise method or methods in which that sacrifice in the divine economy becomes efficacious in satisfying justice, in placating law, in revealing grace, and making that grace potential, there can be no question in believing minds as to the fact. It must needs be that Christ to this end must suffer; and it must needs be that through his suffering, vicarious and substitutional, we are saved.

The nature and the extent of the atonement, as thus exhibited specifically in the priestly work of Christ, are matters respecting which wide differences of opinion have long existed within evangelical circles. Whether he personally assumed our guilt, and became, by the direct imputation of that guilt, a transgressor, deserving the infliction of actual penalty, or simply took our sin upon him as a weight to be carried and removed, meanwhile himself remaining sinless, alike in person and before the law; whether he endured the actual penalty of human transgression, being literally made in his representative relation a curse for us, or simply suffered what might be equitably regarded as an equivalent for penalty remitted, and a sufficient ground for the bestowal of pardon and all other spiritual blessings; whether his work was an actual and special provision for the redemption of the elect only, or was rather a generic arrangement of which all men may, through grace, alike avail themselves, a salvation offered implying in the fullest sense a salvation provided,—these are questions respecting which evangelical minds have differed, and which need no discussion here. Whatever may be the views of believers as to either the nature, or the extent, and scope, of this sacrificial work of Christ, all are agreed in regarding the fact itself as both unquestionable and vital. That our Lord suffered as well as taught, and that he suffered on account of our sin and in order to save us from it, and that through his suffering we are actually saved from both the condemnation and the power of evil, and that this salvation is immediate and certain, and will be complete at last,—these are the great facts of grace which lie at the basis of the evangelical system, and which constitute the foundation of all evangelical hope.

Justification is the divine act of pardoning sin, and accepting sinners as if they were righteous, on the ground generically of all that Christ has done in the Unus Triplex of mediation, and specifically on the ground of what he has suffered as well as done in our behalf as our great high priest and sacrifice. The unconditional pardon of sin, with no appropriate regard for the nature of moral government and the claims of justice, would be an act unworthy of God. To accept the sinner as if he were righteous, and to adopt him (v. Abortion) into the family of God, and make him an heir of spiritual privileges and blessings, without requiring from him repentance, and return to loyalty, as conditions, and with no provision for his deliverance from the legal penalties incurred by his sin, would be a transaction still more unworthy. And the only adequate warrant for such pardon, acceptance, and adoption, must be found, not in any worthiness inherent in the nature of man or any merit seen in his life, nor even in his faith and repentance viewed as concomitants or consequences, but simply in the mediatorial, and especially in the sacrificial, work of Christ only. Our justification is in him, and in him alone.

The kingly office of the Saviour is a necessary element in his broad work of mediation. He is king because he has been prophet and priest; he is also king inherently, as divine. His kingdom commences in the believing heart, and is essentially spiritual: it is an authority exercised in love, and for the purpose of salvation. His church, as composed of those who have thus submitted to him personally, is his gracious empire; and over that empire he is the supreme head, everywhere and always. Within that church there can be no authority to supersede, or even, in the papal sense, to represent his: all its laws, officers, administration, activities, are subject entirely to him. This kingdom was founded by him before his earthly advent; it has been extended through many hands and centuries by his grace and power; it will continue to increase, through the agency of the forces now incorporated in it, until it has filled the earth. The notion, that, as a kingdom of love, it will ere long be supplanted by a kingdom of power, in which Christ will visibly appear as an earthly monarch, subduing his enemies by irresistible strength, and exalting his saints with him to a species of temporal domination (v. MILLENARIANISM), is at variance with the view here presented. Beyond this earthly empire of our Lord as already defined, we discern his princely exaltation even now, at the right hand of the Father, to be advocate and intercessor for his people. This advocacy and intercession are to continue until all who are his are finally brought together with him into what is literally the kingdom of heaven.

Returning from this survey of the specific functions or offices of Christ to the underlying idea of mediation, we are able to comprehend in one view the full doctrine of salvation as wrought out by him on our behalf. There is indeed a subjective soteriology, which includes especially the work wrought within the soul of man by our Saviour through his spirit, and which is expressed in the terms regeneration and sanctification. But objective soteriology, such as we are considering, is summed up rather in the triple phrase of Aquinas, — Christus Legislator, Sacerdos, Rex. To the Protestant mind it is pictured forth essentially in the term justification, which, equally with regeneration and sanctification, shows us wherein the divine salvation consists.

SOTO, Dominicus de, b. at Segovia in 1494; d. at Salamanca, Nov. 15, 1560. He studied at Alcalá and in Paris; began in 1520 to teach philosophy at Alcalá, where he re-established realism in its old rights as the true principle of philosophy, and published Commentarii in Aristotelis Dialecticam (Salamanca, 1544), Categorías (Venice, 1553), Libris viii. physicorum (Salamanca, 1545), etc. In 1524 he entered the Dominican order, on which occasion he changed his baptismal name Franciscus for that of Dominicus; and in 1532 he was appointed teacher of theology at Salamanca. By Charles V. he was sent as a deputy to the Council of Trent in 1545; and there, too, he appeared as a staunch champion of realism, publishing De natura et gratia (Venice, 1547), Apologia (Venice, 1547), etc.; but, after the transference in 1547 of the council to Bologna, he returned to the court, where he was appointed confessor to the emperor. In 1550 he resigned that position, and retired to Salamanca, where he spent the rest of his life, partly as teacher in the university, and partly as prior in a monastery. Among his works from this last part of his life, are commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans (against the Protestants) and on the Gospel of St. Matthew (unprinted), and De iustitia et pure, Salamanca, 1556, etc. NEUDECKER.

SOTO, Petrus de, a passionate adversary of the Reformation; b. at Cordova; d. at Trent, April 20, 1563. He entered the Dominican order in 1519, and accompanied Charles V. as confessor to Germany, where he was appointed teacher of theology at Dillingen. Afterwards he went with Philip to England, and taught theology at Oxford; but after the death of Mary, in 1558, he returned to Dillingen, whence he was called in 1561 to the re-opened Council of Trent, by Pius IV. He wrote Institutiones Christiana, Augsburg, 1548; Methodus confessionum, Dillingen, 1553; Compendium doctrinae catholicae, Antwerp, 1556; Tractatus de institutione sacerdotum, Dillingen, 1558, etc. NEUDECKER.

SOUL SLEEP, or PSYCHOPANNYCHISM (from sleep—night), denotes a peculiar view of the state of the soul between the death and the resurrection of the body, according to which the soul is asleep. It somewhat resembles the still grosser error of soul-death, or thymetopyschism, which was defended by Petrus Pompenatius (d. 1525), and according to which the soul is actually dead from the death of the body to the day of the last judgment. The idea of soul-sleep originated among the Arabian and Armenian sects, but found also some favor in the west; traces of it occur in the writings of the Fathers. It was condemned by the councils of Lyons (1271), Ferrara (1438), Florence (1439), and Trent (1545-63); though Pope John XXII. (d. 1301) accepted it and openly advocated it. In the period of the Reformation it was revived by the Socinians and Arminians, and fully developed by the Anabaptists. Calvin wrote against it in his De psychopannychia, 1534, and in his Tract. var., vol. ii. See C. F. SOULE, Joshua, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Bristol, Hancock County, Me., Aug. 1, 1781; d. at Nashville, Tenn., March 6, 1867. He was converted in June, 1797, was licensed to preach the following year, and in 1799 was admitted into the New-England Conference. In 1804 he was appointed presiding elder, and served as such, with one year's exception, until 1816, when he was appointed Book Agent in New-York City. He was the author of the plan for a delegated general conference of the church, which was accepted at Baltimore in 1808. He was editor of the Methodist Magazine from 1816 to 1819. In 1820 he was elected to the episcopacy, but declined to accept the office on the ground that the office of presiding elder had been made, by the General Conference of that year, elective, rather than subject to the appointment of the presiding bishop. In 1820-22 he preached in New-York City, and in 1822-24 in Baltimore. In 1824 he was again elected bishop, and accepted, as the office of presiding elder had now been made again subject to episcopal appointment. After his election to the episcopacy, he resided for some time at Lebanon, O. In 1842 he went as a fraternal delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference. At the division of the church in 1844, he adhered to the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and thereupon moved to Nashville, Tenn. He continued active in the discharge of his episcopal duties until about ten years before his death, which occurred in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was a presiding officer of great executive ability. In the graver and more important councils of the church he had no superior for discreet judgment, and prudence in counsel. He was eminently fitted in mind and character for controlling wisely and successfully measures and men. As a preacher he was slow and deliberate, but always sound in doctrine, strong in argument, and vigorous in style. His discourses evinced both breadth and depth, and are said to have been at times overwhelmingly impressive. He was a man of remarkable strength, both of character and of intellect. W. F. TILLET.

SOUTH, Robert, b. at Hackney, a suburb of London, in 1633; d. in London, July 8, 1716. His father was a wealthy London merchant, who afforded his son every advantage for a thorough education. His preparatory studies were pursued in the Westminster School, where he became a king's scholar, under the famous master, Dr. Busby. South is said to have read the Latin prayers in the school on the day of the execution of Charles I. and prayed for him by name; thus early showing that attachment to the established government and religion which ever afterwards distinguished him. In 1651 he was admitted as a student of Christ Church, Oxford, at the same time with John Locke. In 1655 he took the degree of bachelor of arts. During this year he composed a Latin poem congratulating Oliver Cromwell on the peace which he had concluded between England and Holland. As this was a prescribed university exercise, it is not necessary to infer that South was ever a Cromwellian at heart. Indeed, he appears to have been unpopular, even at that early day, with the Puritan party then in power; for when, in 1657, he obtained the degree of master of arts, John Owen, then dean of Christ Church, opposed his application. South was ordained in 1658 by one of the bi-shops who had been deprived of his bishopric during the Protectorate. In 1660, the year of the restoration of the monarchy, South was elected orator to the university of Oxford, and preached before the royal commission a sermon entitled the Scribe instructed, which immediately placed him in the front rank of English preachers. He delivered the university oration when Clarendon was installed Chancellor of Oxford, — a discourse which so impressed Clarendon, that he appointed him his domestic chaplain. This led to his installation, in 1663, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and in 1670 he was made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1677 South accompanied the son of the Earl of Clarendon, Lawrence Hyde, on an embassy to congratulate John Sobieski upon his election to the crown of Poland. He gave an interesting account of what he saw abroad in a letter to Pococke, the professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a fellow-canon. Soon after his return to England, in 1678, he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, the revenue of which, some two hundred pounds, he applied, half to the payment of his curate, and half to educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the parish. South soon became one of the king's chaplains, and preached a sermon before Charles II., marked by invective against Cromwell, and, what is not very common with South, violation of good taste. This recommended him to the monarch, who suggested his appointment to the next vacant bishopric. But South declined all such offers, both in this reign and in that of James II. While he was a strenuous defender of the English Church, he was a determined enemy of the Roman-Catholic. The concealed Popery of Charles and the open Popery of James met with no support, but with determined opposition, from South. His stiff loyalty led him to refuse to sign the invitation, drawn up by the archbishop and bishops, to the Prince of Orange to assume the throne, saying, that "his religion taught him to bear all things; and, however it should please God that he should suffer, he would, by the divine assistance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and unadvised councils wherewith he was entangled." But subsequently, when James had formally abdicated the throne, and the crown was settled upon William and Mary, South gave in his allegiance to the new government. He would, however, accept no bishopric from it, though his friends exerted themselves in this behalf. And he continued to be of this mind, when in the next reign, that of Anne, the same effort was repeated to raise him to what is the height of worldly ambition for many churchmen. But, while he did not seek the honors of the Establishment, he was the determined enemy of Dissent, and preached against it. He opposed the Act of Toleration. When an attempt was made, through a royal commission, to unite the Dissenters with the Established Church, by modifying the Liturgy, South entreated them to part with none of its ceremonial. In 1693 he had a controversy with Dr. William Sherlock, a fellow-churchman, and dean of St. Paul's, who, in his construction of the doctrine of the Trinity, fell into tritheism. South advocated the Nicene view with "great power of argument, and infinite wit and humor; more, indeed, than suited the solemnity of the subject."

The last part of South's life was clouded with sickness and debility which laid him aside from the active duties of his calling. His life was prolonged; and Dean Swift, it is said, waited impatiently, with other aspirants, for his decease, that he might get his prebendary and rectory. South died at the age of eighty-three, and was buried beside his old master, Dr. Busby, in Westminster Abbey.

South's distinction is that of a preacher, and he is second to none in any language. No one has combined and blended logic and rhetoric in more perfect proportions. Every sermon is founded upon a clear and clean plan that can be analyzed, and presented in its parts; and yet every sermon moves forward, from beginning to end, like a flowing stream, without break. He argues closely and rigorously; but the argument never interferes with the fluency and impetuosity of the discourse. The fire of his intellect kindles into a flame all his materials, however heavy and unwieldy. Even such subjects as predestination and the trinity are made popular and interesting by his powerful grasp and handling. And all this is heightened by his remarkable style. His mastery of English is almost unrivalled. The closeness and intimacy of the connection between the thought and the word is hardly excelled even by Shakspeare himself.

South was a Calvinist at a time when the drift of the High-Church Episcopacy, which he favored, set strongly towards Arminianism. Though anti-Puritan, and bitterly so, in regard to polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, he was a Puritan in theology. John Owen was not a higher predestinarian than he, and Richard Baxter was a lower one. It must have been from an intense conviction of the truth of this type of doctrine, that South, in the face of all his prejudices and of his ecclesiastical and courtly connections, defended it with might and main. For this reason, the great anti-Puritan has had, and always will have, warm admirers among Puritans and Nonconformists.

South's Sermons have been often reprinted; e.g., Oxford (1823, 7 vols.), Boston (1867, 71, 5 vols.), London (1878, 2 vols.); and in these editions memoirs will be found. A volume of selections, with a memoir entitled The Wisdom of the Fathers, appeared in London, 1867. W. G. T. SIMPES.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, poet and martyr, was b. at Horsham, St. Faith's, Norfolk, about 1662; and hanged at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. He was educated at Paris, Douay, Tournay, and Rome; received into the Society of Jesus, Oct. 17, 1578, when not yet seventeen; ordained, 1584, and made prefect of the English college at Rome; sent as a missionary to England, 1586; chaplain to the Countess of Arundel; betrayed to the government, 1592, imprisoned for three years in the Tower, found guilty of "constructive treason," and executed. According to Cecil, he, though "thirteen times most cruelly tortured, cannot be induced to confess any thing, not even the color of the horse whereon, on a certain day, he rode, lest" thereby his friends might fall into the same trouble. His poems were published shortly after his death, and a complete edition appeared 1856, edited by W. B. Turnbull. Some of them, since then widely copied, are of a very high order, and no less philosophic than Christian. F. M. BIRD.

SOZOMENOS, Salamanes Hermias, a contemporary of Socrates; lived, like him, as a scholasticus in Constantinople, and wrote, like him, a history of the church from 323 to 439, edited by Valesius (1659), together with the histories of Eusebius and Socrates, and found in Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque. He seems to have known and used the work by Socrates. What he adds of his own, concerning hermits and monks, is of no great interest. But his style is better than Socrates'.

SPAIN. Christianity penetrated into Spain from North Africa. It is uncertain whether St. Paul carried out his intention to visit Spain. The first Christians were found in Andalusia. The story of the martyrdom of the apostle James at Compostella dates from the ninth century. Towards the end of the fourth century the whole country was Christianized, and divided into ecclesiastical provinces. The Council of Elvira (306) was attended by nineteen bishops and twenty-six presbyters, under the lead of Ilosius. The councils and synods were presided over by the oldest bishop, afterwards by the metropolitan, of the province. Communications with Rome began during the Priscillianist controversy, and became more frequent and intimate after the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, in 456. The Goths were Arians, and the Orthodox Church naturally sought for support from without. Nevertheless, when the Goths adopted the Catholic faith, at the Third Council of Toledo (589), the Spanish Church at once assumed a proud and reserved attitude with respect to Rome. The pallium was not asked for in Rome; and, when Gregory the Great sent it to Leander, the reason was simply that the latter was an intimate friend of his.

Towards the end of the seventh century Spain numbered sixty-six bishops. They were originally elected by the congregations, but afterwards appointed by the king on the presentation of the churches of the diocese, and finally by the king alone with the concurrence of the Archbishop of Toledo. They could be deposed only by a council, just as a minister could be deposed only by a synod. The oldest monasteries date from the sixth century. They had rules of their own, and multiplied rapidly after the victory of the Catholic Church. They stood at first under the absolute control of the bishops; but, on account of the frequent complaints, the episcopal authority was afterwards limited. The clergy were subject to the secular jurisdiction in all cases but the ecclesiastical ones, which were decided in the bishop's court. The general standard of the Spanish clergy seems to have been rather low; though several brilliant names occur, such as Orosius, Leander and Isidore of Hispalis, Ildefons, and Julian of Toledo, and others.

During the rule of the Visigoth kings (456-711) the Jews were kept under strict ecclesiastical supervision, on account of their dangerous connections with their co-religionists in Africa; but, under the Arabian dominion (711-1492), all spiritual and political pressure was removed, and they prospered very much. They produced men of consequence in almost every department of life; and by their wealth and commercial talent they exercised great influence, even in the Christian states of the country, though they generally excited the hatred of the people by their avarice. As soon, however, as the Christians gained the ascendancy, persecutions were instituted; and in 1492, the year of the conquest of Granada, all Jews were expelled from Spain. Many were converted to Christianity, and remained in the country; but their conversion was generally nothing but a mask; and, whenever the Inquisition detected the fraud, it was cruelly punished.

Under Arabian rule (711-1492) the Christians were allowed to retain their faith; though very heavy taxes were levied on them,—one-tenth of their revenue on those who submitted without resistance, and one-fifth on those who were subjugated by armed force. They were commanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, nor to marry a Mohammedan woman, nor to try to convert a Moslem to Christianity, nor to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc. They were requested not to wear the same dress as the Mohammedans, nor to build their houses higher than the Moslem, nor to let their bells be heard, nor their cross be seen, in the street, nor to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabic, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1086. Between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries, monasticism spread widely in the country. The Franciscans, who came to Spain in 1206, had a hundred and twenty-one monasteries there in 1400, and a hundred and ninety in 1506.

The revival of letters in Italy in the fifteenth century was soon transplanted to Spain; and there, as everywhere, it effectively prepared the way for the Reformation. The Protestant doctrines found from the very first many adherents among the Spaniards, especially among the higher classes; and several Spanish translations of the Bible were published,—by Francisco Enzinas (Dryander) in 1513, Juan Perez in 1536, Cassiodoro de Reyna in 1569, and Cypriano de Valera in 1596. King Philip II., however, and Pope Paul IV., supported by the Inquisition and the Jesuits, finally succeeded in completely suppressing the movement. But the means they employed are among the greatest horrors history ever heard of. The first auto-da-fé took place at Valladolid, May 21, 1559; when Charles II. celebrated his marriage with Louise of Orleans in 1579, an auto-da-fé formed part of the solemnities, and for fourteen hours the young couple sat looking at the burning of twenty-three heretics. During the latter part of the eighteenth and the first part of the nineteenth century, various moves were made in a more liberal direction. In 1780 the Inquisition performed the last auto-da-fé, and its office was reduced to the mere censorship of books. In 1805 the Jesuits were expelled, and all monasteries numbering less than twelve monks were closed. But with the concordat of 1801 a heavy reaction set in. The Virgin was appointed generalissima of the Spanish army in 1801; and in 1801 a number of persons engaged in the Protestant propaganda, which had its seat in Gibraltar, were seized, and condemned to the galleys. It proved impossible, however, for Queen Isabella to carry out the concordat: it finally cost her the throne. [The new constitution of 1807 grants toleration, and makes all civil and political rights independent of denomination. The number of Protestants is hardly 60,000, of a population of nearly 17,000,000.] KLOSE.

SPALATIN, Georg, b. at Spalt in the diocese of Eichstätt, 1181; d. at Altenburg Jan. 16, 1515. He studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; was ordained a priest in 1507, and appointed librarian, secretary, and chaplain to the Elector Frederick the Wise in 1512, and superintendent of Altenburg in 1525. As he was an intimate friend of Luther and the other Reformers, and enjoyed the full confidence of Frederick the Wise and his successors, he exercised a very great influence on the course of the Reformation. See his life by CHR. SCHLEGEL, Jena, 1693 (Latin), and by J. WAGNER, Altenburg, 1830 (German). SEEBOCKER.

SPALDING, Johann Joachim, b. at Tribsees in Pomerania, Nov. 1, 1714; d. in Berlin, May 26, 1801. He studied theology at Rostock and Halle, and was appointed pastor of Lassahn in 1749, of Barth in 1757, and of the Church of St. Nicholas in Berlin in 1761, from which last office he retired in 1788, after the promulgation of the Wolner edict. He early abandoned the old-fashioned, scholastically developed Lutheran orthodoxy of his time, and occupied a position between the rationalism of the Wolfian philosophy and the sentimentalism of the pietists, from which standpoint he fought with vigor and success against the deism and atheism, which, from France and England, penetrated into Germany. His principal works are Über die Bestimmung des Menschen (1718), Über den Werth der Gefühle im Christenthum (1761), Über die Nutzbarkeit des Predigamts (1773), Vertrauten Briefe, die Religion betreffend (1781), etc., most of which were several times reprinted, and translated into French. He also left an interesting autobiography, published by his son, Berlin, 1801. HAGENBACH.

SPANGENBERG, Augustus Cottlieb, b. July 15, 1701, at Klettenberg, Prussia; d. Sept. 18, 1792, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, at Berthelsdorf, Saxony; was a bishop of the Moravian Church, and next to Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), its most illustrious leader. He attended the grammar-school at Hefeld, and the university of Jena, where an exegetical lecture of Budeus, at which he happened to be present, induced him to give up the study of law, and devote himself to theology. He graduated in 1726 as master of arts, and soon after began to lecture in the university, and occasionally to preach. The free schools in the suburbs of Jena, established by a circle of pious students to which he belonged, enlisted his ardent support; and he was particularly active in training teachers for this work. In 1727 he met Zinzendorf, who made a deep impression upon him. Their acquaintance soon ripened into a warm friendship; and, on the occasion of a visit to Herrnhut (1730), Spangenberg formed a very close fellowship with the Brethren. His labors at Jena continued to be crowned with great success. After having declined various advantageous offers, he was induced, in 1732, to accept the position of adjunct of the theological faculty of the university of Halle, and superintendent of the schools connected with Francke's Orphan-Home. But it soon became evident that he was not in sympathy with his colleagues. They took offence at some of his doctrinal views, at his association with separatists, and especially at the intimate connection which he persisted in keeping up with the Brethren. Complaints were lodged against him, and in 1733 he was dismissed from the university by a royal mandate. He immediately went to Herrnhut, and entered the service of the Moravian Church, laboring in various parts of Germany, in America, in the West Indies, and in England, where he organized (1744) the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; which association still exists. His work in America was particularly distinguished. After having been consecrated a bishop in 1741, he stood at the head of the Moravian Church in this country, with occasional interruptions, until 1762. He showed himself to be a wise ruler, a faithful pastor, an ardent evangelist. So prudent was the forethought with which he cared for his brethren, both in temporal and spiritual things, that they gave him the name of "Joseph," which he adopted, often signing official documents in this way. Nor was his work confined to his own church. The settlers in various Colonies, and especially the Indians, learned to know and revere him as a faithful messenger of the gospel. In 1762 he returned to Europe, took an active part in framing the new constitution of the Brethren's Church, and became the most prominent member of its governing board. The enthusiasm of Zinzendorf, which sometimes led him beyond bounds, was supplemented by the prudence and wisdom of Spangenberg. Among his numerous writings the most important are Idea Fidei Fratrum, oder Kurzer Begriff der christl. Lehre in den evangel. Brudergemeinen, Barby, 1782, translated into English by La Trole, and entitled Exposition of Christian Doctrine, London, 1784; and Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf, 1775, in 3 vols., abridged English translation by Jackson, London, 1838. Spangenberg composed many hymns, some of which are known and used wherever the German tongue is spoken; for instance, Die Kirche Christi die Er geweiht (Eng. trans., Moravian Hymnal, No. 612, "The Church of Christ, that he hath hallowed here"), and Heilige Einfalt, Gnadenwunder (Eng. trans., abridged, Moravian Hymnal, No. 432, "When simplicity we cherish"). The two most important biographies of him are, Leben Spangenbergs, von JEREMIAS RISLER, Barby, 1794, French trans., Neuchâtel, 1835, and LEDDERHOSE'S Leben Spangenbergs, Heidelberg, 1846, Eng. trans., London, 1855.

BISHOP E. DE SCHWEINITZ.

SPANGENBERG, Cyriacus, b. at Nordhausen, June 7, 1528; d. at Strassburg, Feb. 10, 1604. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was in 1553 appointed court-preacher to the Count of Mansfeld. As a passionate adherent of Flacius, he became implicated in the controversy concerning hereditary sin, and was in 1575 compelled to flee from Mansfeld, disguised as a midwife. Appointed pastor of Schlitzsee-on-the-Fulda shortly after, his stubborn advocacy of the Flacian views once more disturbed the peace of the congregation, and again drove him into exile, in 1590. He found refuge at Vacla in Hesse, but only for a time, finally returning to Strassburg. His writings are devotional, polemical, and historical. See his life by J. G. LEUCKFELD, Quedlinburg, 1712.

G. H. KLIPPEL.

SPANHEIM is the name of a family which has produced several noticeable theologians. — Friedrich Spanheim, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris and England, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Geneva, and in 1641 at Leyden. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote in the controversy with Anyraut, Disputatio de gratia universali, 1644; Exercitationes de gratia universali, 1646; Epistola ad Matthæum Cottarium, 1648; Unde exercitacionum, 1649. — Friedrich Spanheim, son of the preceding; b. at Geneva, May 1, 1632; d. at Leyden, May 18, 1701. He studied theology and philosophy at Leyden, and was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg in 1655 and at Leyden in 1670. He wrote in defence of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius. His collected works appeared at Leyden, 1701-03, 3 vols.

SPARROW, William, an eminent theologian of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, United States; descended from a highly respectable Irish family; b. in Massachusetts, March 12, 1801. His parents returning to Ireland in 1805, he attended boarding-school in the Vale of Avoca. Returned to America, 1817. In his seventeenth year was appointed principal of Utica Academy; student at Columbia College, New York, 1819-21; professor of Latin and Greek at Miami University, 1824-25; ordained in 1826; collaborer with Bishop Chase in founding Kenyon College; eleven years Milnor professor at Gambier; professor of systematic divinity and Christian evidences in the Theological Seminary of Virginia, 1840-74; for thirty years delegate to General Convention from Virginia, and chairman of standing committee. Died at Alexandria, Va., Jan. 17, 1874.

During the civil war (1861-64) he carried on the work of the seminary in the interior of Virginia. At its close his unique relations to both sections enabled him to exert important influence in restoring the church in Virginia to its former ecclesiastical relations. As he had by the fame of his powers raised the Virginia seminary to an important position, so now his hand was chiefly concerned in its restoration.

Dr. Sparrow was recognized as the ablest theologian and the most original thinker of the evangelical school in the Protestant-Episcopal Church. His acute and powerful intellect, enriched by accurate learning, and strengthened by patient thought, moved with freedom among the profoundest questions of metaphysics and of theology. He bowed with unquestioning faith to the supremacy of Scripture, yet he welcomed modern criticism as an ally; and all his thinking proceeded on the conviction of the ultimate harmony of revelation and science. An earnest evangelical and a zealous Protestant, he was usually classed as Arminian in theology; yet he abhorred the narrowness of theological systems, and led his pupils up into the pure atmosphere of independent thought and rational inquiry. By the hundreds of young men who sat at his feet at Gambier and at Alexandria he was looked up to as a great teacher; and many of the best minds in the church have acknowledged their indebtedness to his suggestive and stimulating instruction. He was an earnest Episcopalian, but he put doctrine before order; hence he felt himself at one with Protestant Christendom, and rejoiced in the Evangelical Alliance as an expression of Protestant unity. He earnestly maintained the scriptural character of the Prayer-Book, but desired a revision, to remove ambiguities, and to relieve weak consciences. Accordingly, though he sympathized with the difficulties of Bishop Cummins, he deprecated his secession, and remained firm in his adhesion to the church. Perhaps no man of his time in America did more to check the spread of the tractarian theology.

He was also an earnest antagonist of the dogma of a tactual apostolical succession, holding it to be essentially unscriptural and anti-Protestant. To his great intellectual powers he added the influence of exalted piety, a character of great modesty and humility, and a life of simplicity and self-denial. He sealed his deep interest in Christian missions by the cheerful surrender to the Chinese mission of a daughter of remarkable talents. His lifelong feebleness of health, combined with an almost morbid aversion to appearing in print, unhappily prevented his entering the field of authorship; but a number of his occasional sermons and addresses saw the light, and a posthumous volume of Sermons appeared in 1876, New York (T. Whittaker).

The spirit of his teaching and of his life is well summed up in words of his own, graven on his tomb: "SEEK THE TRUTH, COME WHENCE IT MAY, COST WHAT IT WILL." See his Life and Correspondence, by Rev. C. WALKER, D.D., New York, 1876.

RANDOLPH H. McKIM.

SPEE, Friedrich von, b. at Kaiserswerth in 1591; d. at Treves, Aug. 7, 1635. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1610; taught grammar, philosophy, and morals in the Jesuit college in Cologne; was for several years engaged in the persecution of witches, and led more than two hundred of them to the stake; and worked during the last years of his life as a missionary among the Protestants of Northern Germany. He published a book, Cautio criminalis, against the common method of trying witches, but is chiefly known as a religious poet, — Trutz-Nachtigall, Cologne, 1619 edited by Godecke and Tittmann, 1879, and Gülden-Tagebuch, probably published in the same year (last ed., Coblenz, 1850). Selections from those two collections of poems have been made by W. Smets and Karl Forster. See DIEL: Spec. Essquisse biographique et littéraire, 1873. PALMER.

SPENCER, John, D.D., Church of England; b. at Borton-under-Blean, Kent, 1630; d. at Cambridge, May 27, 1695. He was graduated M.A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 1652, and elected fellow 1655. Ten years later he became D.D.; on Aug. 3, 1667, master of his college, and in the same year archdeacon of Sudbury. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Ely, and dean of Ely 1677. His fame rests upon his De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus et curia rationibus, Cambridge, 1685, 2 vols. fol.; reprinted, The Hague (1686), Leipzig (1705), Cambridge (1727), edited by L. Chappelow; reprinted, Tübingen, 1732, ed. C. M. Pfaff. In the two editions last-mentioned the fourth book, left in manuscript by the author, for the first time appears. The object of this very learned book is to show that Jewish law and ritual are in origin independent of those of surrounding nations, and expressly designed to fix a gulf between the Jews and their neighbors. Yet Spenser has been accused by Witsius, in his Egyptiacæ, and by Archbishop Magee, in his Atonement, of maintaining the hypothesis of the Egyptian origin of the Jewish ritual. Besides this famous work, Spenser wrote 1. discourse concerning prodigies, London, 1663, 2d ed. with Discourse concerning vulgar prodigies, 1665; Dissertatio de Crim et Theumina, Cambridge, 1669 (a comprehensive work upon several obscure Bible matters, e.g., Hebrew illustrations and purifications, circumcision, music, dancing, and burials).

SPENER, Philipp Jakob. Among the theologians of the Lutheran Church of the seventeenth century, Spener was the purest and most spotless in character, and the most successful in his work. He was born Jan. 13, 1635, in Rappoltswiler, in Upper Alsace, and d. at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. But as both father and mother came from Strassburg, and he himself was chiefly educated in that city, Spener usually called himself a Strassburger. With justice he is counted among those who retained their baptismal grace, and in it harmoniously continued to develop their Christian life. This natural piety was nourished by congenial family associations, by his relations to the noble widow of the Count of Rappoltstein, and by his study of the ascetic productions of Anselm, as also of Sonthom, Bayly, Dykes, Baxter, and other English writers at that time much read along the Rhine. His principal instructor, and the spiritual forerunner of the Spener period, was the court-preacher at Rappoltstein, Joachim Stoll, who in 1615 became his brother-in-law. "I owe to him among men the first sparks of Christianity," says Spener. On Stoll, cf. Rohrich: Mittheilungen aus der evang. Kirche des Elsasses, 1855, iii. p. 321.

After being thus privately prepared, the pious youth in 1651 entered the university of Strassburg. According to his own statements, he lived a very retired life, devoting himself entirely to his books. His theological leaders were Dorsche, Dammhauer, Johann Schmid, Sebastian Schmid. The first-named, a strict Lutheran theologian, Spener called his "preceptor;" the last-named was the most famous exegete of his day; and in Johann Schmid Spener saw his "father in Christ." In accordance with the custom of the day, a perigrinatio academica completed his course of studies. He first went to Basel to sit at the feet of the younger Buxtorf, at that time the most celebrated teacher of Hebrew. Then he spent a year in Geneva, which long stay tended to widen the mental horizon of the young Lutheran theologian; and he found much to praise in the organization of the Reformed Church as there represented. Lathaldie's fiery eloquence so influenced him, that he translated his Manuel de prière into German.

In 1661, in company with his pupil, the young Count of Rappoltstein, he paid a visit to Württemberg, and remained there five months. His qualities of mind and heart gained him many friendships in Stuttgart and Tübingen; and his permanent employment in Württemberg was only frustrated by a call to become pastor in Strassburg in 1663. He secured a situation which gave him leisure as a magister to deliver various courses of lectures at the university on history and philosophy.

In 1666 he received a call to become pastor and senior in Frankfurt-am-Main; and, after consultation with his political and ecclesiastical superiors, he accepted this vocation, so honorable for a man but thirty-one years of age. He endeavored to awaken a consistent and live Christianity in the Frankfurt churches, but was prevented to a great extent by the senate and city government. (Cf. Bedanken, iii. pp. 105, 215, iv. 66.) He first attempted to revive a thorough system of catechetical instructions, which had sadly fallen into decay. Mechanical memorizing was the first object of his attack; and, to effect his reformation in this regard, he published his Eingetragte Erklärung der christl. Lehre, 1677, and his Tabula catechetica, in 108 tablets, in 1683. In his sermons his chief object was to inculcate purity of doctrine; but he no longer considered himself bound to confine himself to the pericopes, his endeavors being to make his congregation acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures. Then he brought about a more thorough preparation for the first reception of the Lord's Supper in connection with confirmation. He was successful, however, only in the country congregations. (Cf. Bedanken, iii. 395.) For a reformation of church discipline he could do little or nothing. His sermons, always mild, exerted a vast power. Although chiefly of a didactic character, yet they were marked by experience, and a deep knowledge of Scriptures; and his influence began to extend far beyond the boundaries of Frankfurt. Even his polemics against mechanical Christianity were not aggressive or challenging. Yet in 1669 a sermon on the false righteousness of the Pharisees caused a division between the earnest and the careless members of his flock, and in 1670 the former effected a closer union among themselves. The result was an organization, at first only of a few, for practical religious purposes. It met at first in Spener's study, and read different ascetic works, considered the last sermon, and the like. Soon assemblages were held in other houses also. In 1682 Spener succeeded in receiving permission to hold these meetings in the church, which somewhat changed their character.

Spener's days in Frankfurt were pleasant. He says, "In the honorable ministerium of Frankfurt, during the twenty years I was its senior, the God of peace kept us in brotherly harmony." His own character and nature contributed most to bring about this state of affairs. He continued to abide by his strict theological views, and thus did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. In them he laments the corruption of the Evangelical Church, and recommends six different remedies. His Desideria were an earnest word to his church, and found an echo in many hearts in Germany. Only in Strassburg did they meet with a cool reception. More injurious to Spener's reputation were his collegia pietatis. Such private associations for religious purposes had before this already found favor, even with the heads of orthodoxy; but after their multiplication they also developed peculiarities looking toward a separation from the church, and thus "Pietists" gradually was regarded as the name of a sect. Among others, Spener's former friend, Mentzer, the court-preacher in Darmstadt, now also became his enemy. Dölfler, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosophia Horbii-Spenneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answers in his Gottsgelahrtheit, etc., and this controversy ended. Spener himself strongly opposed the separatist tendency among his followers, especially in his Die Klagen über das verlorne Christenthum, Missbrauch und rechter Gebrauch, 1684.

Spener had thus labored with great success in Frankfurt for twenty years, when in 1686 a call to become court-preacher, and member of the consistory at Dresden, usually regarded at that time as the highest ecclesiastical position in Germany, was extended to him. This was done at the special request of the elector, George III., who had seen and heard Spener in Frankfurt, and learned his upright character through personal experience. The latter modestly put a low estimate on his Frankfurt work, and had no great plans for his labors at the Saxon court. His departure from Frankfurt on the 10th of July, 1686, was a day of sorrow for the whole city.

The new position indeed offered the possibility of greater influence and power than he exerted in Frankfurt, but this was measured by the personal influence over the elector. To gain this over the warlike George III. was not an easy task, as Spener soon discovered (Bedenken, ii. 702). The first opposition to Spener came from Leipzig. The theologians at this university — such as Olearius, Carpzov, and Alberti — were indeed no longer representatives of the iron-clad orthodoxy in vogue at the beginning of the century, and even were anxious for practical piety; but many reasons aroused them against Spener. He was a stranger, and had obtained a situation which was the object of high ambition; and he had induced the consistory to censure the theological faculty for neglecting exegetical studies. When, then, the collegium philobiblicum, commenced in Leipzig for the purpose of studying the Scriptures in the original tongues, through Francke, Anton, Schade, and others, developed into German collegia biblica, in which laymen also took part, and which entered into closer relationship with Spener, Carpzov began to preach against the "Pietists." He was seconded by Alberti, formerly Spener's good friend; and when, in 1688, Spener's relative, Thomasius, published satires on the clergy, — and especially on Carpzov, Alberti, and Pfeifer, — Spener was accused of being responsible for these.

In Dresden itself, Spener's zeal and conscientious firmness as confessor of the wild elector caused him trouble, and finally brought about his removal to Berlin. He attempted to re-introduce catechetical instructions extensively, instructed the children himself, and for this reaped ridicule and abuse. The elector soon lost his interest in his court-preacher, seldom listened to his sermons, and avoided confession. When Spener, in his concern for his prince's spiritual welfare, wrote a letter to him, the displeasure of the sovereign fell upon him. The prince declared that "he could not longer endure the sight of Spener, and would have to change his residence on his account." The sudden death of George soon after opened the way for Spener's acceptance of a call to Berlin to become a member of the consistory of Brandenburg, and probst of St. Nicolai. When the displeasure of the elector first became known, the opposition to Spener began to assume large proportions, especially under the leadership of the Leipzig Carpzov, who assisted Roth, pastor in Halle, in editing his abusive pamphlet Imago pietismi. Spener's position in Berlin was in some respects more pleasant than that in Dresden. The Elector Frederick III. indeed showed no interest in his work; and his wife, Sophia Charlotte of Hanover, was an acknowledged sceptic, and hostile to him; but Spener's congregation was larger; and among the councillors of the throne he found at least one sympathetic person, Herr von Schweinitz. — vir pietate nulli secundus, as Spener says. Schade, his Leipzig friend, also soon came to Berlin; and in him he found a congenial soul. Here again, as in Frankfurt and Dresden, Spener immediately began his work with catechetical instructions, and the establishment of a collegium philobiblicum. He sought also to secure appointments for earnest pastors; and, chiefly through his influence, Breithaupt, Francke, and Anton, the later leaders of the pietistic movement, were made members of the theological faculty at Halle. In all church troubles, not only at Berlin, but also elsewhere, his voice was ever in favor of peace. His colleague Schade, through his inability to distinguish between use and abuse, had in blind zeal condemned private confessions in toto, and it was with great difficulty that Spener could allay the storm. Later he complains that his greatest sorrows had been caused, not by his enemies, but by his inconsiderate friends. And from abroad now come the accusations that Spener was the source of the many fanatical sects springing up everywhere. The war made upon him, in contrast with the thorough theological discussions of previous decades, was entirely of a personal and rancorous character: no means were too low for the purpose. The masterpiece among these libels is the Christliche rösche Vorstellung . . . etc., published by the entire Wittenberg faculty in 1695. No less than two hundred and eighty-three heterodox views are here catalogued against Spener. This document, the production of the mentally weak senior of the faculty, Deitschmann, proved harmless fabrication; which fact Spener attributes to the influence of a kind Providence. This and the many other polemical writings, Spener answered in a becoming spirit. His principal work in this department is his Aufrichtige Übereinstimmung mit der Augsburgerischen Confession, directed against the Wittenberg faculty. These answers show learning, research, and a deep piety.

In an indirect way he was drawn into another controversy of the church. The movement inaugurated by Calixtus had assumed a Romeward tendency; and several prominent teachers in Königsberg, and others, were strongly inclining in that direction. The elector authorized Spener, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelical Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he did in a thorough manner in his Der evangel. Kirche Rettung vor falschen Beschuldigungen, 1695; which work produced a marked effect. Two years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August of Saxony, join the Roman Church.

Spener did not live to see the victory in Berlin of the movement he represented. This took place when the king of Prussia in 1708 took as his third wife Sophia Louisa von Mecklenburg. Under the leadership of the court-preacher, Porst, prayer-meetings were held even in the royal castle, in which the king at times would participate. Just after having finished his work on dogmatics, entitled Von der ewigen Gottheit Christi, the noble teacher, who had been the guide for so many into righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, Feb. 5, 1705. His death-bed scene and end are described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blankenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor.

Spener's wife, a lady from Strassburg, was one with him in mind and soul. Of his eleven children, eight survived him; but not all of these caused him joy.

In theological culture Spener was equal to any of his contemporaries. His serious and polemical works show that he was a thorough exegete. In systematic theology he rivalled the best of his day, but did not depart from the formalistic and logical method of treating the dogmas so common at that time. Of the defects in his style and rhetoric, he himself was conscious. It was his principle to submit to the confessions of the church. Calovius himself acknowledged that he had found nothing heterodox in Spener; and, in fact, such is the case: he is in perfect harmony with the great Lutheran theologians, Gerhard, Meisner, Meyfart, V. Andrea, etc., whom he constantly cites. Only the abuses in the church, such as confidence in the opus operatum, the misuse of the confessional, the one-sided doctrine of faith and justification by faith, did he attack. He came to the conviction that purity of doctrine and pureness of life did not always go together, although he did not deny that departure from the truth would bring with it a departure from a proper Christian life. He saw in the Reformed Church errors, "in theory rather than in practice" (Beobachten, iv. 196), and hence was charitable in his judgment of it. Further, it was Spener's endeavor to bring the so-called third estate, the laity, into active co-operation in the service and government of the church. This was, indeed, the theory of the Reformation, but had not been practised. Personally, Spener cannot but excite admiration. Mildness, humility, and love may be regarded as the chief features of his character; but with these he joined manliness and courage. Even over against his bitterest enemies he preserves his dignity and equanimity. He himself declares that "the attacks of his opponents had never caused him even a single sleepless night." Spener cannot be called the father of pietism as it was developed later at Halle and elsewhere. Cf. THOLUCK's Lebenszeugen der luth. Kirche und Akademisches Leben, etc., vol. ii. He was indeed the most influential centre of this movement, but chiefly through his marked personality and moderation of his theological stand-point. In literature he was very active. Canstein's list of his works embraces seven volumes folio, sixty-three in quarto, seven in octavo, and forty-six in duodecimo.

SPENGLER, Lazarus, b. at Nuremberg, March 13, 1179; d. there Sept. 7, 1531. He studied philosophy and jurisprudence at Leipzig, and held throughout life various important positions in the civil service of his native city. He joined Luther immediately on his appearance as a Reformer, was present at the Diet of Worms, stood in intimate relation with all the Reformers, and was very active for the consolidation and establishment of the Reformation. His life was written by Haussdorff, Nuremberg, 1741, and Preßl, Ellerbeld, 1862. SEE PAGE KEE.

SPENSER, Edmund, b. at East Smithfield, probably in 1553; d. at Westminster, Jan. 16, 1599. Has a place in sacred literature by his Poetic License (1590-96), wherein religion, though subordinated to poetry, is by no means absent, and more definitely by his Hymnes of Heavenly Love and Beauty (1596), in which may be found the germ of Paradise Lost, including the epitome of Milton's "great argument." He graduated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1573; issued The Shepherds' Calendar, 1579; was intimate with Sidney and Raleigh; held offices, and received an estate in Ireland; was expelled and ruined by the insurgents in Tyrone's rebellion, 1598, and ended his life miserably in London. His works, whether read or not, continue to be printed and praised; and his rank among the poets of that great age is next to Shakespeare. F. M. BIRD.

SPERATUS, Paulus, an active Reformer and much esteemed hymn-writer; b. at Rottweil, Franconia (whence the surname a Rubilis), Dec. 13, 1484; d. at Marienwerder, Aug. 12, 1551. He studied theology in Paris and Italy, but embraced the Reformation, and preached its ideas at Dinkelsbühl, Würzburg, Salzburg, and Vienna, whence he was compelled to flee, in 1521, on account of a sermon against the monastic vows; Von dem hohen Gelübde der Tauff, Königsberg, 1524. Appointed preacher at Iglau, he became middle-man between Luther and the Moravian Brethren, and made so deep an impression on the inhabitants, that he was arrested by Bishop Thurzo of Olmütz, and accused of heresy. Released at the instance of Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, he went to Wittenberg, where he aided Luther in his collection of German hymns, and was in 1525 made court-preacher to Duke Albrecht of Prussia. To this period belong most of his own hymns, original and translated; and in 1529 he was made bishop of Pomerania, in which position he was very zealous for the consolidation of the Protestant Church in Prussia. His life has been written by COSACK (1861), [PRESSER (1862), and TRAUTENBERGER (1868)]. D. ERDMANN.

SPICE AMONG THE HEBREWS. By spice, especially aromatics are meant, which the Israelites used in common life. The common word for these aromatics is besanaim; another term seems to be neshek (1 Kings x. 25). The terms rokach, rikuchim, mirkachah, mirkachath, signify more especially salves prepared from aromatics; whilst mirkach seems to be the general term for aromatic plants. In the gardens of kings and nobles, such exotic plants were often raised Cant. i. 12, iv. 13 sq., v. 13; but the gums, wood, etc., for the preparation of incense and salves, were mostly imported to Palestine and Egypt from the south of Arabia, Sabia, and India, and negotiated by the Phoenicians (Ezek. xxvii. 22) and Ishmaelites (Gen. xxxvii. 25). Some of the species belonging here have already been treated, as BALM (q.v.), RHELLIUM (q.v.), FRANKINCENSE (q.v.), GALBANUM (q.v.), MYRRH (q.v.). We must not omit the labdanum and speakearl. As to the former, which is mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 25 and xliii. 11 (Authorized Version, "myrrh") it is the name of a bitter, aromatic, slimy, and sticky resin, flowing from the juice of cistus, of which there are several species. It was gathered from the beards of goats, where it is found sticking. The ancient versions, knowing the meaning of the Hebrew word no more, rendered it "stacte," — pistachionut, or chestnuts. As to speakearl, the far-famed perfume of the East, there were several kinds, one a very precious, the other less valuable. The former was gathered from a plant growing in North and East India, South Arabia, and Gedrosia, and belonging to the family valeriana. It still grows at the foot of the Himalayan Mountains. The Phoenicians imported this perfume to the West, and thus it came also to Palestine. Less precious than the Indian was the Syrian (especially well prepared at Tarsus, which was composed of oils, most of which also belonged to aromatic plants of the valeriana family. It was sold in small alabaster boxes (Mark xiv. 3), and was carried in smelling-bottles. It was used not only as salve, but also for seasoning the wine. With such precious nard, Mary of Bethany anointed the Saviour six days before the passover (John xii. 1). This oil was also used for the purpose of preserving the dead. The name "nard" is of Sanscrit origin, and points to the home of the plant: it denotes "giving an odor." Besides these different species, the Bible also mentions the following spices. Alors (Num. xxiv. 6; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Ps. xlv. 8; John xix. 39), a fragrant wood (hence alao-wood) growing in India, where it is called agail. The Europeans call it lignum aquila [i.e., eagle-wood]. The wood is resinous, of a dark color, heavy. The Indians regard the alao-trees as holy. Another aromatic wood is the algum, from Ophir (1 Kings x. 11 sq.; 2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10); also almug, not "pearls," as the rabbis explain, but probably sandal-wood. Besides the wood we must also mention the bark of different trees growing in India, and which the Hebrews at a very early period counted among the spices; thus especially the cinnamon (Exod. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed for the preparation of the holy anointing oil). It also occurs Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Rev. xviii. 13. The home of the cinnamon is Ceylon. According to Nees von Esenbeck (Disp. de cinnamon, Bonn, 1823), the cassia was not a distinct species, but only a wild or original form of the Cinnamomum Ceylonicum. There are two Hebrew words rendered "cassia," — kiddah and ketsah, — which were among the ingredients of the holy incense, according to the rabbis. To these ingredients the Talmud adds also the koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the calamus (kaneh bosen, also kaneh ha-toh, Exod. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xliii. 24) and karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the resinous and balsmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekoth (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), some kind of gum; the libach, or poplar (Gen. xxx. 37), by some regarded as the storax-tree; the mastic (Susan. v. 54), a tree growing in Greece, Asia Minor, and Palestine, — the Pistacia lentiscus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the cypress-branch (kopher, A.V., camphire, but in the margin eypress, Cant. i. 14, iv. 13), carried by the Mohammedan women in the bosom. The powdered leaves, which are mixed with the juice of citrons, are used to stain therewith the hair and nails. The sirpad, in Isa. lv. 13, translated "brier," is, according to some (Eichhorn, Ewald), the white mustard. Finally, we mention the gourd (kikayon, Jon. iv. 6-10), whose growth was miraculous: it is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant. In the Talmud the kik-oil is mentioned, prepared from the seed of the ricinus.

SPIERA, Francesco, the unfortunate man, who, for worldly considerations, denied his Protestant profession, and in consequence died in a condition of maddened despair and remorse; was b. at Citadella, near Padua, Italy, about 1498; d. there December, 1518. A lawyer and public official in his native city, greatly honored, rich, and ardently devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he accepted the message of the Reformation; and experiencing peace, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, della Casa. He subscribed a penitential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, recanting the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera's death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all the consolations drawn from the consideration of the divine mercy. He held he belonged to the number of those who were lost, and lost eternally. "Oh, if I were only greater than God! for I know he will not have mercy upon me," he exclaimed. In his assurance that God had forsaken him, he had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Beelzebub; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble.

Criticising the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian experiences, he was never truly penitent for his sins. He professed to accept the doctrine of justification by faith, but did not accompany his profession by a forsaking of sin. Calvin and the other Reformers took a deep interest in the case; and Calvin, who wrote a preface (December, 1519) to the account of Henricus Scotus, regarded his sufferings and remorse as a terrible judgment of God, sent to awaken Italy. He regarded Spiera as one of those who deceive themselves with the belief that they are of the predestinate, when they are not. There have been other cases similar to that of Spiera, as Henry IV. of France. Other cases are mentioned in COPIERUS, Hist. des Eglises du Désert. Spiera is to be looked upon as one of the negative evidences for the truth of Protestantism. We have no instance of any perversity from the Roman-Catholic Church to Protestantism having a similar experience. There are several accounts of Spiera's life and death. Those of VENERIUS, GERHARDUS (professor of law at Padua), HENRICUS SCOTUS, and GILLOTUS (professor of philosophy at Padua), are contained in the work Francisci Spiera . . . historia, a quatuor summis civis summi juris compositione, cum clavis, errorum profundiorum, Calu. S. C. et Jo. Calendi, et Petri Pauli Vercellani, Apologia, accessit quoque Martini Borchii de . . . quem Spiera tam exemplum, tam doctrina affertur . . . judicium. SPIFAME, Jacques Paul, Sieur de Passy, b. in Paris, 1502; beheaded at Geneva, March 23, 1566. He studied law in his native city, and was in the course of a brilliant career as councillor to the Parliament, when he suddenly broke off, and entered the service of the Church. In this field, too, he made a brilliant career; became vicar-general to the Cardinal of Lorraine, whom he accompanied to the Council of Trent; and was in 1548 made bishop of Nevers. But in 1559 he resigned his see in favor of his nephew, and went to Geneva, where he embraced the Reformation. One of the reasons for this move was his relation to Catherine de Gasperne, a married woman whom he had seduced, and who lived with him after the death of her husband. At Geneva they were married; and Spifame was ordained a minister of the Reformed Church, and appointed pastor of Issoudun. In 1562 he went to Frankfurt as the ambassador of the Prince of Condé; and in 1564 he went to Pau as an agent of the Queen of Navarre, Jeanne d'Albret. But he made the queen his irreconcilable enemy by saying that her son, Henry IV., was not the son of Anton of Bourbon, but of Merlin; and on his return to Geneva he was arrested. During the investigation, some forgery with respect to his own marriage was proved against him; and he was sentenced to death, and beheaded. THEODOR SCOTT.

SPINA, Alphonso de, a Christian apologist or Jewish descent; lived in Spain in the fifteenth century; entered the Franciscan order after his conversion; was for some time rector of the school of Salamanca, and became finally bishop of Orense in Galicia. His celebrated work, Fuatalium fidei contra Judas, Saracenos, etc., was written in 1458, but not printed until 1811; especially the part against the Mohammedans is of great historical interest. H. MALLER.

SPINOLA, Cristoval Rojas de, a Roman-Catholic unionist; d. March 12, 1695; a native of Spain, and general of the Franciscan order in Madrid; came to Vienna as confessor to the wife of Leopold I., a Spanish princess, and was made bishop of Wienerisch-Neustadt in 1685. A peaceable union between the Protestant churches and the Church of Rome was the great idea of his life; and the religious indifference of the Protestant courts in Germany, the disgust of the higher classes at confessional controversies, the mild character of the school of Heinstadt, etc., made, for a time his exertions look successful. A conference took place in 1684. Spinola presented his Regula circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticum regimen, and the Heinstadt theologians, their Methodus reducienda unionis, etc. But, though the Emperor and the Pope were in favor of the scheme, serious Roman Catholics considered Spinola a fool, and serious Protestants were scandalized at Molanus. The negotiations, however, continued after the death of Spinoza. See LEIBNITZ and MOLANUS.

SPINOZA, Baruch de, b. at Amsterdam, Nov. 24, 1632; d. at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. His parents were Jews who had been driven from Portugal by religious persecution. His teacher in Hebrew was the celebrated rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira, who introduced him to the study of the Bible and the Talmud; besides, he studied Latin under the celebrated physician, Franz van der Ende. Differences between his views and the Jewish doctrine were soon noticed, and so he was expelled from the Jewish communion on account of "frightful heresies." He left Amsterdam, and lived in the vicinity from 1656 to 1660, then at Rhynsburg and Voorburg, near The Hague. Finally he settled at The Hague; residing there to the end of his life, and supporting himself by grinding lenses. In 1673 he refused to take a call as professor of philosophy to Heidelberg, saying that he might be hindered there in his liberty of philosophizing.

Clearness and calmness are the main features of his character. He was never seen laughing, nor very sad, but kind and gentle to all. Free from hypocrisy, a man of few wants, he was the image of a true sage.

His writings are, Renati Descartes Principiorum philosophiæ, pars i. et ii., etc. Amsterdam apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1663; Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburgi apud Henricum Kunrath, 1670; Baruch de Spinoza's Opera posthumæ, Amsterdam, apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1677, containing Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, etc., Tractatus politicus, Tractatus de intellectus emendatione, Epistolæ; Baruch de Spinoza tract. de Deo et homine ejusque felicitate (recently discovered); The unfinished Essays of Spinoza, ed. Hugo Ginsberg, Heidelberg, 1882. We shall only consider here the Ethics and the Tractatus theologico-politicus as the most important works for philosophy and theology.

Spinoza, the second great philosopher in the course of the purely rationalistic development of modern philosophy, stands in very close connection to his great predecessor, Descartes. The fundamental notion of Spinoza's system is the notion of substance, which is thus defined: "By substance I understand that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself; i.e., the conception of which does not need the conception of another thing in order to be formed. There is but one substance, which is identical with God. We cannot predicate any thing of it, as omnis determinatio est negatio, and the infinite cannot contain any negation, because it is the absolute affirmation of existence." All predicates used by Spinoza to define its nature are therefore but a circumscription of the first definition.

In order to comprehend something of the infinite substance, we must look to the second important notion in the system, — the notion of the attributes. Substance cannot be comprehended by its mere existence, but only by attributes, which are what reason perceives as constituting the essence of substance. The attributes, therefore, belong only to our mind, not to substance itself, which cannot admit any determination, i.e., negation. Our mind may therefore ascribe a number of attributes to substance. Spinoza, however, considers substance only under the attributes of thought and extension. The cause of these two attributes is not in God, but in the human mind, which finds both thought and extension in itself. The attributes are independent of each other, and must be comprehended per se, not by substance; as the notion of attributes is not dependent on the notion of substance, which excludes every determination. Res cogitans and res extensa are the same thing, i.e., considered from different stand-points; but it is indifferent to substance how it is considered.

The notion of substance, being but one, seems to imply that substance = every thing existing, i.e., the world. But how can the finite proceed from the infinite? This question is senseless according to Spinoza, because the finite, as the finite, does not exist; for all determination is non esse, and the finite is determination. The finite things have real being only as far as they are in God, in whom omnia sunt simul natura. This produces the third important notion, — the notion of the modes or affections. Modes are the accidents of substance, or that which is in something else, i.e., in God, by whom, also, they are conceived. For modes are nothing in themselves; they are like the waves of the ocean. There is nothing existing outside of God, and it would be absurd to say that God was composed of modes. It is false, therefore, to say of Spinoza that he taught God and the world were identical, because we can conceive of the world only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

There is a threefold mode of considering things. The first kind of cognition, which he calls opinio or imaginatio, is cognition through unregulated experience or signs, by which we connect certain ideas. The second kind of cognition, ratio, is cognition through the peculiarities of things, and notiones communes. The third kind of cognition is the intuitive knowledge of the mind, or true knowledge. Looking at the world through imagination, it appears to us as being composed of real things; and so we have the idea of a natura naturata, i.e., of a world. But it is the nature of our mind to know things as necessary or external; and substance considered in this way, i.e., the true way, produces the idea of a natura naturans.

There is no relation between both, not even the relation of causality. Spinoza, speaking, however, of causality, means an immanency of causality. God is therefore only the substance, or the substratum of objects.

As will is but a mode, it is self-evident that God cannot act with free will: everything follows from his necessity, i.e., his nature being his power. It is foolish to assume that God acts according to aims, for this means to subject him to something else. The basis of his being is the basis of his acting. The law of causality rules, however, in the natura naturata.

In like manner as substance is conceived under the modes of thought and extension, single objects must be conceived, because they are modes of thought and extension; for the world is either a material world, or a world of ideas. Being modes of the same substance, they must stand in accordance, so that the order and connection of ideas is identical with the order and connection of things. A thing is, however, caused only by a thing, and an idea by an idea; not a thing by an idea, or an idea by a thing. This is true of all single modes, which are things or ideas according to the way they are considered. All things are therefore animated, but they differ in the grade of animation. Body and soul are, according to this, identical, considered under different modes. It is self-evident that the mind cannot act upon the body, and the body cannot act upon the mind. But, as there is an idea of the human body, there is also an idea of the soul, or the idea of the idea.

The individual man is therefore nothing but a mode of the divine substance. The human mind may thus be called a part of the divine reason, and we can say that all intellects together form the infinite intellect. Man, being only a mode of substance, stands in an endless series of causes. If a will as a modification of the body is therefore also determined. Men think to be free because they are not conscious of the determining causes. Will is the faculty to affirm or deny; this is again determined by the idea of that which is to be affirmed or denied. Will and intellect are therefore identical. We are active when any thing happens of which we are the adequate cause; passive, however, if any thing happens of which we are not, or only partly, the cause. The mind is therefore active only when having adequate ideas; passive, when having inadequate ideas, or being under the influence of the imagination. The endeavor to become free from this, and to reach a state of perfection, is called will, or, speaking of the body, appetite. The transition of the mind to greater perfection is joy; the opposite is sadness. Joy accompanied by the idea of its external cause is love; sadness accompanied by its external cause is hate. All other passions are derived from these. The servitude of man consists in his inability to control his passions. The common conceptions of good and evil are wrong. These terms denote nothing positive which exists in themselves, but are conceptions and notions which result from our comparing of things. The evil, or sin, is nothing positive; for nothing happens against the will of God. It is therefore a negation which appears to be something only in our conception. There is no idea of the evil in God; for, if sin was something real, then God would certainly be its author. In order to get a precise notion of the terms "good" and "evil," he defines good to be that of which we know with certainty that it is useful to us, and evil, that of which we know with like certainty that it hinders us in the attainment of any good.

Virtue is nothing but the power to produce that which is according to one's nature. I do not sin against all laws, or approve crimes, because it is against my nature; and reason does not require any thing which is against nature. That is of real usefulness which brings man to a greater perfection. But as the true nature of reason is knowledge, then nothing is useful but that which serves knowledge. The highest good is the knowledge of God. Joy is something good; sadness, something bad; likewise all passions which involve sadness, like compassion, mockness, or repentance. A passion ceases to be a passion, i.e., a state of suffering, as soon as we have a clear idea of it. Every man may thus free himself of his passions, because he is able to have a clear idea of the passions of his body. This is possible by looking at things as being necessary. He who knows his passions rejoices, and has at the same time the idea of God; i.e., he loves God. This love, or the intellectual love of God, results from the third kind of cognition, — the cognition sub specie eternitatis, by which we know God as an eternal being. God, being superior to all passions, can, strictly taken, neither love nor hate; and whosoever wishes to be loved by God wishes that God should cease to be God. But, as our ideas are really thoughts of God, we may say that our love to God is a part of God's infinite love to himself. Our blessedness and freedom consist in this eternal love of God, and in this sense we may say that man is eternal (immortal). The idea of eternity has nothing to do with time or duration. Knowing things under the third form of cognition, man will be free of his passions, and will not fear death, because his spirit is eternal. This eternal part of the spirit is the reason; the part disappearing, his imagination. Even if we knew nothing of our eternity, virtue and piety would be our aim, for blessedness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue in itself is blessedness.

These are the outlines of Spinoza's philosophy as contained in his Ethics, the principal work of his life.

The Tractatus theologico-politicus, one of his earlier essays, was probably caused by his personal experience, and is very important as a defence of liberty of thought.

The difference of men is nowhere more distinctly shown than in their opinions, especially their religious opinions. It must be left, therefore, to the judgment of every individual to believe whatever he wants, as long as his belief produces good works; for the State has not to care for the opinions of men, but for their actions. Faith, religion, and theology have no theoretical importance or truth; their object is an entirely practical one, i.e., to bring those men who are not ruled by reason to obedience, virtue, and blessedness. It is the object of philosophy to give truth. Philosophy and theology have nothing in common. The reason for their difference is the following: God as the object of religion is a human being, i.e., he is represented in his relation to man; while God as the object of philosophy is not a human being, i.e., he is considered in relation to himself. Holy Scripture does not give a definition of God; it only reveals to us the attributes of justice and love. This is a clear proof that philosophical knowledge of God cannot serve as a model for human life. God is represented in Scripture to the imagination as a ruler, as just, gracious, etc. Philosophy, which deals with clear notions, cannot make use of these attributes. Theology has, therefore, no right to rule over philosophy, as the result of such a dominion will be fanaticism without peace. That will, of course, undermine the foundations of the State, and the State should not allow the encroachments of theology.

His biblical criticisms and views on the person of Christ, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The logical fallacies and other defects in the system of Spinoza have been frequently pointed out. The principal objections to be made are the following. The idea of substance is motionless, and insufficient for an explanation of growth and life: the modes stand, therefore, in hardly any connection with substance, and thus do not fulfil what they are intended for. The practical philosophy, although grandly drawn, does not cover the whole realm of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime idea of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy. Fichte, Schelling, Schleiermacher, Hegel, and many others, owe very much to Spinoza. And many of the thoughts expressed in the Tractatus theologico-politicus, for which he was persecuted by the theologians of his time, are to-day accepted as true by theology. The old reproach of atheism and pantheism, so often made by ignorance, will disappear more and more by a thorough knowledge of his writing. And while the scholars at present disagree as to the influence of Descartes and the old Jewish philosophers upon Spinoza, they should not forget the consumptive state of the philosopher's health; for our sublimest thoughts are not reached by the syllogism of the reason, but are born in the depth of the soul. Spinoza's influence upon poetry (Goethe, Schefer, Auerbach, etc.) has therefore been almost equal to his influence upon philosophy.

SPIRES, a city of Bavaria on the Rhine, is noticeable in church history as the seat of four diets concerning the Reformation. I. The first diet was opened June 26, 1526. The situation was very trying to the emperor. Francis I. had just broken the peace of Madrid with the consent of the Pope, and the Turks were threatening in the East. Under those circumstances the emperor dropped the religious question altogether, and left to the states to manage it as they could best defend before God, until a council, oecumenical or national, should finally settle it.—II. The second diet was opened March 15, 1529, under very different circumstances. Francis I. was suing for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman-Catholic majority consequently decreed that the mass should be restored wherever it had been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the real presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protestants.—III. The third diet was opened Feb. 9, 1542; and the emperor confirmed the peace of Ratibon (1541) in order to get the necessary subsidies against the Turks.—IV. The fourth diet was opened by the emperor in person, Feb. 20, 1544; and again the Turkish affairs compelled the emperor to concede toleration in religious matters. SPIRIT, the Human, in the Biblical Sense. The biblical terms for "soul" are נֶפֶשׁ, nefesh; and for "spirit," רוּחַ, ruach. We owe the conception of the human spirit, as, indeed, of spirit in general, to the Sacred Scriptures, to the religion of revelation. It is peculiar to these to speak of nefesh in the psychological sense as the cause of the human existence, particularly of his personal life. Where the Scriptures speak of the spirit of man in its widest acceptance, that is, of life (as in Job x. 12, xvii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 8; Zech. xii. 1), and ascribe to men and animals the same spirit (as in Eccles. iii. 19 sqq.; cf. Gen. vi. 17, vii. 15, 22; Ps. civ. 30; Isa. xlii. 5), they do this under the idea that this gift of life, which conditions the existence of the creature, comes from God, and binds it to God (cf. Job xii. 10, xxxiii. 4, xxxiv. 11; Ps. civ. 29). God is a god of the spirits of all flesh (Num. xvi. 22, xxvii. 16), towards man "the father of spirits," in distinction from "the fathers of our flesh" (Heb. xii. 9). Where life is, there is spirit, and the spirit points to God; for it is God's sign and God's possession, and the point at which God and the creature meet. And we thus understand how and what the Bible speaks by the spirit of man. Soul and spirit are in a number of passages interchangeable (Gen. xlv. 27, cf. Ps. cxix. 175; 1 Sam. xxx. 12, cf. 1 Kings xvii. 21 sq.; Ps. cxlvi. 4, cf. Gen. xxxv. 18; Ps. lxxvii. 3, cf. Ps. cvii. 5; Ps. xxxi. 5, cf. 2 Sam. iv. 9; Ezek. xxxvii. 8, cf. Acts xix. 10); because, in these, both are used in their primary significance, i.e., of the breath, that by which man lives, and which lives in him. Yet the Bible does make a distinction between these terms. Thus, dying is both a giving-up of the spirit and of the soul:

it is never said that the spirit dies, but that the soul dies (Num. xxxi. 19; Judg. xvi. 30; Matt. x. 28; Mark iii. 1). Only the soul is the subject of will and desire, inclination and aversion, pleasure and disgust (cf. Deut. xii. 20, xiv. 26; 1 Sam. ii. 16; Job xxiii. 13; Ps. xlii. 2, xliii. 1; Prov. xxi. 10; Isa. xxvi. 8; Mic. vii. 1, etc.); but soul and spirit are alike the subject of perception, self-consciousness. It must not, however, be overlooked, that consciousness, perception, willing, are attributed to the heart; and soul and spirit are spoken of only as they concern the hidden state to which these functions and phenomena belong, and because some weight would be laid upon it. Again: the dead are spoken of as spirits (Luke xxiv. 37, 39; Acts xxiii. 8 sq.; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 19), but the living as souls, for the soul as such outlasts death. Finally, and this is the most important difference in the Bible use of these words, whereas soul is applied to the individual, the subject of life, spirit is never so used. Spirit as an independent subject is always something different from the human spirit.

This latter distinction rests upon the original difference of the terms: $\piνεμα$, spiritus, "spirit," is the condition, while $\psiυχη$, psychē, "soul," is the manifestation of life. But for the explanation of this and the other peculiarities of usage, it is, of course, not sufficient always to call to mind the different points of view from which the inner being of man is described, now as spirit, and now as soul. One must go a step beyond the original relation of the two descriptions. Granted that spirit and soul are related as vital principle and life, still it is possible to distinguish them, not only in conception, but in fact; because the spirit, the principle of the soul, is the divine vital principle, immanent in, but not identical with, the individual life. Soul and spirit cannot be separated as soul and body, but they can be distinguished. Spirit is the principle of the soul; and it cannot be said of the spirit, which proceeds from God, and always bears the divine vital principle, that it sins or dies.

It is the knowledge of God and of the fall which leads us to make the distinction between the present actuality of life and its divine original creation. Spirit is wherever life is; and this spirit is the spirit of God, but in a peculiar manner. This spirit belongs to man. Not by the mere fact of creation does the holy spirit come to man, for this spirit is something different from the human spirit. The holy spirit is the cause of the soul, not identical with it. Sin has broken the connection between the human spirit and the spirit of God. So death came in as the opposite of the spirit wrought and filled eternal life, which was man's before the fall. Man now has a consciousness of guilt. He feels the pressure of law, and his inability to obey it. Through the impartation of the spirit, man is, however, renewed. He has life in its true sense. And this renewal affects his whole being in all its relations (Rom. viii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 5; Eph. iv. 24, 30; 1 Thess. v. 23).

The distinction between spirit and soul is the peculiar characteristic of the Bible's idea of the nature of man. But this is not saying that the Bible teaches a trichotomy. On the contrary, nothing is farther from it than such a trichotomy as, for instance, the Platonic. The biblical trichotomy, as we find it in 1 Thess. v. 23, Heb. iv. 12, and which there rests upon the knowledge of sin and the experience of salvation, does not exclude a decidedly dichotomic expression, as 1 Pet. ii. 11, where the soul is regarded simply according to her spiritual determination as the bearer of the divine life-principle (cf. Phil. i. 27).

SPIRITUALISM is a term, which, in its wider sense, is often applied to various forms of mysticism and quietism, as represented by Jacob Boehme, De Molinos, Mme. Guyon, and others; while in its narrower, but now more common, sense, it simply denotes a belief in a natural communication between this and the other world. A leading Spiritualist paper, Spiritual Magazine, established in London in 1860, defines Spiritualism as "based on the cardinal fact of spirit communion and influx;" as an "effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny;" as aiming, "through a careful, reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe, of the relations of spirit to matter, and of man to God and the spiritual world." In this sense of the term the phenomenon has attracted more physiological than theological interest; though its devotees pronounce it an indispensable weapon in the contest with the religious indifference, materialism, and atheism of our age.

Spiritualism, or, as it is sometimes called, Spiritism, dates back only to 1818. In that year it was discovered that certain rappings which were heard in the house of John D. Fox in Hydeville, Wayne County, N.Y., and which could not be accounted for in any ordinary way, conveyed intelligent communications. In 1850 the two girls Margaret and Kate Fox came to New York; and soon "spirit-rapping," the moving of heavy bodies without any mechanical agency, involuntary writing, etc., were phenomena which everybody had witnessed, or heard discussed by witnesses. Still more powerful mediums — that is, persons of such sensitive organization that the spirits can act upon them or through them — appeared. One of the most remarkable of these was Daniel Douglas Home, a lad of seventeen years, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. in Paris, and Alexander II. in St. Petersburg. Greater things were now accomplished, — speaking in foreign languages; lighting of a phosphorescent light in the dark; producing of drawings, pictures, and photographs; and, finally, the complete embodiment of a departed spirit, at least so far as to make him recognizable to friends and relatives. Numerous books were written for and against, and a multitude of prose lytes were made; but a sect or party, properly so speaking, was not formed.

The Spiritualists generally reject the doctrine of the Trinity, considering Christ simply as one of the great teachers of mankind, not in any essential point different from the founders of the other great historical religions. They also generally reject the doctrine of a personal devil, though they believe in evil spirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; but, when the transition from the one phase of life to the other takes place through death, no very great change occurs. The new life is only a supplement to the old, and in its initial state almost wholly determined by the character of that. Communications between these two spheres of life have always been possible, though under certain conditions of which we as yet have only very slight knowledge; but the motives which bring the spirits to reveal themselves to us are simply love and mercy, a desire to convince man of the existence of a future life.

SPITTA, Karl Johann Philipp, a distinguished German hymn-writer; was b. in Hanover, Aug. 1, 1801; d. in Burgdorf, Sept. 28, 1859. His mother, a converted Jewess, was left a widow in 1805. Sent to school, Spitta's studies were interrupted for four years by a dangerous sickness. At the close of this period he was apprenticed to a clock-maker. Continuing his study of Latin and Greek in private, he again entered school in 1818, and in 1821 passed to the university of Göttingen, where he studied theology. His faith wavered for a time, and he associated with the circle to which Heinrich Heine belonged. It was re-assured by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Wette. From 1821 to 1828 he acted as private tutor at Lune, near Lüneburg, then became co-pastor at Sudwald; and after holding pastorates at Hameln (1830) and Wechholt (1837), he was made superintendent at Wittingen, Lüneburg (1853), and at Burgdorf (1859). His success as a pastor and preacher brought him calls in 1841 and 1846 to Bremen, Barmen, and Elberfeld. In 1855 he was made doctor of divinity by the university of Göttingen. Spitta was a man of deep piety, and earnestness of faith. He excelled as a pastor. His fame rests upon his hymns. In May, 1826, he wrote to a friend, "In the way that I used to sing, I now sing no more. I consecrate my life and my love, and also my song, to the Lord." His love is the one great theme of all my songs, and it is the longing of the Christian hymnist to praise and magnify him adequately." He stands alongside of Albert Knapp as the best and sweetest of the recent German hymn-writers. It was not till 1833 that he acceded to the repeated requests of friends, and published a collection of hymns in Psalter und Harfe (Psaltery and Harp), which has gone through many editions. A second collection appeared in 1843, and a third in 1861 (edited by Professor Adolf Peters. [Among Spitta's best hymns are Ein lieblich Loos ist uns gefallen ("Our lot is fallen in pleasant places"), O Jesu meine Sonne ("O blessed Son, whose splendor"), O selig Haus wo man dich aufgenommen ("O happy house! O home supremely blest"), all translated by MASSIE, 1860.] See Life of Spitta by MÜNKEL, Leipzig, 1861, and PETERS's edition of the Psalter und Harfe. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SPONDANUS (Henri de Sponde), b. at Mauléon, Jan. 6, 1568; d. at Toulouse, May 18, 1643. He was educated in the Reformed faith at Orthez; studied law, and entered the service of Henry IV., but was, by the writings of Bellarmine and Du Perron, induced to embrace Romanism in 1595; went to Rome; was ordained a priest in 1606, and was in 1626 made bishop of Pamiers. He published an abbreviation of BACONIUS's Annales, Paris, 1612, which was often reprinted, and translated into other languages; also a continuation from 1127 to 1622. NEUDECKER.

SPORTS, Book of, a royal proclamation drawn up by Bishop Morton for James I., issued by that king in 1618; republished by Charles I., under the direction of Laud, in the ninth year of his reign. Its object was to encourage those people who had attended divine service to spend the remainder of Sunday after evening prayers in such "lawful recreation" as dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May games, Whitsun ales, Morris dances, setting of May-poles, etc. The proclamation was aimed at the Puritans, and Charles required it to be read in every parish church. The majority of the Puritan ministers refused to obey, and some were in consequence suspended. See EADIE: Eccles. Cyclop., s.v., where the full text is given.

SPOTSWOOD (SPOTISWOOD), John, Scotch prelate; b. at Mid-Caldor, near Edinburgh, 1565; d. in London, Dec. 26, 1639. He was educated at Glasgow University, and succeeded his father as parson at Calder, in 1583, when only eighteen. In 1601 he accompanied the Duke of Lennox as chaplain in his embassy to France, and in 1603 James VI. to England. In 1603 he was made archbishop of Glasgow, and privy-councillor for Scotland. In 1615 he was transferred to St. Andrews, so that he became primate and metropolitan. On June 18, 1633, he crowned Charles I. at Holyrood. In 1635 he was made chancellor of Scotland. He was the leader in the movement to introduce the Liturgy into the Church of Scotland, which occasioned the rebellion (1637). When the Covenant was signed (1638), he retired in disappointment to London. He wrote The History of the Church and State of Scotland (203-1625), London, 1653; best ed., Edinburgh, 1817-51, 3 vols., with life of the author.

SPRAGUE, William Buell, D.D., LL.D., b. in Andover, Conn., Oct. 16, 1795; d. at Flushing, L.I., N.Y., May 7, 1876. He was graduated with honor from Yale College in 1815; was tutor for about a year in the family of Major Lewis (whose wife was the adopted daughter of Washington), at Woodlawn, near Mount Vernon; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1816; was graduated in 1819, and immediately settled over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Mass., as colleague with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, who was then eighty-eight years of age, and had spent his whole professional life of sixty-three years in that parish. Dr. Lathrop died in the following year, and Mr. Sprague was left sole pastor. In 1829 he accepted the call of the Second Presbyterian Church of Albany to become its pastor; and here he passed the succeeding forty years of his life, and closed the period of active labor by resignation of his charge in 1869. He then removed his residence from Albany to Fushing, L.I., where he died in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1828 Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of D.D.; he received the same honor from Harvard in 1818, and the degree of LL.D. from Princeton in 1869.

Among the preachers and public speakers of this country, Dr. Sprague attained very high eminence. In 1818 he delivered the oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, in 1860 the annual address to the Yale alumni, and in 1862 the discourse to the alumni of the Princeton Seminary upon the semi-centennial anniversary of that institution. More than one hundred and fifty of his sermons and occasional discourses were published by request. He was a voluminous author. He published more than a dozen separate works, among which may be mentioned Letters from Europe (1828), Lectures on Revivals (1832), Life of Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin (1838), Aids to Early Religion (1817), Words to a Young Man's Conscience (1818), Visits to European Celebrities (1855), Memoirs of the Rev. Drs. John and William A. McDowell (1861), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedediah Morse (1871).

The great literary work of his life, however, which earned for him the title of "biographer of the church," was the Annals of the American People, begun in 1852, when he was fifty-seven years of age, of which nine large octavo volumes were published, and the manuscript of the tenth and concluding volume completed for publication, before his death. Vols. i. and ii. are devoted to the Trinitarian Congregationalists; vols. iii. and iv., to the Presbyterians; vol. v., to the Episcopalians; vol. vi., to the Baptists; vol. vii., to the Methodists; vol. viii., to the Unitarians; vol. ix., to the Lutheran, Reformed, Associate, Associate Reformed, and Reformed Presbyterian; and the unpublished volume includes Quakers, German Reformed, Moravian, Cumberland Presbyterian, Freewill Baptist, Swedenborgian, and Universalist. The volumes are made up of biographical sketches of all the prominent clergymen of each denomination, from the earliest settlement of the country to the close of the year 1855. The work contains about fifteen hundred of these sketches; and to each sketch are appended, as far as practicable, letters of personal recollections contributed by writers who had intimately known the clergymen commemorated. In the preparation of this work, Dr. Sprague received cordial assistance from the eminent clergymen and laymen of each denomination, and probably had a more extended acquaintance throughout the churches of this country than any other man of his time. His successor at Albany, Rev. Dr. A. J. Upon, in his commemorative discourse, referred to the Annals as follows:—

"This book of our venerated friend is successful. It may have yielded no adequate pecuniary compensation; it may not be drawn from the circulating libraries, nor sold at the book-stalls; but it is so peculiar, it fills its own sphere so completely, it can never be supplanted. It is a treasury of Christian examples. It is the testimony of a cloud of witnesses. It is a chronicle of the everlasting church. Its author has identified himself with God as his agent in fulfilling his promise, that 'the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.'"

Dr. Sprague was thus described by an old and intimate friend, Rev. Dr. Ray Palmer, in the Congregationalist of May 24, 1876:—

"In his personal appearance Dr. Sprague was a very notable man. More than six feet in stature, erect, large-framed, and well-proportioned, with a grand head and dark-brown hair (which was unchanged to the day of his death, in his eighty-second year), he was sure to be observed in almost any assembly. His bearing was natural as of one entirely self-possessed, and the expression of his countenance pleasing; so that, while he impressed by his dignity, he yet attracted by a certain kindness and simplicity of manner which at once set even a stranger entirely at ease with him. In conversation one was sure to find him animated, cheerful, rich in material derived from reading, travel, and intercourse with men, yet as ready to listen as to talk, and chiefly intent on imparting the utmost possible pleasure to his friend or visitor. He had come into personal contact with many distinguished men, both at home and abroad; and he liked to describe them, to relate anecdotes of their peculiarities, and to repeat what they had finely said, or eloquent passages from their writings. He did this with great felicity. No one could spend an hour with him, and not be conscious of having enjoyed a rare pleasure. Of all that makes a Christian gentleman he was certainly a rare example."

EDWARD E. SPRAGUE.

SPRENG, Jakob (generally called Probst, from his being propositus in an Augustine convent in Antwerp), d. at Bremen, June 30, 1562. He was one of Luther's first adherents in the Netherlands; preached his views in Antwerp, and founded a Lutheran congregation there, but was arrested, and compelled to recant; went to Spem, his native city, and continued to preach the Reformation; was arrested a second time, but escaped to Wittenberg; and was in 1521 appointed preacher at Bremen, where the Reformation was established in 1525. He left some minor treatises. See J. G. Neumann's preface to Spreng's edition: M. Lutheri Commentarius in Joannis epistolam, etc., Leipzig, 1708; and especially the rare book of STUBBS: De vita J. Propositi, Lubeck, 1717. K1081.

SPRING, Gardiner, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Newburyport, Mass., Feb. 21, 1785; d. in New-York City, Aug. 18, 1873. He was graduated from Yale College, 1805; taught in Bermuda until 1807; admitted to the bar, 1808; abandoned law for theology, and studied at Andover Theological Seminary, 1809-10; ordained pastor of the Brick (Presbyterian) Church, Aug. 8, 1810, and held the position till his death. The first four years of his ministry were years of steady, quiet growth; but from 1811 to 1831 there were frequent revivals, the result of God's blessing upon his faithful preaching, and utterly independent of machinery. During this period he took part in the formation of the American Bible Society (1816), American Tract Society (1825), and American Home Missionary Society (1826). From 1834 to the close of his ministry, there were no revivals; but there was steady growth, and in himself great increase in his power as a preacher. It was then that he used the press to extend his usefulness, and published a number of volumes of connected discourses. His congregation first met in Beekman Street, but in 1856 removed to their present church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street. After 1861 he had a colleague. His ministry, both for length and power, is remarkable. His principal publications are Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character, New York, 1813; Fragments from the Study of a Pastor, 1838; Obligations of the World to the Bible, 1839; The Attraction of the Cross, 1846; The Bible not of Man, 1847; The Power of the Pulpit, 1818; The Mercy-Seat, 1850; First Things, 1851, 2 vols.; The Glory of Christ, 1852, 2 vols.; The Contrast between Good and Bad Men, 1855, 2 vols.; Pulpit Ministration, 1861, 2 vols.; and Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardiner Spring, 1866, 2 vols. (his autobiography). See the Memorial Discourse by Rev. Dr. J. O. Murray, New York, [1873].

SPRING, Samuel, D.D., b. in Northbridge, Mass., Feb. 27, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., March 1, 1819, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A graduate of Princeton College in 1771; a classmate and room-mate there with President James Madison. The friendship between these two men remained uninterrupted through life; although Spring was an ardent Federalist, and a determined opposer of Madison's administration.

He began the study of theology with his particular friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Nassau Hall. He continued the study with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Dr. Samuel Hopkins, and Dr. Stephen West. With the three divines last named he became very intimate, as likewise with Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who had been Spring's tutor at Nassau Hall. He coincided, however, in his theological opinions, with his brother-in-law, Nathaniel Emmons, more nearly than with any other man.

In 1775 he connected himself, as a chaplain of the Continental army, with a volunteer corps of eleven hundred men under the command of Benedict Arnold. With this corps he marched through the wilderness to Quebec. He stood with Col. Burr on the Plains of Abraham when Gen. Montgomery fell. At Nassau Hall he had become interested in his college mate, Aaron Burr. This interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After the death of Hamilton, in 1801, Dr. Spring, although a distant relative of Burr, published a terrific sermon against duelling, and did not spare either the murderer or the murdered.

Dr. Spring was pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Newburyport, Mass., forty-one years and seven months. He was ordained Aug. 6, 1777; was a distinguished patriot during the war of the Revolution and that of 1812. He was eminently a doctrinal preacher, vigorous, dignified, commanding, subliming. He deserves the gratitude of the churches for the impulse which he gave to the cause of theological education between the years 1777 and 1819. To him, as much as to any one man, may be traced the origin of at least four important institutions of learning. To him and Eliphalet Pearson may be ascribed the founding of Andover Theological Seminary. To him, more than to any one man, is due the formation of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, — a society which trained the principal men by whom the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was first conducted. To Dr. Spring or Dr. Worcester, or both united, is due the honor of having first suggested the idea of forming the American Board.

Twenty-six of Dr. Spring's published sermons are, some doctrinal, some political, some addressed to charitable societies, some to children. His most memorable theological treatises are his Dialogue on the Nature of Duty, 1784; his Moral Disquisitions and Strictures on the Rev. [Professor] David Tappan's Letters [in reply to the Dialogue], 2d ed., 1815. He also published The Youth's Assistant, or a Series of Theological Questions and Answers, 1818, and a large number of essays in The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, of which he was an editor. EDWARDS A. PARK.

STABAT MATER are the first words of the famous hymn of Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), and mean "The mother was standing." It is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages, and, in spite of its adoration of the Virgin, is one of the softest, sweetest, and chastest lyrics in Christian literature. Suggested by the scene depicted in John xix. 25, it describes with tender feeling the piercing agony of Mary at the cross. It has furnished a theme for musical composition to Nanini (about 1620), Palestrina (whose music is the best, and is sung at Rome on Palm-Sunday), Astorga (about 1700), Pergolesi (about 1736), Haydn, and Rossini (whose composition, according to Palmer, may be compared to a mater dolorosa painted standing under the cross, and clad in a Parisian court-dress). The original is in ten stanzas (WACKERNAEGLER, i. 136, 162; MONTE, ii. 147-154; DANIEL, ii. 133). Lisso (Stabat Mater, Berlin, 1813) gives fifty-three German and several Dutch translations. It has been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Mant, Coles, Benedict, etc. One of the best translations, "At the cross her station keeping," is found in SCHAEFF'S Christ in Song, p. 169. Dr. COLES'S translation, beginning "Stood the afflicted mother weeping," is also very excellent. See JACOPONE DA TODI and the literature there given.

Another Stabat Mater celebrates the joy of the Virgin Mary at the birth of Christ, as the former celebrates her grief at the cross, and may be called the "Mater speciosa" as distinct from the "Mater dolorosa." It was published in the edition of the Italian poems of Jacopone at Brescia, 1495, but attracted no attention till Ozanam published a French translation in his work on the Franciscan poets (Paris, 1852), and John Mason Neale, an English translation shortly before his death (1866). It is not equal to the Mater dolorosa, and seems to be an imitation by another hand. It was discussed by P. Schaff in Hours at Home (a monthly magazine), New York, May, 1867, and translated again by Erasmus C. Benedict, Hymn of Hildebert, etc., New York, 1869, p. 20.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, Church of England, b. 1680; became vicar of Beenharn, Berkshire, where he died, Oct. 11, 1752. He is remembered for his New History of the Holy Bible, from the beginning of the world to the establishment of Christianity (London, 1732, 2 vols. folio; frequently republished and reprinted; best ed. by G. Gleig and Dewar, 1836); and his Complete body of divinity (1729; 3d ed., 1755).

STAHL, Friedrich Julius, b. at Munich, Jan. 16, 1802; d. at Bruckenan, Aug. 10, 1861. He was of Jewish parentage, but embraced Christianity in his seventeenth year; four years afterwards, his whole family followed his example. He studied jurisprudence at Würzburg, Heidelberg, and Erlangen; and was appointed professor at Erlangen in 1832, and in Berlin in 1840. In Berlin he gathered crowded audiences, not only of juridical students, but at times, also, of educated people in general; as, for instance, in 1850, when he lectured on The Present Party-Position in Church and State: which lectures were published after his death by W. Hertz, Berlin, 1863. He also held the highest positions in the state-government of the church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamentary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rationalism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. His ideas are clearly defined in his Die Philosophie des Rechts, 1840, thoroughly revised in 1847, vol. I., under the title, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie, vol. II., Rechts- und Staatslehre. Of the fundamental problems of human life, he considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically,—one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man; one giving the absolute power to the mass of the people, the majority, and one organizing the State after the idea of the highest personality, as a sphere of ethical action. What lay between these two extremes he despised as destitute of character. But he did not consider the two possible solutions as equally good; on the contrary, from the depths of his conviction he cried out, "No majority, but authority!" Nowhere, perhaps, has he set forth his ideas more forcibly and more pointedly than in the two Neuschreiben he published in the Hegensteinberg controversy in 1845. In 1840 appeared his Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten, in which he subjects the three systems prevailing in the Lutheran Church—the episcopal, the territorial, and the collegial system—to a searching examination, recommending the first. The constitution of the Reformed Church has not found an equal treatment. He was an able advocate of high Lutheran orthodoxy, and an intimate friend of Hegensteinberg. In his Die lutherische Kirche und die Union (1800) he went so far in his opposition to the union of the two Protestant churches as to declare that Luther at Marburg, refusing to join hands with Zwingli, was as great as Luther at Worms. Among his other works are Der christliche Staat und sein Verhältniss zu Deismus und Judenthum, 1847; Der Protestantismus als politisches Princip, 1856, etc.

STANCARO, Francesco, b. at Mantua, 1501; d. at Stobnitz, Poland, Nov. 12, 1571. As a friend of the Reformation, he was in 1543 compelled to leave Italy. In 1546 he published a Hebrew grammar at Basel, and in 1550 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Cracow. His relation, however, to the Reformation, was soon discovered, and he was arrested; but he escaped, and was in 1551 appointed professor of Hebrew at Königsberg, and the next year at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. There he immediately entered into the Osiandrian controversy, and published his Apologia contra Osiandrum, in which he set forth his peculiar ideas of Christ as being the mediator between God and man, only on account of his human nature. The ideas caused great scandal; and Stancaro went first to Poland, then to Hungary, where he took active part in the controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed. Having returned to Poland in 1558, he settled at Pinczow, and came naturally in contact with the Italian Antitrinitarians active in Poland,—Blandrata, Lismanini, and others. In the correspondence between the Polish Protestant and the German and Swiss Reformers concerning the Italian Unitarianism, which was spreading in the country, some regard was also paid to Stancaro and his anti-Osiandrian ideas; and he published in 1561 De Trinitate. But though he gathered some pupils, called "Stancarists," he soon fell into oblivion.

STANHOPE, Lady Hester Lucy, daughter of Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, the great Earl of Chatham; b. in London, March 12, 1746; d. at Jun in the Lebanon, June 23, 1839. She was the private secretary and confidante of her distinguished uncle, and a member of his family from her twentieth year until his death, 1806, when, unable to live in her accustomed style upon the twelve hundred pounds yearly stipend granted her as the ward of the nation, she retired to a solitude in Wales, and in 1819 to Syria; and in 1813 she established herself at the deserted convent of Mar Elias, near Jun, and eight miles from Sidon, where she lived until her death, exerting a remarkable influence upon the Arabs around. Her servants were Albanians; her house, a fortress which afforded shelter to the persecuted. She dressed like an emir, ruled despotically, practised astrology, and preached a creed compounded of Bible and Koran. She was eccentric to the verge of insanity. See her Memoirs, London, 1845, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846; The Seven Years' Travels of Lady Hester Stanhope, 1846, 3 vols.

STANISLAUS, Bishop of Cracow, the patron-saint of Poland; was b. near Cracow, July 26, 1030, and, after studying canonical law at Gnesen and Paris, entered the clerical profession. He was a stern ascetic, distributed his patrimony amongst the poor, and boldly denounced the cruelty and licentiousness of Boleslas II., king of Poland, whom he finally excommunicated. In revenge, the king had Stanislaus murdered while he was celebrating mass near Cracow, May 8, 1079. Miracles are ascribed to the bishop, both alive and dead. In 1251 Innocent IV. placed him among the saints. Many altars and churches were built to his memory in Poland. His day is May 7. See STANISLAUS, St., was b. Oct. 20, 1550, at Kostou, Poland; d. in Rome, Aug. 15, 1568. In his fourteenth year he went to Vienna; had a vision of two angels and the Virgin Mary, who urged him to become a Jesuit; sought admission to the order at Vienna, which was refused on account of his father's aversion to the step; and finally went to Rome, where he was admitted Oct. 28, 1567. He predicted the day of his death, and on account of his severe ascetic practices was beatified by Clement VIII. in 1604. NEUDECKER.

STANLEY, Arthur Penrhyn, b. Dec. 13, 1815, was son of Edward Stanley, at that time rector of Alderley, in Cheshire; d. in London, July 18, 1881. In the village made memorable from being his birthplace, he spent his childhood under the fostering care of his father and mother, whose admirable characters he has embalmed in a volume of family memoirs. Their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Leycesters, amiable and interesting relatives on the mother's side. The scenery of Alderley Edge, its pine-trees and beacon-tower, also the rectory-garden, with bird-cages hung among the roses, no doubt served to stimulate the child's active imagination. When eight years old he was remarkable for retentiveness of memory,—a faculty which was singularly powerful in after-life. But this was associated with an incapacity for mathematical studies, and even a sum in arithmetic puzzled him to the end of his days. In January, 1829, he was entered as a schoolboy at Rugby; and there he exhibited the amiableness and decision so well described in "Tom Brown," and came under the formative power of Dr. Thomas Arnold, prince of schoolmasters, to whom he owed much of the mental and moral strength which distinguished him in the whole of his subsequent career. He early showed a fondness for history, and, as he records, "got through all Mitford and all Gibbon, and several smaller" authors. Rugby became to Stanley a second home; and, when he had received the last of five prizes, his master said to him, "Thank you, Stanley: we have nothing more to give."

He was elected a scholar of Balliol at Oxford in 1833, and signalized his undergraduateship by a prize-poem entitled The Gipsies. His father was made Bishop of Norwich in 1837; and there, of course, he was wont to spend his vacations: in no other way did he become connected with the old East-Anglian city. He undertook a tour in Greece in 1840–H, and there, as was his wont, studied nature on its poetical side and in its historical relations, and returned to the university full of knowledge and inspiration derived from the acquaintance he formed with the classic scenery amidst which he wandered. He soon commenced as college-tutor, and the attachment he inspired in the hearts of his pupils foretold what was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what he subsequently accomplished as a popular lecturer and author. Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, in which he broke up new ground by dwelling on the individual peculiarities of the apostles, were published in 1816; but before that, in 1841, he made a mark on biographical literature by his Life of Arnold, a book said at the time to set everybody talking about the hero, rather than the author,—a sign of the wonderful success he had achieved. He was appointed secretary to the first Oxford Commission, which resulted in considerable improvements of university education; and, watching the progress of theological controversy, he wrote in 1850 an article on the Gorham Judgment, the harbinger of several successive criticisms on ecclesiastical questions, which he afterwards published.

In 1851 he became a canon of Canterbury, and then entered on the second stage of his public life. There he wrote his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians and his Memorials of Canterbury; and, having already travelled in the East, he added to these his Sinai and Palestine. A tour in Russia was taken by him whilst he was a Canterbury canon, and this awakened in him a deep interest respecting the Eastern Church. Of this he availed himself in lectures on its history, after he entered upon the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity: for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the popularity of those gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them: and she also strengthened her husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the neighborhood, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand and picturesque in itself, and so rich in its historical associations; and, when he had familiarized himself with its details, it was no common treat to wander through its aisles and chapels with him for a cicerone. This office he condescended to fill for the gratification of the poor as well as the rich. The hospital at Westminster and other local institutions found in him a warm supporter; whilst his garden-parties, in connection with the encouragement of floral cultivation amongst the humbler classes, were attractive, not only to the gentry and nobility around, but to many living at a distance. As a lecturer, an advocate at public meetings, and especially as an abbey-preacher, he commanded large audiences, and delighted those who listened to his original remarks. A Broad-Churchman, and too often throwing into the background truths which evangelical Christians love to hear, he interested all classes by his earnest devoutness, his catholic spirit, and his abstinence from all factions combinations. He was a zealous son of the Church of England; and, making no secret of his strong attachment to the principle of an Establishment, he nevertheless conciliated Nonconformists, and delighted to cultivate among them some intimate friendships. He was busy with his pen throughout the whole period of his residence in the deanery. His Lectures on the Jewish Church appeared in three successive volumes under the dates of 1863, 1865, and 1879. Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey was published in 1868; Essays on Church and State followed in 1870. The History of the Church of Scotland, delivered as lectures in Edinburgh, issued from the press in 1872. A number of minor works, including controversial letters, sermons, and lectures, were the product of his pen in this last and most important period of his life; and the publication of his final volume, a rather large one, on Christian Institutes, occurred in 1881. The death of his beloved wife in 1875 was a bereavement from the effect of which he never fully recovered. For a short time he could accomplish but little; but, gradually recovering his energy, he devoted himself anew to works of faith, and labors of love, and in 1880 found some relief by preparing for the press Memoirs of Edward and Catherine Stanley, his father and mother. It was a solace to go back to early days; and he also contemplated writing memorials of Lady Augusta, a work he did not accomplish.

He visited the United States in 1878, and returned home greatly refreshed, when his friends in England were gladdened by accounts he gave of his cordial reception by friends in America. His addresses and sermons delivered there were published in New York in 1879, and have since been republished in England. Always rather delicate, the state of his health in latter years often awakened anxiety; but, as he rallied from attacks, hopes were entertained of his life being prolonged for some years to come. However, in the summer of 1881, he felt ill after delivering a short lecture on one of the beatitudes, and then, after being confined to his bed a few days, died on Monday, the 18th of July. As in the case of his wife, so at his own funeral, all ranks of society, from the royal family down to the inmates of almshouses, and all denominations, Established and Nonconforming, united in paying honors to the deceased, not only as a public man, but as a lamented personal friend.

STAPFER, the name of a gifted and erudite family of Bernese theologians.—1. Johann Friedrich was b. at Brugg in 1708; d. in 1775 at Diessbach, near Thun, where he settled in 1750. He studied at Bern and Marburg, and became a devoted Wolfian. He was a zealous and successful pastor. He wrote, amongst other works, Institutiones theologicae, polonicae, universae, Zurich, 1713, 5 vols. (11th ed. of vol. i., 1757); Grundlegung zur wahren Religion, 1716-53, 12 vols.; Sittenlehre, 1757-66, 6 vols. The first-named work is widely known as a most reliable compend. It is characterized by learning, insight, and a kindly spirit. Stapfer is careful always to state the opponent's views correctly. — II. Johannes, brother of the preceding, was b. 1719; d. 1801; is more especially remembered by his version of the Psalms. Of the seventy-one psalms introduced into the Bern Hymn-Book, of 1853, forty-one are his. He published Theolog. Analytica (Bern, 1763), seven volumes of sermons, etc. — Philipp Albert, one of the most distinguished ornaments of French Protestantism, was b. at Bern, Sept. 23, 1706; d. in Paris, March 27, 1810. In 1792 he was appointed professor of the fine arts, and subsequently professor of philosophy and theology. In 1798 he was appointed minister of education of Switzerland. His generosity enabled Pestalozzi to give his method a fair trial in the castle at Burgdorf. After conspicuous services for his country, he retired to private life in 1801, and soon after went to Paris to reside. In a time of religious indifference he retained his evangelical fervor, and occupied a conspicuous position in religious circles in France. His salon was the meeting-place of great men, as Guizot, Cousin, and others. He also endeavored to introduce Kant to the knowledge of the French. He was president of a number of religious societies. Among his works, most of which were written in French, are De vita immortalis spe, etc., Bern, 1787; La mission divine et la nature sublime de Jésus Christ, déduites de son caractère, Lausanne, 1799. A volume containing some of his writings, and introduced by a biography from the pen of Vinet, appeared in 1841 under the title Mélanges philosophiques, littéraires, historiques et religieux.

STAPHYLUS, Friedrich, b. at Osnabrück, Aug. 17, 1512; d. at Ingolstadt, March 5, 1564. He studied theology at Wittenberg; became an intimate friend of Melancthon, and was, on his recommendation, appointed professor at Königsberg, in 1546. As he felt unable to carry through the controversy which he had begun with Osiaider, he resigned his position, went to Breslau, embraced Romanism, and entered the service of the Duke of Bavaria. The duke gave him a title; the emperor, the title of nobility; the pope, a purse with one hundred gold crowns; and he was very active for the restoration of Romanism in Bavaria and Austria. Among his many polemical writings, the most noticeable are Epitome Martini Lutheri theologici tremantis; De iussu pro tremenda M. L. theologica, etc. He also wrote a life of Charles V., and published a Latin translation of Dionysius Siculus. G. H. KAUTEL.

STARK, Johann August, a well known Crypto-Catholic; was b. at Schwerin in 1711; studied at Göttingen; became an enthusiastic Freemason; was made professor of Oriental Languages (1769) and theology (1776) at Königsberg, and died as court-preacher and councillor, in Darmstadt, in 1816. Among his works are Hephastion (1775) and Gesch. d. Arianismus (1831-81). Accused of being a Crypto-Catholic, he defended himself in a work, Ueber Kryptokatholicismus, etc. (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1787), and was protected and honored by the court. His anonymous book, Theodis Gistmal, 1809 (7th ed., 1828), was the occasion for renewed attacks, which the discovery, after his death, of a room in his house arranged for the celebration of the mass, and his order to be buried in cowl and in the Catholic churchyard, proved to be justified.

STATISTICS, Religious. See RELIGIOUS STATISTICS.

STAUDENMAIER, Franz Anton, a distinguished Roman-Catholic theologian; was b. at Donzdorf, Württemberg, Sept. 11, 1800; d. in Freiburg, Breisgau, Jan. 19, 1856. He studied at the Wilhelmsstift, Tübingen, under Mohler; in 1827 was ordained priest; and in 1830 published, at Mohler's suggestion, a History of Episcopal Elections (Gesch. d. Bischofswahlen, Tübingen), and accepted a call to Giessen, as professor of theology in the Roman-Catholic faculty. In 1837 he exchanged this position for a similar one at the university of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, where he had Hug for a colleague. Staudenmaier was not the equal of his teacher, Mohler, in originality and profundity, but not behind him in the extent of his learning. Among his works, several of which remained unfinished, are Johannis Scotus Erigena u.d. Wissenschaft seiner Zeit, Frankfurt, 1834 (2d part never written); Die christl. Dogmatik, Freiburg-im-Br., 1841-52, 4 vols. (not complete); D. Geist d. Christenthums, dargestellt in d. heil. Zeiten, etc., Mainz, 1834, 2 vols. [7th ed., 1866]; D. Wesen d. kath. Kirche, Freiburg, 1845. [He was a frequent contributor to the Kirchenlexikon of Wetzer and Welte. See MICHELIN: Staudenmaier's wissenschaftl. Leistungen, Freiburg-im-Br., 1877.]

HAMBERGER.

STAUDLIN, Karl Friedrich, a fertile German theological author; was b. July 25, 1764, at Stuttgart; was educated at Tübingen; called to Göttingen University, 1790; d. at Göttingen, July 5, 1826. He was a believing theologian. Among his many works are Grundriss d. Tugend- und Religionslehre, Götting., 1798-1800, 2 vols.; Grundriss d. Moral, 1800; Philos. u. biblische Moral, 1805; Lehrbuch d. Moral für Theologen, 1815, 3d ed., 1825; Gesch. d. Sittenlehre Jesu, 1799-1822, 4 vols.; Kirchengeschichte von Grossbritannien, Göttingen, 1819, 2 vols.; Theolog. Encyclopädie u. Methodologie, Hanover, 1821; Geschichte und Lit. der Kirchengeschichte, Hanover, 1827. His autobiography was edited by HEMSEN, Göttingen, 1826.

STAUPITZ, Johann von, the noble friend of Luther; d. at Salzburg, Dec. 28, 1521. The time and place of his birth are unknown. Entering the Augustinian order, he studied at several universities, at last in Tübingen, where in 1500, as prior of the Augustinian convent, he was made doctor of theology. Rejecting the scholastic theology, he had recourse to the Scriptures and the mystics, and was indeed a theologian not only of the school, but of the heart. His culture, practical ability, and courteous and manly bearing, won for him the favor of the Elector of Saxony, by whom he was invited to take part in the foundation of the new university at Wittenberg. In its interests he went to Rome to secure the Papal permission, and in 1502 was settled in Wittenberg as professor and dean of the theological faculty. In 1503 he was chosen vicar-general of the Augustinians in Germany. In 1512 he substituted in the convents under his supervision the Scriptures for Augustine's writings, to be read during meals. The same year he acted as the substitute of the Archbishop of Salzburg at the Lateran Council. That which gives Staupitz a place in history is his relation to Luther. He became acquainted with the young monk at Erfurt in 1505, secured a higher position for him in the convent, and sought to turn his attention from ascetic thoughts and metaphysical speculations to the cross and the atoning love of God. "Your thoughts are not Christ," said he to Luther on one occasion, as the latter looked with a shudder at the elements which Staupitz was carrying in a funeral-procession; "for Christ does not terrify, but console." In 1508, at his recommendation, Luther was called to Wittenberg, and at his advice Luther entered the pulpit. In 1516, while absent on a mission in the Netherlands, Staupitz showed his confidence in Luther by making him temporary inspector of forty convents in Saxony and Thuringia. As late as October, 1518, he sympathized with his young friend, and was at his side in the discussion with Cajetan in Augsburg. On that occasion he said, "Remember, my brother, that thou hast begun this work in the name of Christ." He soon afterwards drew back from the Reformation; but he did not oppose it, like Erasmus. He was "a pious Christian mystic," who deplored the abuses of the church, but had not the heroism to be a Reformer. In 1519 he went to Salzburg (not because he had fallen into disfavor with the Elector of Saxony, as D'Aubigné supposes), became court-preacher in 1522, abbot of the Benedictine convent of St. Peter at Salzburg, having changed his order previously, and, later, vicar of the archbishop. In 1519 he wrote to Luther, offering him a refuge at Salzburg. But Luther was displeased with the course of his old friend, and wrote, Feb. 9, 1521 (De Wette, i. 556), "Your submission has saddened me very much, and shown me another Staupitz than the preacher of grace and the cross." In another letter, of Sept. 17, 1523 (De Wette, ii. 107), he writes to him as the one "through whom the light of the gospel was first made to shine from the darkness in our hearts" (per quem primum coepit Evangelii lux de tenebris splendescere in cordibus nostris). Some of Luther's writings which he took with him to Salzburg, and gave to the monks to read, were burned by one of his successors. Staupitz exercised a deep influence upon Luther; so that the latter, in his dedication of the first collection of his writings to Staupitz, in 1518, could call himself his disciple. In his letter of May 30, 1518, to accompany his Theses to Leo X., he says he heard from Staupitz, as "a voice from heaven," an explanation that true penance starts from love, and ends in righteousness. This truth, he said, acted like a sharp arrow in his heart until the word "repentance" became to him the sweetest word in the Bible.

Besides ten letters which Grimm edited, only one of which is to Luther, he left behind him some tracts, Von d. Nachfolge d. willigen Sterbens Christi (1516), Von der heilighen Liebe Gottes (1518), etc. See ULLMANN: Reformers before the Reformation, [a new edition of his works by KNAAKE, Gotha, 1867; KOLDI: D. deutsche Augustinerorden und Johann von Staupitz, Gotha, 1879].

H. MALLEET.

STEDINGERS, The, a heroic German family living on the banks of the Weser, near its mouth, which offered a bold resistance to the presumption of the clergy in the latter part of the twelfth, and the beginning of the thirteenth, century. The conflict originated with the indignity of a priest to the wife of a nobleman, who, at the communion, instead of the host, put into her mouth the groschen which she had given him at the confessional. Her husband, taking up the case, and only receiving denunciation from the priest, murdered him. The deed stirred up the priesthood; and Hartwig II., archbishop of Bremen, demanded not only the delivery of the murderer, but a large indemnity. Being refused both, he put the district under the ban, and in 1207 led an army against the refractory Stedingers, who were supported by the powerful Duke Otto of Lüneburg, the bitter enemy of Bremen. The war lasted for a number of years, until the Stedingers being victorious, the case was brought before Pope Gregory IX. The Stedingers were accused of being not only heretics, but in league with Satan, whom they worshipped under the image of an idol of Ammon, to whom they offered their children. When a candidate for admission to their mysteries appeared before them, a large frog entered the room, which the members kissed, a shudder passing through their system with the kiss; and with the shudder the memory of the Christian faith completely disappeared. These and other culmities were taken up by the Papal inquisitor-general, Konrad of Marburg, who persuaded the Pope in 1233 to issue the ban against the Stedingers as cursed heretics. A crusade was preached against them. They raised an army of eleven thousand, and successfully resisted the Archbishop of Bremen and his allies till May 27, 1234, when the battle of Altenesch completely broke their resistance. Half the army was destroyed, and many of the survivors fled to Friesland. The territory of the Stedingers was divided between the Archbishop of Bremen and the Counts of Oldenburg. The defeat was celebrated in the archiepiscopal church of Bremen by a yearly festival on the fifth Sunday after Easter. All the writers of the middle ages speak disparagingly of the Stedingers as heretics. It remained for the impartial historian since the Reformation to honor their resistance as a just opposition to the oppression of a presumptuous priesthood. See SCHMIDT: De expeditione cruciata in Stedingos, Marburg, 1722; RITTER: De papa Stedingi ad Stedingis sac. XIII. hereticis, Vitula, 1751; LAPPENBERG: Vom Kruzzuge gegen d. Stedingen, Stadt, 1755, etc.

STEELE, Anne, author of many popular and useful hymns; was the daughter of a Baptist minister at Broughton in Hampshire, where she was b. 1716, and d. November, 1778. She was always an invalid; and her pains was drowned on or just before the wedding-day. Her Poems on Subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theodosia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were re-printed, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Poems in Verse and Prose; the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole were re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1808, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1863. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1769, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1787) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few. On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, relegated her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more elegance than force, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. A fragment of one of them, "Father, whatever of earthly bliss," may last as long as any thing of Watts or Doddridge.

STEINHOFFER, Maximilian Friedrich Christoph, b. at Owen in Wurtemberg, Jan. 16, 1706; d. at Weinsberg, Feb. 11, 1761. He studied theology at Tübingen; entered into connection with the congregation of Herrnhut; became court-preacher at Ebersdorf early in 1731; joined the Moravian Brethren in 1746, but returned in 1749 to Wurtemberg, and held various minor pastoral charges, finally that of Weinsberg. He wrote a number of sermons and devotional books, — Tägliche Nahrung des Glaubens, 1743 (third edition, Ludwigsburg, 1859, with his autobiography); a commentary on 1 John; a collection of sermons on the life of Jesus, Frankfurt, 1761.

STEITZ, Georg Eduard, D.D., b. at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, July 25, 1810; was pastor and d. there Jan. 19, 1879. He wrote Die Privatbeichte u. Privatabsolution d. Luther. Kirche aus den Quellen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Frankfurt, 1831; Das römische Inquisitionswesen, 1851; and forty-one articles for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kritiken and elsewhere. He was a man of rare and accurate learning, and sound judgment. His articles in Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See JUNG: Dr. Steitz: Zur Erinnerung an Herrn Senior Dr. theol. G. E. Steitz, Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1879.

STENNETT, Joseph, an English hymn-writer; was b. at Abington, Berks, 1663; d. at Knap-hill, Bucks, July 11, 1713. In 1680 he was ordained pastor of a Baptist congregation in Devonshire Square, London, which he served till his death. He was the author of a reply to Russen's Foundamentals without a Foundation, or a True Picture of the Anabaptists. His Hymns for the Lord's Supper appeared in 1697, and were increased from thirty-seven to fifty in the third edition, 1709. He also published a Version of Solomon's Song with the Forty-Seventh Psalm, 1700 (2d ed., 1709), and twelve hymns on the Believers' Baptism, 1712. A complete edition of his hymns, poems, sermons, and letters, was published, with a memoir, in 4 vols., 1732. Stennett is the author of the familiar hymn, "Another six days' work is done," which in the original had fourteen stanzas.

STENNETT, Samuel, an English hymnist, and grandson of the preceding; was b. 1727, in Exeter, where his father was pastor of the Baptist Church; d. in London, Aug. 24, 1795. He assisted his father as pastor of the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, London, and in 1758 became his successor, remaining with the church till his death. He was a fine scholar, and was made D.D. by Aberdeen University, 1763. He was a man of influence among the dissenters, enjoyed the confidence of George III., and had John Howard for a frequent hearer. Writing from Smyrna under date of Aug. 11, 1786, the great prison-reformer speaks of the pleasure he experienced in reviewing his notes of Stennett's sermons. Stennett's works (On Personal Religion, 1769, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1801, being the most extensive) were published with a memoir in 1824, 3 vols. Thirty-four of his hymns are given at the end. Five others have been found in Rippon's Selection. His best hymns are "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Majestic sweetness sits enthroned," "Tis finished! so the Saviour cried."

STEPHAN, Martin, and the Stephanists. Martin Stephan (b. at Stramberg, Moravia, Aug. 13, 1777; d. in Randolph County in the State of Illinois, Feb. 21, 1846) was of humble parentage, and early apprenticed to a weaver. In 1798 he went to Breslau, where he soon became intimate with the pietist circles, and finally contrived to enter the gymnasium. From 1804 to 1809 he studied theology at Halle and Leipzig in a peculiarly narrow way, but not without energy; and in 1810 he was appointed pastor of the congregation of Bohemian exiles in Dresden. He was a Lutheran of the strictest type of orthodoxy. His success as a preacher and an organizer was very extraordinary. Though he severed his connection with the Moravian Brethren, and though the revival movement he started bore a decidedly separatist character, his congregation grew rapidly, and gifted and serious men became exceedingly devoted to him. He maintained stations all through the valley of the Mulde; he sent out young missionaries whom he had educated; and he found followers, even in Wurtemberg and Baden. The separatist tendency, however, of his work, and perhaps, also, the very success of his labor, brought him in manifold conflicts with the regular clergy of Dresden; and certain peculiarities in his personal habits and in his arrangements finally brought him into collision with the police. In the spring of 1838 the congregation for which he originally had been appointed pastor formally accused him of unchastity and fraud, and in the fall he secretly left the city for Bremen. In Bremen he was joined by no less than seven hundred followers; and at the head of this congregation, "the Stephanists," he sailed for America on Nov. 18. But, if there previously had been something wrong in his conduct, it now became apparent that the root of the evil lay deep in his character. Before the vessel arrived at New Orleans, he had himself elected bishop, and made master of the emigration-fund; and at St. Louis, where the colony stopped for two months, he gave himself up entirely to a life of pleasure. A tract of land was finally bought at Wittenberg, Perry County, Mo.; and in April, 1839, the larger portion of the congregation, and the bishop, removed thither. Hardly one month elapsed, however, before the accusations from Dresden were renewed, but by other members of his congregation, and referring to later times; and, as the statements made were found to be correct, he was deprived of his dignity, and excommunicated. But the congregation, after passing through various vicissitudes and troubles, prospered, and became the nucleus of the "Missouri" type of High-Church Lutheranism, which adheres most closely to the symbolical books, and has its headquarters in the Concordia College at St. Louis. Among the writings of Martin Stephan the most important are Der christliche Glaube (a collection of sermons, Dresden, 1825) and Gaben für unsere Zeit (Nuremberg, 1834). See VON POLENZ: Die öffentliche Meinung und der Pastor Stephan, Dresden, 1840; VEISE: Die Stephan'sche Auswanderung nach America, Dresden, 1840; and the elaborate art. by KUMMER, in Henzog: Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed. vol. xv. pp. 41-61.

STEPHEN, deacon of the congregation at Jerusalem, and first martyr of the Christian Church. It is only in our day that his influence upon the development of Christianity has been adequately brought out. All that we know of him is found in Acts vi., vii. He was chosen in an emergency deacon of the church; and no one doubts any more that he was a Hellenist, although this is not definitely stated. He did not confine himself to the duties of the diaconate, but devoted himself to preaching, and was especially successful in those synagogues of Jerusalem where the Greek language was used. In connection with him, we for the first time hear of discussions in the synagogues (Acts vi. 10). He was accused of blaspheming Moses and God, and was brought up for trial, false witnesses being suborned to testify against him. The people finally exercised lynch-law upon the accused. Stephen preached, as the apostles up to that time had not preached. He was accused of speaking against the Jewish religion, fathers, and temple. He had entered most deeply into the meaning of many of Christ's sayings about the difference between the law and the gospel, and especially the saying recorded in John ii. 19. Can there be any doubt that he had become convinced that the Mosaic institutions could not be combined with the spiritual contents of the gospel as a basis for the church and the kingdom of God? This is made certain, not only by the form of the accusation, but by the address of Stephen. At first sight the latter seems to be disconnected and irrelevant. Closer inspection, however, reveals that this is not the case. The speaker proves that God had revealed himself independently of the forms of the law, and that the history of revelation was progressive, and closes by showing the temporary nature of the temple, and the other forms of the law. Nothing of the kind had ever been brought out by the apostles before. Stephen was not merely the protomartyr of the church. He was the first Christian preacher who fully understood the distinction which Christ taught between Judaism and Christianity, a forerunner of Paul; yea, perhaps, in the deepest sense the one who prepared the way for Paul's conversion. At any rate the extension of the gospel beyond the limits of the synagogue was, according to the statement of the Acts, the immediate consequence of his death, and not the planned work of the elder apostles. [Augustine said, "If Stephen had not prayed, the church would not have had Paul" (Si Steph. non orasset, ecclesia Paulum non habuisset). Archdeacon Farrar calls him the "undeveloped St. Paul."] Tradition did not forget Stephen. The Fathers put him among the seventy disciples. The Apocryphs of Stephen will be found in FABRICIUS: Cod. Apocr.

STEPHEN, the name of ten popes. — Stephen I. (233-257), a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relation to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. The majority of the churches in Asia Minor and Africa had declared in favor of the view that heretics baptized by heretics should be rebaptized on their entrance into the orthodox church. The Roman practice, however, had been to admit them without the repetition of the rite, and with a simple exhortation to repentance. The Eastern Church, and especially Cyprian, strongly opposed this practice; and the councils of Carthage (255, 256) again sanctioned the opposite view. A synodal letter informed Stephen of this action, and a heated epistolary controversy was opened between him and Cyprian. He finally broke off communion with the African Church. Tradition relates that Stephen suffered a martyr's death for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods. His day is Aug. 2. — Stephen II. ascended the Papal chair March 27, 752, but died a few days later; for which reason he is usually omitted from the list of popes. — Stephen III. (II.) was Pope from 752 to 757. Pushed by Aistulph, king of the Longobards, he called in the aid of Pepin the Little, who defeated the enemy in two campaigns (754, 755), and raised the Pope to the dignity of patricius, and possessor of the exarchate of Ravenna. Stephen anointed Pepin king. — Stephen IV. (III.), Pope from 768 to 772; had been made cardinal by Zacharias; condemned the Antipope Constantine, who was only a layman when chosen pope, and held a council in the Lateran in 769, which forbade, upon penalty of the ban, the election of a layman to the Papal dignity. — Stephen V. (IV.), Pope for a few months between 816 and 817, was a Roman by birth; had been made cardinal-deacon by Leo III., and crowned Louis the Pious emperor. — Stephen VI. (V.), Pope from 855 to 891; conducted negotiations with the Byzantine emperors, Basil and Leo, to restore peaceful relations between the Greek and Latin churches, which had been disturbed by Photius, and demanded that all the clergy consecrated by Photius should be deposed, and those deposed by him recalled. Leo satisfied the Pope. He crowned Duke Guido of Spoleto emperor before his death. — Stephen VII. (VI.), Pope for a few months (896-897); was completely under the influence of the Tuscan and Roman nobles; had the body of his predecessor and enemy exhumed, and thrown into the Tiber, and declared the episcopal and priestly consecration of Formosus invalid. Stephen was thrown into prison by his enemies, and strangled. John IX. condemned his conduct through a synod in Rome (898). — Stephen VIII. (VII.), Pope from 929 to 931; was under the control of the notorious women, Theodora and Marozia. — Stephen IX. (VIII.), Pope from 939 to 942; a German by birth and a relative of Otto the Great; was a creature and plaything of the contending parties. [See WATTENBORFF: Papst Stephan IX., Paderborn, 1883, 60 pp.] — Stephen X. (IX.), Pope for eight months (1057-58), was under Hildebrand's influence. As cardinal-deacon, appointed by Leo IX., he went with Cardinal Humbert to Constantinople in the interests of peace between that city and Rome. The mission was unsuccessful; and, returning to Rome, Stephen became monk, and later, abbot of Monte Casino. He opposed the licentiousness, especially the simony and concubinage, of the clergy. NEUDECKER.

STEPHEN DE VELLAVILLA, Dominican at Lyons; d. 1261. His greatest work, De septem donis Spiritus Sancti, of which manuscripts are found in France, England, and Spain, has been printed only so far as it relates to the Cathari and Waldenses. (See QUETIF and ECHARD: Scriptores ordinis predicatorum, i. pp. 190 sq.) In his youth he preached against the Cathari at Valence, and later became inquisitor. His account is one of the most reliable authorities on the heretics mentioned. C. SCHMIDT.

STEPHEN OF HUNGARY. See HUNGARY. STEPHEN OF TOURNAI, b. 1135, at Orleans; d. as Bishop of Tournai, in 1203; sought to secure a decree from Rome requiring greater uniformity of doctrinal teaching. His principal work is said to have been the Summa de decretis, of which only the preface remains. Two addresses and a number of letters are preserved. Best edition by Molinet, Paris, 1671.

STEPHENS (French, Estienne; Lat., Stephanus) is the name of a distinguished Parisian family of printers, which did most brilliant service in the interest of literature, and by their publications promoted the cause of the Reformation. They have a place here on account of their distinguished efforts in publishing theological works. — I. Henry, the first printer of this name, had an establishment of his own in Paris from 1503 to 1520. He was on friendly terms with some of the most learned men of the day, — Budé, Briçonnet, Le Fèvre d'Étaples, etc., — and had among his proof-readers Beatus Rhenanus. Among his publications were Le Fèvre's editions of Aristotle, the Psalterium quincuplex, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles. Henry left behind him three sons, — François, Robert, and Charles. François published a number of works between 1537 and 1548, which had no bearing upon theology. Charles studied medicine; wrote some works on natural history; in 1551 assumed control of the Paris printing-establishment, on Robert's departure to Geneva, and printed a number of works till 1561, using the title "royal typographer" (typographus regius). He published a number of smaller editions of Hebrew texts and targums, which were edited by J. Mercier.

H. Robert, the second son of Henry, and the founder of the splendid reputation which the name of Stephens still enjoys, was born, according to the usual opinion, in 1503; died in Geneva, Sept. 7, 1559. He early became acquainted with the ancient languages, and entered the printing-establishment of Simon de Colines, who married his mother upon his father's death. He corrected the edition of the Latin New Testament of 1523. This work was the first occasion of the endless charges and criminations of the clerical party, especially the theological faculty of the Sorbonne, against him. In 1526 he began to print on his own account. In 1550 he emigrated to Geneva to escape the ceaseless opposition of the clergy. In 1539 he assumed the title of "royal typographer," and adopted as his device an olive-branch around which a serpent was twined, and a man standing underneath an olive-tree, with grafts from which wild branches are falling to the ground, with the words of Rom. xi, 20, Noli altum sapere ("Be not high-minded"). The latter was called the Olive Stephanorum ("the olive of the Stephens family"). The Paris establishment was made famous by its numerous editions of grammatical works and other school-books among them many of Melancthon's, and old authors, as Dio Cassius, Eusebius, Cicero, Sallust, Caesar, Justin, etc. Many of these, especially the Greek editions, were famous for their typographical elegance. Twice he published the Hebrew Bible entire, — in 1539 in four volumes, and 1543 sqq. in seventeen parts. Both of these editions are rare. Of more importance are his four editions of the Greek New Testament (1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551), the last in Geneva. The first two are among the neatest Greek texts known, and are called Omirificæ; the third is a splendid masterpiece of typographical skill, and is known as the editio regia. The edition of 1551 contains the Latin translation of Erasmus and the Vulgate, is not nearly as fine as the other three, and is exceedingly rare. It was in this edition that the versicular division of the New Testament was for the first time introduced. Stephens is said to have made it on horseback, on his journey to Geneva. [See facsimile specimens of the last two editions, in Schaff's Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 536-539.] A number of editions of the Vulgate also appeared from his presses, of which the principal are those of 1528, 1532, 1540 (one of the ornaments of his press), 1546. The text of the Vulgate was in a wretched condition, and Stephens's editions, especially that of 1545, containing a new translation at the side of the Vulgate, was the subject of sharp and acrimonious criticism from the clergy. On his arrival at Geneva, he published a defence against the attacks of the Sorbonne. He issued the French Bible in 1533, and many of Calvin's writings; the finest edition of the Institution being that of 1553. His fine edition of the Latin Bible with glosses (1556) contained the translation of the Old Testament by Santes Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza's translation of the New Testament.

Three of Henry's sons — Henry, Robert, and François — became celebrated as printers. François (b. in 1510) printed on his own account in Geneva from 1562 to 1582, issuing a number of editions of the Bible in Latin and French. French writers identify him with a printer by the name of Estienne in Normandy, whither he is supposed to have emigrated in 1582. Robert (b. in 1530; d. in 1571) began to print in Paris on his own account in 1556, and in 1561 received the title of Imprimeur du Roy; and his presses were busily employed in issuing civil documents. His edition of the New Testament of 1568-69 (copies with both dates being in existence) was a reprint of his father's first edition, is equal to it in elegance of execution, and is now exceedingly rare.

III. Henry, the eldest son of the great Robert, and without doubt the most distinguished member of the family, was b. in Paris, 1528; d. at Lyons, March, 1598. He displayed in his youth a genuine enthusiasm for the study of Greek, which he learned before Latin. In his nineteenth year he undertook a protracted journey to Italy, England, and Flanders. In 1554 he published at Paris his first independent work, the Anacreon. Then he went again to Italy, helping the Aldens at Venice, discovered a copy of Diodorus Siculus at Rome, and returned to Geneva in 1555. In 1557 he seems to have had a printing-establishment of his own, and, in the spirit of our own day, advertised himself as the "Parisian printer" (typographus parisiensis). The following year he assumed the title, illustris viri Hudrici Fuggeri typographus, from his patron, Fugger of Augsburg. In 1559 Henry assumed charge of his father's presses, and distinguished himself as the publisher, and also as the editor and collator, of manuscripts. Many of his editions were the first. Athenagoras, Maximus Tyrius, Æschylus, appeared in 1557; Diodorus Siculus, 1559; Xenophon, 1561, 1581; Thucydides, 1564, 1588; Sophocles, 1568; Herodotus, 1570, 1592, etc. He improved old translations, or made new Latin translations, of many Greek authors. According to the writer of the article "Estienne," in La France Protestante, Henry took a personal part in editing fifty-four publications. His most celebrated work, the Thesaurus linguae græcæ, which has served in our own century as the basis of Greek lexicography, appeared in 1572, 5 vols. Of the Greek editions of the New Testament that went forth from his presses, there deserve mention those of Beza, with his commentary, 1565, 1582, 1589, and the smaller editions of 1565, 1567, 1580. A triglot containing the Peshito appeared in 1569, of which some copies are in existence, bearing the date "Lyons, 1571." In 1565 a large French Bible was printed. Henry's own editions of the Greek New Testament of 1576 and 1587 deserve mention; the former containing the first scientific treatise of the language of the apostolic writers; the latter, a discussion of the ancient divisions of the text. In 1591 he published a concordance of the New Testament, the preparatory studies of which his father had made. Much earlier he translated Calvin's Catechism into Greek. It was printed in 1551 in his father's printing-room.

Henry was married three times, and had fourteen children, of whom three survived him. His son Paul (b. 1567), of whose life little is known, assumed control of the presses, which in 1626 were sold to the Chouet brothers. Two of Paul's sons were printers, — Joseph at La Rochelle, and Antoine (d. 1674), who became Imprimeur du Roy in Paris in 1613. Fronton Le Duc's Chrysostom, and Jean Morin's Greek Bible (1628, 3 vols.) were issued from his presses. At his death the history of the family stops.

ED. REISS.

STERCORANISTS (from the Latin stercora, "excrements"), a term first used in 1651, by Cardinal Humbert against Nicetas Petrotatus, and referring to a grossly sensualistic conception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to which the body of our Lord is eaten, digested, and evacuated, like any other food. The conception has been falsely ascribed to Origen, and also to Rhabanus Maurus; but it no doubt existed in the time of the latter.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, b. probably at Hayfield, near Blakeney, Gloucestershire, or, according to another account, in Hampshire, about 1500; d. August, 1519; was groom of the chambers to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He is said to have versified fifty-one psalms, of which nineteen appeared 1518, and thirty-seven the next year, immediately after his death. The work was continued by John Hopkins of the Woodend, Ayr, Gloucestershire (B. A., Oxford, 1511; said to have held a living in Suffolk). The Whole Booke of Psalmes Collected into English Metre appeared 1562, and was bound up with innumerable editions of the Prayer-Book; making for two centuries or more the only or chief metrical provision of the Church of England. Since 1700 or so, it has been called the "Old Version," in distinction from its rival, Tate and Brady. Of its contents about forty-one psalms bear the initials of Sternhold (the only notable sample of his skill being a few stanzas of Ps. xviii.), and sixty-four, those of Hopkins. The rest are by Thomas Norton, a lawyer who translated Calvin's Institutes, etc., and d. about 1600; William Whittingham, b. at Chester, 1521; d. 1589; educated at Oxford; married Calvin's sister, and was from 1563 dean of Durham; and William Kethe, who was an exile with Knox at Geneva 1555, chaplain to the English forces at Havre 1563, and afterwards rector or vicar of Okeford in Dorsetshire. Some mention also Hedwige, archdeacon of Ely. Kethe is memorable as the author of the only rendering now much used of all these, "All people that on earth do dwell" (Ps. c.). It has a venerable solidity and quaintness. The Old Version as a whole has long been heaped with ridicule from many quarters, and is, of course, unsuited to modern use. Fuller (1662) said that its authors' "piety was better than their poetry, and they had drunk more of Jordan than of Helicon;" and Campbell, that they, "with the best intentions and the worst taste, degraded the spirit of Hebrew psalmody by flat and homely phraseology, and, mistaking vulgarity for simplicity, turned into bathos what they found sublime." But Keble and others have valued their work for its fidelity to the original, and it continued to be used in very many English parishes far into the present century.

F. M. BIRD.

STERRY, Peter, B.D., Puritan; b. in Surrey; d. Nov. 19, 1672. In 1636 he was chosen fellow of Emmanuel's College, Cambridge, where he had been educated. He was one of Cromwell's chaplains, one of the fourteen divines proposed by the Lords in May, 1642, and sat as an independent in the Westminster Assembly almost from the first. His works are of great rarity. He was called in his day a "high-down mystical divine," and suffered abuse; but Dr. Stoughton finds his mysticism "pertaining more to his imaginative forms of conception and modes of expression than to anything else. His doctrines of conversion and of religious life, of Christian experience, duty, and hope, are of the usual evangelical type; but his ideas are ever dressed in mystical phraseology. He quotes texts of Scripture in abundance, and then commonly runs into some strain of allegorical interpretation." Among his works may be mentioned The clouds in which Christ comes, London, 1643; three Parliament sermons, — The Spirit's conviction of sin (Fast-Day sermon), 1645; The coming forth of Christ in the power of his death (delivered Thursday, Nov. 1, 1645), 1650; The Way of God with his people in these nations (Thursday, Nov. 5, 1656), 1657. — Englands deliverance from the Northern Prejudice, compared with its deliverance from the Roman Papacy; or a Thanksgiving sermon on Jer. xxi. 14, 5., 1652; Discourse on the freedom of the will, 1675; The rise, race, and rapidity of the kingdom of God in the soul of man (sermons), together with an account of the state of a saint's soul and body in death, 1683; The appearance of God to man in the gospel and the gospel change (sermons), to which is added an explication of the Trinity, and a short catechism, 1710. See J. STORCHON: Religion in England, iv. pp. 318–350; Di XIER: Congregationalism in Literature, pp. 618 and 652.

STEUDEL, Johann Christian Friedrich, professor of theology at Tübingen, and the last representative of the elder Tübingen school of theology; was b. at Esslingen in Württemberg, Oct. 25, 1779; d. in Tübingen, Oct. 21, 1837. He studied at the Tübingen seminary; became vicar at Oberesdingen; in 1806 rector at Tübingen; in 1808 went to Paris, where he spent eighteen months in the study of Persian; returning to Germany, was pastor in Caustatt and Tübingen, and became professor of theology at Tübingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. His Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament were edited by Oehler after his death (Berlin, 1810). He wrote a number of articles for periodicals. He was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter. He attacked Strauss's Life of Christ, a few weeks after the appearance of vol. i., in a little tract (1835), which stirred up the wrath of Strauss to appear in the polemic, Herr Dr. Steudel oder d. Selbsttäuschungen des verstandigen Supernaturalismus unserer Tage. See the full article on Steudel by Oehler (this son in law), in Hitzcock's Encyclopædie, first edition, vol. xv. pp. 75–81.

He once began a prayer with this unique sentence: "O Du, der du den die menschliche Geschlecht beglückende Heiligen verkündigenden Jesum in die Welt gesandt hast!"

STEWART, church-officer among the Methodists, whose duties are similar to those of deacons in the Presbyterian and Reformed churches, relating, generally speaking, to the care of the sick and of the moneys of the church. STEWART, Dugald, Professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; was b. in Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1753. He was the son of the professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. The boy spent his winters in Edinburgh, his summers in Catrine, Ayrshire, where his father had a house. Dugald Stewart was educated at the high school of Edinburgh and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. From 1765 to 1769 he was a student in Edinburgh University, and was greatly influenced by Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy, whose successor he became. He was a student in Glasgow University in 1771-72, and there came under the influence of Thomas Reid, professor of moral philosophy, whose teaching completely swayed his philosophic thought throughout his after-career. When Dugald Stewart returned to Edinburgh, he began immediately his course as a public teacher in the university, on account of his father requiring his assistance with the duties of the chair of mathematics. He continued assistant from 1772, and was elected professor, in succession to his father, in 1775. In 1778 he lectured for Adam Ferguson while the latter was acting as secretary to the commission sent to America to negotiate as to pending disputes. The chair of moral philosophy was the one for which Dugald Stewart was eminently qualified; and to that chair he was elected on the resignation of Ferguson, in 1785, holding it till 1820, though during the last ten years of this period the duties of the chair were performed by Thomas Brown, who had been appointed his colleague in 1810, and who died before Stewart. After Brown's death, Stewart resigned the chair, and John Wilson ("Christopher North") was elected. Dugald Stewart was the strenuous supporter, and elegant expounder, of Reid's philosophy, known as the "Scotch philosophy" and "the philosophy of common sense;" being a defence of the certainty of human knowledge and belief against the scepticism of Hume. For an exposition of the philosophy of common sense, see article on Thomas Reid. Stewart's contributions to philosophic literature are numerous. His collected works, edited by Hamilton, were published in Edinburgh and Boston, in eleven octavo volumes. His Outlines of Moral Philosophy, first published in 1793, containing a sketch of psychology and ethics, was long in circulation as a handbook for beginners in ethical science. An edition of it was prepared by Dr. McCosh of Princeton. Besides this, his works are the following: Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy (first published in Encyclopædia Britannica); Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, of which an edition was published in Boston; Philosophical Essays: Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers; and Lectures on Political Economy. As a professor he was very highly esteemed by his students. Lord Cockburn, who writes enthusiastically of him as a teacher, describes his lecturing as "gentlemanlike, calm, and expository." On account of his careful treatment of political science, along with moral philosophy, he attracted from England many who were destined for political life, including Lord Brougham, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell. Many who afterwards rose to eminence in public life acknowledged special indebtedness to him. The shrewd, sagacious, but somewhat cumbrous argumentation of Reid was thrown into a pleasing and attractive form by Stewart, through whose clearness of logic, literary taste, and power of eloquence, it secured a greatly extended influence. These two were the representatives of a philosophy which has largely governed the philosophic thought of Scotland since, and for a time exercised considerable influence in France through the teaching of Cousin and Jouffroy. Stewart, like Reid, was hesitating and unsatisfactory in his mode of stating the evidence for personal existence, making it matter of belief, rather than of direct knowledge. Thus he says, "We cannot properly be said to be conscious of our own existence; our knowledge of this fact being necessarily posterior, in the order of time, to the consciousness of those sensations by which it is suggested." In this way, he spoke of the knowledge of self rather as an acquired notion than as a fact of present consciousness. Stewart treated, with special fullness, of "conception" as a power of mind by which we are able to represent past sensations and perceptions. In his treatment of this subject his analysis was so careful as to recognize dependence on physical organism for this mental representation, in strict harmony with more recent physiological teaching. As the follower and expounder of Reid, Stewart was the resolute opponent of the theory that all knowledge comes from experience; maintaining, on the contrary, that intelligence itself is the source of all that is fundamental to intelligent procedure in dealing with the confused mass of our sensations and perceptions. Like Reid, he devoted special attention to the doctrine of external perception; making it his special aim to ascertain the amount of direct and certain knowledge we have of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and in the midst of general regret, Dugald Stewart withdrew from active professional duty in 1810, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement at Kinneil House, Linlithgowshire, a residence placed at his command by the Duke of Hamilton. He died in Edinburgh, when visiting a friend, on the 11th of June, 1829. His body lies in a covered and completely enclosed massive tomb in the lower portion of the Canonage Burying-ground, Edinburgh, the same cemetery in which is the grave of Adam Smith, professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, and author of the Wealth of Nations. So profound and widespread was the admiration of Dugald Stewart, that, shortly after his death, a meeting was held in Edinburgh at which it was resolved to erect a monument to his memory. The result was the classic monument now standing on the Calton hill in the Scotch metropolis.

STICHOMETRY. The data of stichometry consist chiefly of subscriptions at the close of manuscripts, expressing the number of lines which are contained in the book that has been copied; of marginal annotations from point to point, expressing the extent of the previous text; or of quotations and allusions which are found in various writers, which indicate either the locality of some passage in a quoted work, or the compass of the whole or part of the works of a given author. For example, at the close of Isocrates, Basiris, in Codex U'rbinas, we have in the Archaic character the number 390; while on the margin of the same work, in the more recent character, we have on fol. 22', 10 (§ 25), before τοῖτων αἰτίαι, the number 2 (B); and on 25', 12 (§ 39), before χρηστάς ἡ τους, the number 3 (Γ); and these numbers represent the second and third hundreds of lines measured on some exemplar, either actual or ideal; Diogenes Laertius quotes a passage from Chrysippus, κατὰ τους χίλιους στίχους; and Galen estimates the extent of a certain portion of the works of Hippocrates at two hundred and forty verses; τοῖτων τοῦ βιβλίου τὸ μὲν κατὰ τὸ ἐν γράμμα μέτρος τὸ πρῶτον εἰς ἑπὶ στίχους ἐξήκει (Galen, in Hippokratem de nat. hom., xv. p. 9).

Full collections of such data may be found in Ritschl: Opusc. Philol., vol. i. pp. 71 seq.; and Birt: Das Antike Buchwesen, c. 4.

Every thing in these data suggests that the numeration has reference to standard lines or copies; and since the actual number of lines in the manuscripts never tallies with the stichometric record, and we are unable to point to any copies which do furnish an agreement, it is evident that there is somewhere a common unit of measurement upon which these subscriptions and quotations are based: in other words, the στίχος must have an element of fixity in it, even if it be not absolutely fixed.

It is important, therefore, to determine in what direction the meaning of στίχος deflects from its normal indefinite sense of line, row, and verse.

The term στίχος is of itself extremely vague. It may be nothing more than row or line; as, e.g., the LXX. use it for the rows of stones in the high priest's breastplate; or, in a military sense, it may represent the number of men in a rank or file of soldiers, especially the latter; and so in other cases. But in literature it is easy to demonstrate that the στίχος is deflected in meaning in the direction of a hexameter line. In the first place, such a unit is convenient for the comparison of prose-works with poetry; in the next place, we have actual instances of prose-passages reduced to their equivalent verse-lengths; in the third place, we may actually find the term στίχος used of hexameter poetry, in distinction from any other; and, finally, we may actually divide any given work into hexameter rhythms, and compare our results with the transmitted numerical data. If we take these points in order, we may say that the prose-unit is more likely to be taken from poetry than the unit of measurement for poetry is likely to be adopted from prose; for the line of poetry is already measured in a sensibly constant unit, and no reason exists for a change of that unit. The only question that would arise here is whether we ought not to expect a variety of units of measurement; as, for instance, an iambic unit in distinction from a hexameter unit. It is sufficient to observe at this point, that such varieties of measurement, if they exist, are extremely rare.

In regard to the actual reduction of a prose-passage to its equivalent verse-length, we have an important case in Galen (v. 655, ed. Kuhn), where, having quoted a sentence from Hippocrates, he continues:—

εἰς μὲν οὖτος ὁ λόγος ἐνέει καὶ τριάντα στίχων ἴσως ἴσως θύον καὶ ἡμισὺ ἴσως ἑξαμέτρων κτλ.

If Galen then reckons thirty-nine syllables as being equivalent to two hexameters and a half, or, as he continues, eighty-two syllables to five hexameters, the hexameter can hardly be different from a sixteen-syllabled rhythm. We are invited, therefore, to the assumption that stichometric measurement is made by preference in syllables of which sixteen go to the hexameter, or unit-verse. The number 16 invites attention as being the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad, and as being a square number, a peculiarity which always had a certain attractiveness for early calculators.

That the term στίχος deflects in the direction of hexameter verse as against any other line of poetry which might have been chosen for a proper unit of measurement, will appear from Montfaucou (Bibl. Coislin, p. 597), where there is quoted from a tenth-century manuscript the following catalogue of poets:—

*περί ποιητῶν
ἔσσι διὰ στίχων καὶ ἡμιζών ἱδρασαν.
Ὀμηρος στίχους, Ἀπολλώνιος στίχους, Θεοκρίτος ἡμίους, Ἄρατος ἡμίους, Νικάνθρως ἡμίους, Μετακρίτος ἡμιζώνος κτλ.*

This broad division of poets into writers by στίχοι and writers of iambics can only have resulted from a specialization of the meaning of the term στίχος by constant use in a particular sense.

In the demonstration of the same point by actual measurement, the most important researches are those published by the late Ch. Graux, in the Revue de Philologie, April, 1878, in which he demonstrated, by an actual estimation of the number of letters in certain works, that the στίχος represented not a clause, nor a number of words, but a fixed quantity of writing. The average number of letters to the verse he found to vary between narrow limits, generally thirty-four to thirty-eight letters; and an enumeration of the letters in fifty lines of the Iliad opened at random supplied him with an average of 37.7 letters to the verse. This very important identification of the στίχος with the hexameter is the starting-point for a great many new critical investigations as to the integrity of transmitted texts, their early form, etc. Whether the unit of measurement is a certain number of syllables, or a certain number of letters, is not easy to decide. We may be tolerably certain that the measured line is, as above stated, a space-line, and not a sense-line; but to discriminate between a letter line and a syllable-line is a more delicate matter. If we adopt the former, we must probably fix the unit at thirty-six letters, because this is the nearest symmetrical number to the average hexameter. We have very few instances, however, in which the actual letters of a line are found to be numbered; while we can readily trace the custom of limiting a line by the division of the syllables, in the earliest manuscripts. Moreover, we have the actual measurement in the passage quoted from Galen; and Pliny seems to allude to the custom of syllable-counting, when, in one of his epis-ties, he demands an equally long reply from his correspondent, and threatens to count, not only the pages, but the verses on the page, and the syllables of each verse ("Ego non paginas tantum, sed versus etiam syllabasque numerabo."—Pliny, iv. 11). The preference must, therefore, be given to the syllable-line, though, perhaps, not entirely to the exclusion of the other. It is comparatively easy to count the compass of a book in sixteen-syllable rhythms, but a toilsome enough process to estimate with equal accuracy the number of thirty-six-letter lines.

It is interesting to compare the relative sizes of the two line-units. M. Graux deduces 37.7 as the average hexameter in letters, and Diels (Hermes, xvii. Bd.) makes the average of the first fifty lines in Homer to be 15.6 syllables. A verse of sixteen syllables is then equivalent to about 1.074 verses of thirty-six letters each. In precisely the same way as M. Graux determined the average number of letters to the verse from the total stichometry, in the manuscripts of Herodotus, Demosthenes, Eusebius, Gregory of Nazianzus, etc., we may proceed to examine the partial stichometry. This has been done for Iocates by Fuhr (Rhein. Mus., Bd. 37, p. 468); for the Plato manuscripts, by Schanz (Hermes, xvi. p. 309); and for the Demosthenes manuscripts, by W. v. Christ, in a very able discussion entitled Die Atticusausgabe des Demosthenes, München, 1882. The partial stichometry is of the highest value for the study of texts; and in every case the data which it supplies are found to accord very closely with our fundamental statements as to the paleographical meaning of the word στίχον.

Some degree of confusion is introduced by the existence, apparently, in early times, of an alternative iambic verse of twelve syllables, as well as by the introduction of writing by cola and commata. The latter of these points has been an especial ground of combat, in consequence of the countenance which the custom seemed to lend to the theory of sense-lines in opposition to space-lines. The explanation of the matter seems to be as follows: when the earlier uncial form of writing was deserted for one more convenient for purposes of reading and recitation, the text was broken up into short sentences, named, according to their lengths, cola and commata; and in some instances an attempt was made, not only to number these cola, so as to form a colometry similar to stichometry, and sharing the advantages which it offered for reference and book-measuring, but even to accommodate the arrangement of these cola so as to reproduce the original number of verses. Thus we find the rhetorician Castor (Witz. Rhét. Græc., iii. 721) discussing the pseudocorruption of Demosthenes against Philip as follows: τούτοις τὸν λόγον ἐστὶν ἐνὶ κατὰ καλὸν κατιστάθηται τὸς ἐπὶ τῆς ποσότητος τὰς καὶ κατὰ τὸν ἀριθμὸν τὸν ἐκκελευσέναι ἐν τοῖς ἀρχαίοις βιβλίοις, ὡς ἐκτελεσθῆναι αὐτοῦ ὁ Δημοσθένης τὸν ἰδίον λόγον. It seems also that this change of form took place first for those books which were publicly recited, or which had a semi-poetical structure; so that the oldest Bible manuscripts desert the continuous uncial writing in the Psalms, in Job, the Proverbs, Canticles, etc.; and St. Jerome proposed to imitate this peculiarly divided text in the prophets: "Sed quod in Demosthenæ et Tullio solet fieri, ut per cola scribantur et dices:—

commata, qui utique prosa et non versibus conscribuntur, . . . nos quoque utilitati legentium providentes, interpretationem novam nobis scribendi genere distinguimus" (preface to Isaiah).

We shall now turn to the stichometry of the New Testament, and in particular to the Epistles: here we shall show that the theory already advanced is completely confirmed, and that we have a very powerful critical implement for the restoration of early New-Testament texts in the traditional data. As before, we have both total and partial stichometry. There is, however, a good deal of variation between the transmitted data, arising from various causes, such as variation in the text, variation in the unit employed in the measurement, difference in versions measured, and difference in the abbreviations employed. The greatest authority, however, for New-Testament stichometry, is found in the work of Euthalius, edited by Zacagni, Collect. Mon. Antiq. Eccles. Græc., Rome, 1698; Migne, Patrol. Græc., tom. 85. Euthalius was a deacon of the Church of Alexandria, and afterwards bishop of Sulca, supposed to be a small city in Upper Egypt. He has frequently but erroneously been credited with the introduction of stichometry to the New Testament, and these verses which he measured have been by many persons identified with the colon-writing previously described. There is very little ground for any such ideas; and we shall find that the στίχοι mentioned by Euthalius are hexameters of sixteen syllables, a very slight allowance being made for certain common abbreviations. The work of Euthalius consisted in editing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, with a complete system of prologues, prefaces, and quotations: every book was divided into lections, and to every lection, as well as to the greater part of the prefaces, was appended its numerical extent. The verses were also marked on the margin from fifty to fifty. We have thus a mine of stichometric information sufficient to test any theory in the closest manner. Moreover, the work has this importance, that Euthalius professes to have measured his verses accurately, and to have employed the best manuscripts; viz., those preserved in the Pamphilian Library at Caesarea. It thus appears that we have the right to set a high value on the measurements made, on the ground of antiquity as well as of accuracy.

We shall now test these results given by Euthalius for the lections of the Acts of the Apostles; and, taking no account of the abbreviations which might have been found in the text, we shall divide the text of the Acts in Westcott and Hort's New Testament into sixteen-syllable rhythms. If we had allowed for abbreviation, the results would have been somewhat less, as we might subtract a syllable at every occurrence of the words οὐδὲ and καὶ, and two syllables for each occurrence of ἡμεῖς and αὐτοί, with perhaps a few other rarely recurring words, as πατήρ, ἀγαπῶς. Our data for Euthalius are taken from Cod. Escorial, v. iii. 6, as there are some errors in Zacagni's figures.

Allowing for one or two obvious corruptions, such as the dropping of the figure ρ in lection 6, the agreement is very complete.

The lines of the following table are nearly hexameters, so that the table affords a picture of the arrangement of an early bicolumnar Codex:—

Lesson.	Beginn.	Cod. Esc.	Westcott and Hort.
2	1.15	50	50
3	2.1	100	111
4	3.1	136	145
5	4.32	190	121
6	6.1	88	190
7	8.1 (cyvera)	92	94
8	9.1	75	77
9	9.23	216	210
10	11.27	283	272
11	15.1	193	201
12	17.1	164	161
13	19.1	231	242
14	21.15	233	307
16	27.1	198	192

Still more remarkable is the harmony between the measured text of Westcott and Hort and the Euthalian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the results for the Epistles in a form suitable for comparison. The first column represents the stichometric number supplied by Euthalius and the best manuscripts; the second gives the result of the actual subdivision of the text of Westcott and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses; and the third expresses the same result with the proper deduction made for four leading abbreviations.

James	237 or 242	240	237
1 Peter	236 or 242	245	210
2 Peter	151	162	158
1 John	274	268	262
2 John	30	31	30
3 John	32	31	31
Jude	68	70	68
Romans	920	912	919
1 Corinthians	870	897	874
2 Corinthians	590	610	595
Galatians	293	304	296
Ephesians	312	325	314
Philippians	298	218	290
Colossians	208	215	209
1 Thessalonians	191	192	191
2 Thessalonians	106	112	105
Hebrews	703	714	705
1 Timothy	240	239	231
2 Timothy	172	177	170
Titus	97	98	97
Philemon	38	42	40

The agreement between the first and third columns is very complete and decisive as a test of the hypothesis proposed with regard to the nature of the Euthalian στίχοι.

In the Gospels the data may be handled in a similar manner; but the difficulties arising from variety of text, etc., are great; moreover, many manuscripts transmit not only the number of verses, but also another number corresponding to the ῥήματα of the separate books. We have from a large group of cursive manuscripts the following numbers for the four Gospels:—

	Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.	John.
ῥήματα	2524	1675	3803	1958
στίχοι	2590	1616	2710	2021

From this it appears that the number of ῥήματα is sometimes in excess, and sometimes in defect, of the number of verses. What these ῥήματα are is a hard question. Some persons have identified them with the στίχοι,—a supposition that will scarcely bear scrutiny. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the verses of the Gospels are measured by the same unit as we found employed in the Acts and Epistles. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,025 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,021). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

STIEFEL (STIFEL), Michael, a distinguished arithmetician of the Reformation; was b. at Esslingen, April 19, 1186; entered the Augustinian convent there, left it for Wittenberg in 1520; stood on friendly terms with Luther; after holding several pastorates, was appointed in 1558 professor of mathematics at Jena, with a salary of forty florins (afterwards increased to sixty florins); d. in Jena, April 19, 1567. In 1532 he published Ein Rechenbuchlein vom End Christi, in which, upon the basis of the figures in Daniel, he set the day of judgment at eight o'clock in the morning of Oct. 19, 1533. His mathematical studies and works (Rechenbuch vom d. weichen und deutschen Practick, 1516, etc.) did much to promote the study of mathematics in Germany. Luther called Stiefel a "pious, learned, moral, and industrious man." C. SCHWARZ.

STIEKNA (or DESTEKEN), Conrad, also called Conradus ab Austria, one of the forerunners of John Hus; d. at Prague, 1399. Balbinus speaks of him as preacher in the Tein church, Prague. He zealously condemned the hypocrisy, simony, and licentiousness of the priests, which he described in dark colors. In his larger work, Actonatus Mendacium, he attacked with great heat the orders of begging friars, and did not spare the bishops. STIER, Rudolf Ewald, a distinguished German exegete; was b. at Franstadt, March 17, 1800; d. at Eisleben, Dec. 16, 1862. Set apart for the study of law, he entered the university of Jena in 1815, but the year following enrolled himself among the students of theology. His ideals at that time were Jahn and Jean Paul, with the latter of whom he carried on a correspondence. In 1818 he went to Halle, where he was chosen president of the Halle Burschenschaft. It was not till 1819 that he truly gave himself up to Christ, and began the study of theology from the proper motive. The occasion of this change was the death of a young lady whom he loved. He then went to Berlin, and after completing his studies, successively held the position of teacher at Wittenberg, Karlsruhe, and in the missionary institute of Basel. In 1829 he became pastor at Frankleben. The writer of this, at an inn, got the following answer to a question about Stier: "He is a mystic." On asking what that meant, he received the reply, "They are the preachers who live as they preach." In 1838 Stier was called to Wichlinghausen in the Wupperthal, from which he retired in 1846, and passed three years in literary activity at Wittenberg. He was then appointed superintendent at Schkeuditz, and in 1859 at Eisleben. If any theologian has had to learn the "theology of the cross" by bodily pains, it was Stier. He was married to the sister of the distinguished theologian Nitzsch. Stier's principal works are in the department of biblical exegesis. He was interested in the German translation of the Bible; wrote Altes u. Neues in deutscher Bibel, Basel, 1828, and Darf Luther's Bibel unberichtigt bleiben?, Halle, 1836; was associated with Von Meyer in the last edition of his translation, 1842, and prepared an edition of his own in 1856 (Bielefeld), in which many changes were introduced. His principal work was the Words of the Lord Jesus (Reden d. Herrn), 1st ed., 1843, 3 vols., [3d ed. 1865-74, 7 vols.; Eng. trans. by Pope, Edinb., 9 vols.; revised by Drs. Strong and H. B. Smith, N.Y., 1869, 3 vols.]. It is a storehouse of information and practical suggestion for ministers, among whom it has had a wide circulation. Stier bases his exegesis upon a firm faith in inspiration, and is dogmatic and mystical rather than historic and critical. I wrote to him, "You are a Christian cabalist;" to which he replied, "You are a pietistic rationalist." The Words of the Lord Jesus, like all his works, lacks in conciseness and point. Among his other exegetical writings are, Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen, 1831-36; [Jesus nicht Pseudo-Isaius, 1851]; D. Reden d. Apostel, trans. by Venables (The Words of the Apostles), Edinb., 1839; D. Reden d. Engel, 1860, Eng. trans., The Words of Angels, Lond., 1862]. Among Stier's other writings are a treatise on homiletics, Grundriss d. Keryktik, 1830, 2d ed., 1841; Formenlehre d. hebräischen Sprache, 1833, Berlin, 1849; Luther's Katechismus, etc., 6th ed., 1855. STIGMATIZATION (from the Greek στίγμα "a mark") denotes a spontaneous formation of wounds closely resembling those our Lord received by being crowned with thorns, crucified, and pierced with a spear. The first instance of such stigmatization is that of St. Francis of Assisi, who, in 1224, two years before his death, saw the crucified Saviour in a vision, and, when he awakened from the trance, found himself marked on hands and feet with the marks of crucifixion. Thomas of Celano, Bonaventura, Alexander IV., and many others testified as eye-witnesses to the truth of the statement. Only the Dominicans would not believe it. In Castile and Leon they openly denied the fact; a bishop of Oñate forbade to sell in his diocese representations of St. Francis with the stigmata; and a Dominican monk, Evechard of Oppau in Moravia, protested that the whole story was a product of the egotism and deceitfulness of the Franciscans. Later on, stigmatization became not so very rare in the Roman-Catholic Church. The last who was canonized on that account was the Capuchin nun Veronica Giuliani (d. at Citta di Castello in 1727); the canonization took place in 1831. But several pretended instances have occurred in the present century. Maria of Mörk, living at Kaltern, in the southern part of Tyrol, received the stigmata on her hands and feet in 1833, when she was twenty-two years old. She was visited by more than forty thousand people before she retired into the Franciscan nunnery at Kaltern. [Even the Protestant Church can boast of instances of stigmatization. In 1820 a pious maiden in Saxony received the stigmata under great sufferings, fell into a deathlike state on Good Friday, but began to recover on Easter morning. The most recent case in the Roman-Catholic Church is the Belgian Louise Lateau, who in 1873 attracted great attention by her flowing wounds. Thousands came to see her, but suspicion was aroused by the air of secrecy which surrounded her. She was closely watched, and the priests refused to allow her to be examined by surgeons. The excitement soon passed away; and she died (æt. 32), scarcely noticed, in August, 1883. It is noteworthy that stigmatization occurred on a man in only one case, and that the women thus signalized were sickly and hysterical. Leaving out of account the element of fraud, it may be said that "stigmatic neuropathy" is a pathological condition of occasional occurrence, explicable by physical and mental conditions. Therefore, while freely admitting the fact, one must not lay any stress upon it. It is no more a sign of divine favor than the shattered constitution and disordered brain which produce it.] See MALAN: *Histoire de S. STILES, Ezra, D.D., LL.D., Congregational; b. at North Haven, Conn., Dec. 15, 1727; d. in New Haven, May 12, 1795. He was graduated at Yale College, 1746; tutor there, 1749 to 1755; studied theology, then called to the bar, 1753, but began preaching in 1755; was pastor in Newport, R.I., from 1755 to May, 1777, when the place was occupied by the British, and the congregation dispersed. In September, 1777, he was elected president of Yale College, and shortly after professor of ecclesiastical history, and in 1780 professor of divinity. He published An Account of the Settlement of Bristol, R.I., Providence, 1785; History of three of the Judges of King Charles I., Major-Gen. Wallley, Major-Gen. Goffe, and Col. Dixwell, . . . with an Account of Mr. Theophilus Wade of Narragansett, supposed to have been one of the Judges, Hartford, 1794. He left an unfinished Church History of New England, and more than forty volumes of manuscripts. See his life by ABEL HOLMES, Boston, 1798, and by JAMES L. KINGSLEY, in SPARKS'S American Biography, 2d ser., vol. vi.

STILLING, a famous German writer, whose proper name was Johann Heinrich Jung; b. at Grund in Nassau-Siegen, Sept. 12, 1740; d. at Carlsruhe, April 2, 1817; a mystic and a theosophist, but childlike and pure-minded, with a ready and energetic sympathy for the actual sufferings around him, which, more than his apocryptic visions, made him one of the most popular devotional writers of Germany. His parents were exceedingly poor; and while a young man he taught school two days a week, and tailored four, harassed by the anguish of poverty, and fired by the enthusiasm for studies. He learned mathematics, Latin, Greek, and even Hebrew. A Roman-Catholic priest confided to him a secret means by which to cure certain eye-diseases, and this circumstance changed his destiny. An audacious but successful cure made him acquainted with a well-to-do gentleman, whose daughter he afterwards married; and in 1771 he went to Strassburg to study medicine. He there obtained something of a scientific training, and became doctor medicinae; but it was of still greater consequence to him, that he there became acquainted with Goethe and Herder, and elevated above the level of a somewhat narrow and barren pietism. He settled first at Elberfeld as an eye-physician; and there he published, by the aid of Goethe, his H. Stilling's Jugend, which by its wonderful blending of poesy and fact, of fiction and truth, at once established him as a writer of rank. But he had a genius for getting into debt; and for many years his time and labor were divided between managing creditors, curing poor people's eyes, and writing devotional books which were the consolation and admiration of the German people. In 1778 he was made professor of political economy in the academy of Kaiserslautern, whence he removed, in the same quality, to Heidelberg in 1782, and to Marburg in 1787. But it was not until 1805 that he, by being appointed privy-councillor to the grand duke of Baden, was liberated from drudgery and pecuniary troubles, and allowed to follow his genius as an eye-physician and a devotional writer. He was three times married, and every time happily. When he grew older, his house, though ever so singularly managed, became a centre towards which every thing grand, or noble, or suffering, tended, while every thing base or hard crept skulking away. The most successful of his writings were his mystical tales, a kind of romances at which both Lavater and Jacobi tried their powers, and which had a peculiar charm for that time: Geschichte des Herrn von Morpethau (The Life of Sir Morninglow), Theodore von den Linden, Florentin von Fahlenburg, etc. The greatest literary value have his autobiographical writings: Jugend, Jugendjahre, Wanderschaft, and Lehrjahre. His chief theological works are,

Siegesgeschichte, an exposition of the Revelation, and Geisterkunde, partially based on Swedenborg. STILLINGFLEET, Edward, b. at Cranborne in Dorsetshire, April 17, 1635; d. at Westminster, March 27, 1699. He was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1653. Just after the Restoration, he published his Irenicum, a weapon salve for the Churches wounds (1661), a moderate and healing treatise, very appropriate in that age of fierce ecclesiastical strife, and reflecting honor on the courage and catholicity of the author at that particular crisis. The following year appeared his Origines Sacrae, or Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures. In this work he criticised the history and chronology of heathen writers, undermining their credibility, and contrasting them with the authors of the Bible records. He dwelt upon the knowledge, fidelity, and integrity of Moses, and the inspiration of the prophets, as inferred from the fulfilment of their prophecies. Afterwards he treated of the being of God, the origin of the universe, the nations of mankind, and Pagan mythology; and it is interesting to find that he appears in harmony with modern geologists, by maintaining, not the universality, but the partial extent, of the Deluge. Of course, in many points, the work is superseded by later productions; yet it remains a storehouse of learning, and displays much logical ability and lawyer-like habits of thought. This volume was followed, in 1665, by A Rational account of the grounds of the Protestant Religion, a timely publication, when Popery was favored by the court and by personages in the upper circles. Other attacks upon Romanism, from the same pen, were made in publications we have not room to specify; it is sufficient to say that Stillingfleet was perhaps the most learned and effective champion of Protestantism just before the Revolution. The Mischief of Separation, a sermon which he preached in 1680, and which was immediately published, gave unmistakable proof that he had abandoned the moderate opinions, and dropped the conciliatory temper, expressed in his Irenicum. This brought on him answers in the way of defence, written by Owen, Baxter, and other nonconformists. But he candidly acknowledged his mistake, being perfectly subdued by what John Howe wrote on the subject, "more like a gentleman," he said, "than a divine, without any mixture of rancor." In 1695 a violent dispute went on amongst certain nonconformists, respecting Antinomianism, and some of the disputants appealed to Stillingfleet as a sort of arbitrator, a circumstance which showed that by this time he had recovered his reputation as a healer of strife. An active mind like his would meddle in all sorts of questions, and he could not refrain from taking part in the great doctrinal controversy of the age. A Discourse in Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Stillingleet, was published in 1697. He was a metaphysician, as well as a divine, and criticised Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding the same year, following that up soon afterwards by a rejoinder to Locke's reply. He wrote also on other subjects, and gave "the best account," says Bishop Nicolson, "of the present state of our tithes." A collected edition of this author's works, with his life and character, was published after his death in 1699.

As bishop of Worcester, which he became in 1689, he took part in the commission for revising the Prayer-Book; and in his episcopal capacity he procured a stall in Worcester Cathedral for Bentley, the great classical scholar, who was the prelate's chaplain. JOHN STOCKTON.

STOCKER, John, of Honiton, Devonshire, published in the Gospel Magazine (1776-77) nine hymns, which were reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1861. Two of them, "Gracious Spirit, Dove divine," and "Thy, mercy, my God," have been widely used. F. M. BIRD.

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., Methodist-Protestant; b. at Mount Holly, N.J., June 1, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 9, 1868. Converted in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, he joined the Methodist-Protestant Church on its organization, and in 1829 was placed upon a circuit. He was stationed in Baltimore, 1830; chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1833-35, 1839-61, and of the Senate, 1862. He preached in Philadelphia, 1838-47, in Cincinnati until 1850, in Baltimore until 1856, in Philadelphia, over an independent church, until his death. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. He compiled a hymn-book for his denomination (1857), and published some original poetry, and several volumes in prose. See his biography by A. C. LARK, New York, 1869, and by J. G. WILSON, Philadelphia, 1869.

STODDARD, David Tappan, Congregational missionary; b. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 2, 1818; d. at Tabriz, Persia, Jan. 22, 1857. He was graduated at Yale, 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1841; sailed as missionary to the Nestorians, 1843, among whom he labored successfully for the rest of his days. From 1845 to 1851 he was in America on a visit. He was particularly interested in the Nestorian youths whom he gathered in the seminary established in 1844 at Oromiah. He was a model missionary. His Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language was published in the Journal of the American Oriental Society, New Haven, Conn., 1853. See J. P. THOMPSON: Memoir of D. T. Stoddard, New York, 1858.

STODDARD, Solomon, Congregationalist; b. in Boston, Mass., 1613; d. at Northampton, Mass., Feb. 11, 1729. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1662; was chaplain in the Barbadoes for two years; preached at Northampton from 1669 until his death, when he was succeeded by his grandson, and colleague from 1727, Jonathan Edwards. From 1667 to 1671 he was first librarian to Cambridge. He is remembered for his theory that "the Lord's Supper is instituted to be a means of regeneration," and that persons may and ought to come to it, though they know themselves to be in a "natural condition." He wrote The safety of appearing at the day of Judgment in the righteousness of Christ, Boston, 1687 (2d ed., 1729; republished, Edinburgh, 1792, with Preface by Dr. John Erskine); The doctrine of instituted churches explained and proved from the Word of God, Boston, 1700, 31 pp., 4to; a reply to Increase Mather's The order of the Gospel, professed and practised by the churches of Christ in New England, justified, etc., Boston and London, 1700; An Appeal to the learned, being a vindication of the right of visible saints to the Lord's Supper, though they be destitute of a saving work of God's Spirit in their hearts, 1709; A guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls that are under the work of conversion, 1714; An answer to some cases of conscience, 1722 ("among other things, it discusses whether men have the right to live at an inconvenient distance from church; when the Lord's Day begins; whether the Indians were wronged in the purchase of their land"). See art. CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 538; and DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature.

STOICISM, the noblest system of morals developed within the pale of Greek philosophy, received its name from the place in Athens in which its founder, Zeno of Citium (about 308 B.C.) assembled his pupils, the Stoa, or colonnade. The metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. In its more austere forms, stoicism defines moral perfection as complete indifference to destiny. Man shall do that which is good, independently of surrounding influences and circumstances; and, having done that which is good, he shall feel happy, independently of the sufferings and misery which may result from his acts. In its later and somewhat mitigated forms, stoicism defined that which is good, virtue, as conformity to the all-controlling laws of nature, or even as agreement between the human and the divine will. Always, however, it placed action far above contemplation or enjoyment; and, by so doing, it exercised a great influence on the Roman mind. In Rome it found its most eloquent expounder, Seneca, and its noblest representatives, Marcus Aurelius the emperor, and Epictetus the slave; and by inculcating the duty of absolute obedience to the commandments of duty, of absolute self-sacrifice for the sake of virtue, it actually prepared the way for Christianity. The best representation of the whole subject is found in ZELLER: Philosophie d. Griechen, iii., Eng. trans., The Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics, London, 1869. STOLBERG, Friedrich Leopold, Count von, b. at Braunsfeldt in Holstein, Nov. 7, 1750; d. at Sondermünden in Hanover, Dec. 5, 1819. He was educated in Copenhagen, but, under the influence of Cramer and Klopstock, studied at Halle and Göttingen, where he became one of the most prominent members of the Hainbund, and travelled (1775-76) through Germany and Switzerland with Goethe and Lavater. In 1777 he went to Copenhagen as the representative of the prince-bishop of Lubeck to the Danish court, in 1789 he went to Berlin as Danish ambassador, and in 1793 he settled as president of the government of the principality of Eutin. But the literary and political enthusiasm of his youth, the fruits of which were lyrical poems, translations of Homer, Æschylus, and Ossian, dramas, etc., gradually became concentrated on religion; and by the influence of the Princess Gallitzin he was converted to Romanism in 1800. He resigned his position at Eutin, retired into private life, and occupied himself mostly with religious authorship. His principal work is Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi, Hamburg, 1806-18, 15 vols. Among his other works are Betrachtungen und Belehrungen (1819-21), 2 vols.; a life of Vincent of Paula, Munster, 1818; Buchlein von der Liebe, 1820, etc. His collected works appeared in Hamburg, 1825, 20 vols. His life was written by A. NICOLIVICUS, Mayence, 1816.

STONING AMONG THE HEBREWS. This capital punishment was ordained by the Mosaic law for the following classes of criminals: (1) All who treached upon the honor of Jehovah, i.e., idolaters (Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xvii. 2 sq.) and enemies to idolatry (Deut. xiii. 6 sq.), all blasphemers (Lev. xxiv. 10 sq.; comp. 1 Kings xxi. 10 sq.; Acts vi. 13, vii. 56 sq.), sabbath-breakers (Num. xv. 32 sq.), fortune-tellers and soothsayers (Lev. xx. 27), also false prophets (Deut. xiii. 6, 11; in time, those who had shared in any accursed thing (Josh. vii. 25); (2) Notoriously and incorrigibly disobedient sons (Deut. xxi. 18 sq.); (3) Brides whose tokens of virginity were wanting (Deut. xxii. 20 sq.), and so an affianced woman who had complied with a seducer together with the seducer himself (ver. 23 sq.). According to Jewish criminal procedure, the same penalty was incurred by those who cursed their parents, or had sexual connection with their mother, step-mother, daughter-in-law, or with a beast. Adultery also was punished with stoning (Ezek. xvi. 40, xxiii. 17; John viii. 5). An ox that had destroyed human life was also stoned (Exod. xxi. 28 sq.). The mode of stoning seems to be indicated in the expressions salal, i.e., to hit with a heavy stone, and ragam, i.e., to overload one with stones. The place of execution appears to have been outside of the city (Lev. xxiv. 11; Num. xv. 35; 1 Kings xxi. 10, 14; Acts vii. 58); and that the witnesses threw the first stone upon the culprit, we see from Deut. xxi. 7; Acts vii. 57 sq. Stoning was a frequent resort of a mob (a very old practice, Exod. viii. 26, xvii. 1) in order to avenge itself on the spot upon such as had excited popular ill will (1 Sam. xxx. 6; Luke xx. 6; John x. 31 sq., xl. 8; Acts v. 26, xiv. 5-19; 2 Cor. xi. 25; Josephus, Jud. XIV. 2, 1, XVI. 10, 5; Jar. II. 1, 3; Jews, 13, 58). It was resorted to, not only by the Jews, but also by Syrians (2 Macc. i. 16), Greeks (Herod., ix. 5; Thucyd., v. 60; Paus., viii. 5, 8; Elian, Var. Hist. v. 19; Curtius, vii. 21), and other nations.

STORR, Gottlob Christian. See THUNGEN SCROLL.

STOWELL, Hugh, an eminent evangelical clergyman; rector of Christ Church, Salford; canon of Chester, etc.; was b. at Douglas, Isle of Man, Dec. 3, 1799; and d. at Salford, Oct. 8, 1865. A memoir by Rev. J. B. Marsden appeared 1868. He wrote The Pleasures of Religion, with other Poems (1832), Tractarianism tested (1845, 2 vols.), and A Model for Men of Business; and edited A Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1851), containing the very popular "From every stormy wind that blows." His forty-six hymns were published by his son and successor, 1868. F. M. BIRD.

STRABO, Walafrid (Walafridus Strabus, "the squinter"), d. July 17, 819; was, according to some writers, a Suabian by birth, according to others an Anglo-Saxon; studied at St. Gall, Reichenau, and finally at Fulda, under Rhabanus Maurus, and was in 812 made abbot of Reichenau. He was a very prolific writer. His principal work is the so-called Glossa ordinaria, a huge exegetical compilation, the oldest printed edition, — without date or place, comprising four volumes in folio, — which for several centuries formed the principal source and the highest authority of biblical science in the Latin Church, and was used down to the seventeenth century. Another work of his, De cordis et incrementis rerum ecclesiasticarum, printed in Hittorp's Scriptores des officii divinis, Cologne, 1598, is also of interest. It is a kind of handbook in ecclesiastical archaeology, treating in thirty-one chapters various ceremonies, altars, bells, images, etc. He also wrote poems and historical works. ED. REUSS.

STRAPHAN, Joseph, was author of three hymns in Rippon's Selection, 1787. They have been more or less copied, and one, on Sunday-school work, extensively. F. M. BIRD.

STRAUSS, David Friedrich, b. at Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Württemberg, Jan. 27, 1808; d. there Feb. 8, 1871. He studied theology (1825-30) at the university of Tübingen, where he came under the influence of Baur, who had formerly been his teacher in the seminary at Blaubeuren. He took up first with the ideas of Schelling, and then with those of the mystic Jacob Boehme. He became profoundly interested in natural magic in its different forms. But the study of Schleiermacher dissipated his mysticism. Theology had, however, less attractions for him than Hegel's philosophy, which, indeed, combined the two. He passed his final examinations with distinction, and became assistant minister in a little village near Ludwigsburg. His simple discourses were enjoyed by his parishioners, and his pastoral duties were well performed; but after nine months he resigned (1831), since he found himself too much distracted by religious doubts to stay, and was for six months temporary professor in the seminary at Maulbronn; then went to Berlin to hear Schleiermacher and Hegel. The latter died of cholera shortly after his arrival. In 1832 he was called to Tübingen as rector in the seminary. He also lectured upon Hegel's philosophy in the university. His lectures were a brilliant success; but he soon found his position uncomfortable, owing to his opinions. He had planned a life of Jesus upon critical principles, and attacked with such ardor his great task, that in a year he wrote the book which has made him immortal, Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet.

(Tübingen, 1835, 1836, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1840; French trans. by Littre, Paris, 1839, 2 vols.; Eng. trans. by George Eliot, London, 1846, 3 vols.). He was removed from his position at Tübingen after the appearance of the first volume (see Wiesacker, in Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 1875, 4th part), and transferred as provisional professor at Ludwigsburg. In 1836 he retired to private life. The action of the authorities was wise, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He applied the mythical theory which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which De Wette had applied to the Old Testament, to the Gospels, with the result that all miracles were turned into myths (see MYTHICAL THEORY): all that remained was a Christ idea. There was no such thing as prophecy, an incarnation, or a miracle; for nothing which is supernatural can be historical. There was no God-man as a person. The Incarnate God is the human race. Humanity is the child of a visible mother, but invisible father. It is the race which works miracles by its use of natural forces. It dies, and lives again, and mounts to heaven, because, raised above personal existence, it is united with the heavenly and eternal spirit. In this work Strauss ignored critical study of the text. He considered the four Gospels as the altered oral tradition. He accepted, however, the synoptical discourses. His theory was confronted by the dilemma so masterfully put by Ullmann in his Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1838) that either the Christ was the invention of the apostolic church, or the apostolic church was founded by Christ. Neander, Tholuck, Lucke, Lange, and others successfully refuted his theory; and his book is of value only for its purely negative criticism. In the second and third editions, and in his Streitschriften (Tübingen, 1837-38, 3 vols.), he endeavored to reply to the attacks made upon him, and conceded spiritual authority to the Founder of Christianity. It was his desire to make his peace with the theologians, which led him in 1838 to write the Zwei friedliche Blätter, Altona, 1839. In 1839 the radical party at Zurich nominated him professor of theology in the university there; but a popular outbreak prevented his acceptance, although for the rest of his life he continued to draw a thousand francs yearly (half the salary). In 1839 he published at Leipzig Charakteristiken u. Kritiken, 2d ed., 1844, embracing essays upon Schleiermacher, Daub, Kerner, animal magnetism, and modern possessions, etc. In the fourth edition of his Leben Jesu (1840), the first one printed in German characters, Strauss withdrew all the concessions of the second and third, and boldly threw down the glove to the theologians. His second chief work was Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft dargestellt (Tübingen, 1840, 1841, 2 vols.), which has been characterized as resembling a theology in the same way that a cemetery resembles a city. Strauss maintains that the opposition between science and religion is hopeless. The latter is indeed an inferior form of thought, which no longer satisfies cultivated spirits. He establishes his thesis by picking to pieces the different doctrines successively, and showing their worthlessness. The work made little impression. Strauss was now definitely relegated to private life, and wandered about through Germany, finding no permanent home. While living at Stuttgart he met the popular opera-singer Agnes Schebest, and married her in 1842. Two children, a son and a daughter, were born of this union; but it proved unhappy, and in 1847 they separated by mutual consent. His wife died Dec. 22, 1870.

His next work was Der Romantiker auf dem Thron der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige (Mannheim, 1847), an ironical parallel between the restoration of heathenism attempted by the Emperor Julian and the restoration of Protestant orthodoxy by Frederick William IV. of Prussia. He was elected as a liberal to the Württemberg diet in 1848, by the citizens of Ludwigsburg, but disappointed their expectations by advocating anti-liberal sentiments, and resigned soon after, to their great satisfaction. In this connection, see his Sechs theologisch-politische Volksreden, Stuttgart, 1848. In the last portion of his life he produced a number of literary works by which his reputation as a critic was enhanced, and four theological works, large and small, in all of which he plainly showed how widely he had departed, not only from tradition, but from the Christian religion. His literary works were Schubarts Leben in seinen Briefen, Berlin, 1849, 2 vols.; Christian Märklin, ein Lebens- und Charakter-bild aus der Gegenwart, Mannheim, 1851; Leben und Schriften Nikolaus Frischlins, Frankfurt, 1855; Ulrich von Hutten, Leipzig, 1857, 4th ed., 1878 (English condensed trans., London, 1874); Gespräche Hutten's, übers. u. erl., Leipzig, 1860; Hermann Samuel Reimarus, Leipzig, 1862; Voltaire, sechs Vorträge, Leipzig, 1870, 5th ed., 1878. The theological works were (1) Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk bearbeitet, Leipzig, 1864, 4th ed., 1877 (Eng. trans., London, 1865, 2 vols.); (2) Die Halben und die Ganzen, Berlin, 1865; (3) Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte, Berlin, 1865; and (4) Der alte und der neue Glaube, ein Bekenntnis, Leipzig, 1872, 11th ed., Bonn, 1881 (Eng. trans. by Mathilde Blind, London and New York, 1873), with appendix, 1874. In the first of these four books, Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Leben Jesu by prefacing the history with a critical study of the Gospels, particularly Matthew, to whose discourses he assigned historical importance. He granted that Jesus "stands foremost among those who have given a higher ideal to humanity," and that it was impossible to refrain from admiring and loving him. He also says we cannot do without Christianity, and it cannot be lost. In the second work, Strauss ridiculed Schenkel's liberalism as contrasted with Hegel's whole-souled orthodoxy. In the third, he reviews Schleiermacher's life of Christ, then first published. In his fourth work he sets himself to answer four questions: Are we yet Christians? Have we still a religion? How do we look at the universe? How shall we regulate our life? The first question he answers negatively. He repudiates his former veneration for Christianity, and calls Christ's resurrection "a world-historical humbug." To the second query he replies, that "we can only believe in an absolute dependence upon the universe; an absolute being cannot be conscious or personal." To the third, he says, the universe is "only a development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end." The fourth question is answered by saying, that we must live for "the good we find here, for science and art." There is no hereafter.

Strauss died of cancer of the stomach, after great sufferings borne with stoical patience. The deaconess who nursed him in his last illness relates (according to good authority), that during his agony he repeatedly called out, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" But he was buried, by his own request, without religious rites of any kind.

LI.—STRAUSS'S Gesammelte Schriften, with an Introduction by Eduard Zeller, appeared at Bonn, 1876-78, 12 vols. In this edition the first Leben Jesu, Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, and *Charakteristiken u. Among the many replies to STRAUSS'S Old Faith and the New may be mentioned ULRICH'S, translated and annotated by KRAUTH, Philadelphia, 1874; and Dr. H. B. SMITH'S brilliant review in Faith and Philosophy, New York, 1877. Cf. the art. on Strauss by A. FREYDINGER, in LICHTENBERG'S Encyclopædie, xi. 714-729, and by Professor H. B. SMITH, in JOHNSON'S Cyclopædia, iv. 590-591.

STRIGEL, Victorinus, a pupil of Melancthon, and an advocate of synergism; was b. at Kaufbeuren, Dec. 26, 1514; d. at Heidelberg, June 26, 1569. He studied at Wittenberg, under Melancthon; was professor at Erfurt, and in 1548 became the first professor and rector of the new school at Jena. Here he came into conflict with Flacius, whom he recommended for a professorship in 1557. It was a conflict between the Melancthonian theology and strict Lutheranism. A public controversy, lasting fifteen days, between these two men, was held in 1560 at the castle of Weimar. The only point discussed was the relation of the human will to divine grace in the work of conversion. In 1563 Strigel became professor at Leipzig; but in 1567 the lecture-room was closed to him on account of his moderate Lutheranism, and he became professor at Heidelberg. His principal work was Hypomnemata in omnes libros N. T. etc., Leipzig, 1565. See ERDMANN: De Striglianismis, Jena, 1658, Hanover, 1675; MURZ: Hist. vob. et contravers. V. Striglii, Tübingen, 1732; OTTO: De Strig. liberioris mentis in eccles. luth. criticis, Jena, 1813. C. SCHWABZ.

STRONG, Nathan, D.D., b. in Coventry, Conn., Oct. 16, 1718; d. in Hartford, Conn., Dec. 25, 1816, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Having been graduated at Yale College in 1739, he pursued the study of law for a time; was a tutor in Yale College in 1772, 1773; and, after a brief course of theological reading, was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 5, 1774. He found the church weak; he left it the strongest in the State. Some of the ablest men in the country belonged to it. He remained in this pastorate nearly forty years.

During the first part of it, amid our colonial troubles with Great Britain, he published many political papers which exerted a wide and deep influence. He possessed one faculty which gave him great power in political discussions. His wit was woven "into the very texture of his mind." "Notwithstanding all his struggles against it," he could not entirely repress it; and he often let it fly like a javelin against the opponents of the Revolution. He never yielded to it in the pulpit; there he was uniformly and eminently solemn and impressive. In his controversies, however, with the infidels of his day, he did not restrain his instinctive tendency to sarcasm. Their safety lay in letting him alone. Like many other pastors, he suffered in his finances from the influence of the Revolutionary war. His salary became insolent and uncertain. In order to relieve his failing exchequer, he invested a part of his patrimonial estate in a mercantile establishment, which afterward became bankrupt. Several circumstances connected with this loss, followed as they were by two severe bereavements, had a decisive influence on his ministerial character. During the last twenty years of his pastorate he became eminent as a "revival preacher." In the best sense of the term he was a pulpit orator. His person was attractive and imposing, his elocution was earnest and emphatic, his thoughts were clear, his sympathies ardent, his religious feelings profound. He had a wonderful memory, and a command of appropriate language. He was sometimes thought to be preaching extempore when in fact he was reading his manuscript, and sometimes he was thought to be reading his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extempore. His knowledge of human nature was remarkable. This gave him an exceptional degree of authority among the churches, and a rare degree of skill in conducting religious revivals. He was an indefatigable student; but his learning was developed in his intellectual character, and not in his references to books. His talents were versatile; his attainments were multifarious, and not concentrated on a few points. His method of writing was rapid; he did not stop to perfect his style; and accordingly, among the many works which he performed, he left no single one which will endure as a visible monument of his real greatness. He published two volumes of sermons,—one in 1798, and one in 1800. Both of them were designed and adapted to guard the purity of religious revivals. He was a pioneer in the cause of Christian missions. He has been considered the father of the Connecticut Missionary Society, the oldest of the permanent missionary societies in the land. He was the projector of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the principal editor of it for fifteen years, and the sole editor of it for five of these years. His numerous contributions to it had a memorable influence on the religious welfare of what were then our "new settlements." He was also the projector of the Hartford Selection of Hymns. Several of these he composed himself, and was the chief editor of the volume published in 1799. The most elaborate of his productions is entitled The Doctrine of Eternal Mercy reconcilable with the Infinite Benevolence of God (1796). The history of this volume is remarkable. In addition to these writings he published fourteen sermons in pamphlet form, the first in 1777, the last in 1816.

STRYPE, John, a distinguished historiographer of the English Reformation: was b. at Stepney, Nov. 1, 1643; d. at Hackney, Dec. 11, 1737. After passing through St. Paul's school, he entered Jesus College, Cambridge (1662), from which he was transferred to Catherine Hall, where he took his degree. He was made curate of Theydon-Boys, Essex, in 1669, and of Low Leyton, Essex, the same year. Archbishop Tenison afterwards conferred upon him the sinecure of Tarring, Sussex, and he received the lectureship of Hackney, which he resigned in 1724. His principal writings are an edition of Lightfoot's Works, London, 1684, 2 vols.; Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, 1694, new ed., Oxford, 1848, 3 vols.; Life of Sir Thomas Smith, 1698; Life of Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, 1701; Life of Sir John Cheke, 1705; Annals of the Reformation, 1709-31, 4 vols.; Life and Actions of Archbishop Grindal, 1710; Life and Letters of Archbishop Parker, 1711; Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, 1718; Ecclesiastical Memorials, 1721, 3 vols. The most important of these works, which have been a storehouse for modern historians of the Elizabethan period, is the Annals of the Reformation, which, as the author says in his dedication to the king, "commences at the happy accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, when the great and divine work was taken in hand again of removing the gross superstitions and errors of Rome which had been restored by Queen Mary." Strype was a diligent collector of materials, faithful and minute, but lacked skill of arrangement. The complete works of Strype were issued at Oxford, 1820-40, in 27 vols.

STUART, Moses, b. in Wilton, Conn., March 26, 1750; d. in Andover, Mass., Jan. 4, 1852, aged seventy-one years, nine months, and nine days. When a lad of but twelve years, he became absorbed in the perusal of Edwards on the Will. In his fifteenth year, entering an academy in Norwalk, Conn., he learned the whole Latin grammar in three days, and then joined a class who had devoted several months to Latin studies. In May, 1797, having been under the careful tuition of Roger Minot Sherman, he was admitted as a sophomore to Yale College. Here his tastes were pre-eminently for the mathematics. At his graduation, in 1799, he delivered the salutatory oration, at that time the highest appointment awarded to the class. One year after leaving Yale he taught an academy in North Fairfield, Conn., and in the following year was principal of a high school at Danbury, Conn. Having pursued the study of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1802, at Danbury. His fertile and versatile mind, his enthusiasm and prodigious memory, gave promise of eminent success in the legal profession. From his legal study at this time he derived signal advantages through life. A few weeks before his admission to the bar, he was called to a tutorship in Yale College. Here he distinguished himself as an inspiring teacher. At this time he publicly devoted himself to the service of God.

Having pursued the study of theology with President Dwight, he was ordained, March 5, 1806, pastor of the First Congregational Church in New Haven, Conn. During his pastorate of three years and ten months, two hundred persons were admitted, all but twenty-eight by profession, into his church. His deep, solemn, sonorous voice, his commanding and impassioned manner, his translucent style, his vivacity of thought, his energy of feeling, contributed to make him one of the most eloquent of preachers. Many supposed that he mistook his calling when he left the pulpit for the professor's chair.

On the 25th of February, 1810, he was inaugurated professor of sacred literature in Andover Theological Seminary. In about two years he composed a Hebrew grammar for the immediate use of his pupils. They copied it day by day from his written sheets. When he printed it, he was compelled to set up the types for about half the paradigms of verbs with his own hands. He was a pioneer in the introduction of German literature into our country. Thus he opened a new era in our theological literature. By his fresh, easy, enthusiastic, and open-hearted way of teaching, by his multifarious acquisitions in the sciences and arts, he won the admiration of his pupils, and in an altogether unusual degree quickened their literary zeal. From the fact that he awakened the enthusiasm of many eminent men in his department, and gave to his department a new fascination as well as dignity and importance, he has been called "the father of biblical literature" in our land. He was the inspiring teacher of more than fifteen hundred ministers, of more than seventy presidents or professors in our highest literary institutions, of more than a hundred missionaries to the heathen, of about thirty translators of the Bible into foreign languages. He retained his professorship thirty-eight years. During these years his health was so feeble that, as he was wont to remark, he "never really studied more than three hours a day." The catalogue of his published writings is a proof that during these daily study-hours the invalid accomplished a good work. Several of the following books and essays have been republished in Europe, and several have been republished in this country since his decease: Grammar of the Hebrew Language, without Points, 1813; Letters to Rev. William E. Channing, D.D., on the Divinity of Christ, 1819 (republished in five successive editions); Grammar of the Hebrew Language, with points, 1821 (6th ed. in 1838); Letters to Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., on the Eternal Generation of the Son of God, 1822; Winer's Greek Grammar of the New Testament, translated by professors Stuart and Robinson, 1825; Practical Rules for Greek Accents, 1829; Elementary Principles of Interpretation, from the Latin of Ernesti, 18th ed. in 1842; Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1827-28, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1833, in 1 vol.); Hebrew Chrestomathy, 1829 (2d ed., 1832); Grammar of the New Testament Dialect, 2d ed., improved, 1831; Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1832, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1835, in 1 vol.); Notes to Hay's Introduction to the New Testament, 1836; Hints on the Prophecies, 2d ed., 1842; Commentary on the Apocalypse, 1845, 2 vols., pp. 1008; Critical History and Defence of the Old-Testament Canon, 1845; Translation of Roderiger's Gesenius, 1846; Commentary on Daniel, 1850; Conscience and the Constitution, 1850; Commentary on Eccle- scistes, 1551; Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, 1552.

In addition to the preceding works, he published fourteen pamphlets; thirty-four articles, containing fifteen hundred pages, in the American Biblical Repository; fourteen articles, containing four hundred and ninety pages, in the Bibliotheca Sacra; thirty-three important articles for other periodicals, — in all more than three thousand printed octavo pages. STUDITES, Simeon, is mentioned as a monk in the famous monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and as author of a number of noticeable religious hymns. See MÜLLER (Studium con. Const., Leipzig, 1721) and LEO ALLATIUS (De Symeonum scriptis, Paris, 1661), where another Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of homilies and hymns, is also mentioned.

STUDITES, Theodore, b. in Constantinople in 759; d. in the Island of Chalcis, Nov. 11, 826. He became a monk in the monastery of Studium in 781, and in 791 its abbot. He was an ardent champion of image-worship, wrote tracts, letters, poems, etc., in its defence, and was four times sent into exile by iconoclastic emperors. See JACON SIMON: Opera varia, Venice, 1728, especially part v. NEUDECKER.

STURM, the first abbot of Fulda; b. in Bavaria in 710; d. at Fulda, Dec. 17, 779. He descended from a rich and distinguished family; joined Boniface on his second missionary tour through Central Germany; studied in the cloistral school of Fritzlar, and was ordained a priest there in 733. As he took a prominent part in the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, he was by Boniface made its first abbot, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 755, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the remains of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the institution. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the monastery of Jumièges; but the sympathy for the abbot was so strong throughout the whole Frankish Empire, that Pepin not only restored him, but also presented him with the great estates of Thuringa and Eintracht. He also enjoyed the favor of Charlemagne, acted as mediator between him and Duke Thassilo of Bavaria, followed him as missionary on his campaigns against the Saxons, and received from him the great estate of Hamelnburg. His life has been written by EGIN, abbot of Fulda, 818-822 (found in MANNIX: Acta Sanctorum O. B., ii. pp. 212-259); and in PELTZ: Monum. Script., ii. pp. 365-377). STURM, Jakob, b. at Strassburg in 1189; d. there Oct. 30, 1553. He studied at Heidelberg and Freiburg, — first theology, together with Capito and Eck, afterwards jurisprudence; and, belonging to a family which for more than two centuries had given Strassburg its ablest magistrates, he entered upon a political career, became a member of the city council about 1522, and stood for the rest of his life at the head of the city government. From 1525 to 1552 he took part, as the representative of Strassburg, in ninety-one political and religious colloquies and negotiations. In 1521 he openly declared in favor of Luther; and freedom of conscience, without any interference either by emperor or pope, was the great idea for which he labored throughout his life. But he was always very zealous for a union between the Swiss and the Saxon Reformers; and, though he failed in that point, he exercised great influence in the course of the Reformation. C. SCHMIDT.

STURM, Johann, b. at Sleida, in 1507; d. at Strassburg, in 1589. He was educated at Liège, and studied at Louvain. He then visited Paris, where he lectured on dialectics, after the method of Rudolph Agricola, and was in 1537 called to Strassburg, where he founded the celebrated gymnasium on humanist principles, completely discarding the scholastic methods. In Paris he had adopted the Reformation; and, as he was a man of tact and eloquence, he was often employed in the negotiations between Protestants and Romanists, and maintained to the end of his life a hope of their final reconciliation. Personally acquainted with Calvin and the French Reformers, he inclined towards the Reformed conception of the Lord's Supper; and after the death of Jakob Sturm, in 1553, he was vehemently attacked by the Lutherans in Strassburg. After ten years' controversy, a consensus was brought about in 1563; but the disagreement broke forth again, and in 1581 Sturm was deposed from his office as rector of the gymnasium. See C. SCHMIDT: La vie et les travaux de Jean Sturm, Strassburg, 1855. C. SCHMIDT.

STYLITES (from στυλος, "a pillar"), or PILLAR SAINTS, denote one of the most extreme forms of Christian asceticism; a class of anchorites who spent their life on the top of a pillar, never descending, always standing (protected from falling only by a frail railing), exposed to the open air day and night, summer and winter. The inventor of this monstrosity was Simeon, generally called the "Syrian," or the "Older," to distinguish him from other Simeons, also Stylites; b. at Sesan, in Northern Syria, in 390 or 391; d. at Telanessa, near Antioch, in 159. His parents were Christians, and he grew up as a shepherd; but when, in his thirteenth year, he for the first time attended service in a church, he was so completely overwhelmed, that he decided to leave his herds, and become a monk. He entered first a monastery in the vicinity of his home, where he spent two years, and then the monastery of St. Enselonas, near Teleda, where he spent ten years. But the asceticism of the monastery was not severe enough for him. He settled as anchorite at Telanessa, and one of the feats to which he trained himself was fasting for forty days in imitation of Moses and Elijah. He first lived in a hut; but the crowds of admirers which thronged around him disturbed him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. On the top of that column he spent thirty years. From sundown to sunrise he meditated, generally bending forwards and backwards, in regular alternation, without intermission, from sunrise to sundown he preached to the people assembled at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and gave them what spiritual aid he could. He wrote sharp letters to Theodosius II., Leo I., and the Empress Eudoxia, and his admonitions were followed; and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at Antioch. There was, indeed, something in his life, which, though it seems almost monstrous to the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as truly great, and he found many imitators. Stylites are mentioned as far down as the twelfth century. Simeon Fubuinatus, who was hurled from his pillar by a thunderbolt, lived from 1113 to 1180. The champion of the whole class was Alpyius, who spent seventy years on his pillars. At one time it was almost a fashion among rich people to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at others, the religious life of the congregations was, no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example of the pillar-saint.

LIT.—The life of Simeon was told by THEODORÉT: Hist. Eccl., c. 26; by his pupil ANTONIUS, in Act. Sanct., January, tom. i. p. 261; and by another contemporary, COSMAS, in ASSEMANI: Act. Mart., p. 268. See also LEO ALLATIUS: De Simeonum scriptis, Paris, 1664; SIEBER: De sanctis columnaribus, Leipzig, 1714. H. MALLETT.

SUAREZ, Francis, a learned and authoritative teacher of the order of the Jesuits; was b. at Grenada, Spain, Jan. 5, 1518; d. in Lisbon, Sept. 25, 1617. Following the desire of his parents, he began the study of law. Deeply impressed in his seventeenth year by a sermon of the Jesuit John Ramirez, he determined to enter the order of the Jesuits, and began the study of philosophy and theology at Salamanca. At the close of his studies he discoursed upon Aristotle at Segovia, taught theology at Valladolid, and acted as professor for eight years in Rome. Obligated by sickness to return to Spain, he taught for eight years at Alcalá, and one year at Salamanca, when Philip II. appointed him principal professor of theology at Coimbra. His lectures must have produced an immense sensation, if the half of the reports is to be believed. Some attributed his wisdom to divine inspiration (infusam ei divinitus esse sapientiam), and called him "the second Augustine," "the prodigy and oracle of the age," etc. In spite of this adulation, Suarez remained humble, flagellated himself daily, fasted three times a week, and never ate more than one pound of food a day. He was on a visit to Lisbon to compose a difficulty between the Papal legate and the royal councillors, when he died. His epitaph ran, "The teacher of Europe, as also of the whole world, an Aristotle in the natural sciences, an angelic Thomas in divinity, a Jerome in style, an Ambrose in the pulpit, an Augustine in polemics, an Athanasius in the explication of the faith, a Bernard in mellifluous piety, a Gregory in the exposition of the Scriptures, and, in a word, the eye of the Christian world, but in his own judgment, nothing (ut verbo oculus populi Christiani sed suo solius iudicio, nihil)."

The literary activity of Suarez was for the most part concerned with the treatment of the Aristotelian philosophy and the scholastic theology. His works appeared in twenty-three volumes, at Lyons and Mainz, 1630; a reprint of this edition, in twenty-four volumes, Venice, 1740. The Jesuit Noël made an excerpt from his works in two volumes, Geneva, 1730. The rich invention and casuistry with which Suarez spins out the discussion of scholastic questions suited the taste of his time and his order. Especially famous was his Defence of the Catholic and Apostolic Faith against the Errors of the Anglican Sect (Defens. fidei Cath. et Apost. adversus Angl. Sectæ errores), Coimbra, 1613. He wrote the work against James I. of England, and at the suggestion of Paul V. Its main burden is, that the Pope has the right to depose and set up kings in virtue of his authority received from Peter. Applauded by Paul V. in a letter to its author, dated Sept. 9, 1613, it was burnt by the public hangman in front of St. Paul's, London; and by a decree of Parliament it received a like treatment in Paris, June 26, 1614. See DESCHAMPS' Latin Life of Suarez, Perpignan, 1671; ALEGAMBE: Bibl. Script. S. J., Antw., 1613; WERNER: Suarez u. d. Scholastik d. letzten Jahrhundert, Regensburg, 1861. STEITZ.

SUBDEACON. The primitive church knew only two classes of officers.—leaders (προστάται, πομπες, ηγούμενοι, ἐπισκόποι, πρεσβύτεροι) and servants (δουλοὶ); the former for the functions of worship, the latter for the administration of charities. But as the episcopate on one side developed from the presbyterate, so, on the other, the subdeaconate from the diaconate. The Roman-Catholic Church, however, while vindicating for the episcopate immediate establishment by Christ himself, has never hesitated to concede that the subdeaconate is a merely human institution (utilitatis causa). Its existence in the middle of the third century in the churches of Italy and Africa is proved by the letter of Pope Cornelius to Bishop Fabius of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl. VI. 43) and by the letters of Cyprian (2, 3, 29, 30, etc.). In Spain it is first mentioned by the synod of Elvira 305 (can. 30); in the Orient, by the synod of Laodicea, 361 (can. 21-23). From Amalarinus (De divin. offic. 1, 11) it appears, however, in the middle of the ninth century it was not yet universally established. With respect to dignity it was reckoned among ordines majores: though all its offices were of a subordinate character,—guarding the tombs of the martyrs, watching doors during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, etc. It became more elevated, however, when Gregory the Great extended the law of celibacy to its members, and when Urban II., in 1091, admitted them to competition for the episcopal chair. See MORINUS: De sacris ordinationibus, iii. 12. E. FRIEDBERG.

SUBINTRODUCTÆ is a term of canon law applied to women living in the houses of clerical persons for purposes of unchastity. When the unmarried state became identified with chastity, relations to subintroductæ very soon sprang up, and gradually developed into actual concubinage. They were noticed by the councils of Eliberis (305), Ancyra (314), Nicea (325), etc., down to the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, cap. 14).

SUBLAPSARIANISM, a theory held by moderate Calvinists, according to which the fall of man was not decreed, though it was foreseen, by God; the purpose of that distinction being to avoid ascribing the origin of sin to God. See INFRA-LAPSARIANISM and SUPRA-LAPSARIANISM.

SUBORDINATIONISM. See TRINITY.

SUCCESSION, Apostolical, means an unbroken series of ordination from the days of the apostles to our time. It is claimed, in the most absolute sense of the words, by the Roman-Catholic Church, which for that reason declares all other churches schismatic or heretic. But it is also claimed, though in a less dogmatic way, by the Greek, the Syrian, the Coptic, and the Armenian churches, and by various Protestant churches, especially the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

SUCCOTH BENOTH (booths of daughters) occurs (2 Kings xvii. 30) as the name of some deity, whose worship the Babylonian settlers in Samaria are said to have set up on their arrival in that country. Opinions vary as to its meaning. (1) According to the connection and according to the ancient versions (Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syriac, Targum), it is the name of an idol. According to the rabbins it was a goddess under the form of a hen and chickens; others regard it as an astronomical emblem of the Babylonians. A third opinion is this, that it denotes the Mylitta. Hengstenberg's view is, that it means "the daughters of Bel and Mylitta, whose images were contained in small tabernacles, where they were worshipped with others." With this view he approaches (2) the more general one, that it denotes "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their idol (i.e., Mylitta). Thenius, who mediates between these two main views, says that the original meaning of Succoth-Benoth was booths, in which the daughters or the servants of Mylitta prostituted themselves in her honor; but the word was later pronounced as one, and was used to denote the name of the deity which was worshipped in the booths. Thus, according to the connection, and according to the Septuagint, some special idol was meant. LEYER.

SUDAILI, Stephanus Bar, a monophysite monk, who lived about 500, first at Edessa, and afterwards at Jerusalem; was, according to the Catholicorum Sanctoium, the author of a book, which, on the basis of a pantheistic interpretation of 1 Cor. xv. 28, taught that the punishment in hell was not eternal; which book afterwards circulated under the name of Hierotheus, the famous predecessor of Pseudo-Dionysius. As there is some resemblance between the theology of Bar Sudaili and Hierotheus, it is by no means improbable that the former may have borrowed the celebrated name of the latter for the purpose of introducing heterodox views into the church. See ASSMANN, Bibl. Orient., ii. 294. ZÖCKLER.

SUFFRACAN (suffraganeus) was, according to the explanation of the word given by Aleuin in a letter to Charlemagne, any ecclesiastical person whose duty it was to assist (suffragari) his superior. But the term was more especially applied to bishops, and that in a double sense, both to bishops in paribus infidelium, who assisted as vicars some regular diocesan bishop, and to the latter when they were not exempt in their relation to the metropolitan. H. E. JACOBSON.

SUGER, Abbot of St. Denis; b. probably in 1081, and in the neighborhood of St. Omer; d. at St. Denis, Jan. 12, 1151; the contemporary of St. Bernard and Abelard, and one of the greatest statesmen France produced during the middle ages. He was educated in the monastery of St. Denis, together with Louis VI.; and when the latter ascended the throne, in 1108, he immediately called the monk to his court, and made him his principal councillor. In 1122 Suger was elected abbot of St. Denis; but he remained at the court, and continued to live as a man of the world, until, in 1127, he suddenly was seized by the reformatory movement of his time. He at once discarded all worldly pomp and vanity, and assumed the habits and practices of severe asceticism. But he continued to be a politician rather than an ecclesiastic. After the death of Louis VI., in 1137, he was appointed regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again when the latter, in 1149, made a crusade to the Holy Land; and during his lifetime hardly any thing of consequence took place in French politics without his immediate intervention. His leading idea was the consolidation of the monarchy as a divinely established institution; and he strove to realize that idea, not only in spite of the resistance of the feudal lords, but sometimes, also, in spite of the opposition of the hierarchy. His life was written by NETTEMET (1812), HUGUENIN (1857), COMBES (1858), and by a contemporary monk, in GILZOT: Coll. des mémoires, vol. viii. H. PETER.

SUICERUS (SCHWEIZER), Johann Caspar, the author of the Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus; b. at Zurich, June 26, 1620; d. there Dec. 29, 1681. After studying at Zurich, he finished his education at Montauban and Saumur. In 1641 he was made teacher in the schools of his native town, and was promoted to a professorship of Hebrew, and later (1660) of Greek. His philological works are valuable. They are, Sylloge vocum N. T., Tig., 1618, 1659, edited by Hagenbach in 1741, under the title, N. T. Glossarium Græco-Latinum, etc.; and especially Thesaurus verborum e patribus Græcis ordine alphabetico, exhibens quoque phrasin, ritus, dogmata, hereses et hujusmodi alia spectant, insertis infinitis prout vocibus, lapidum generibus Græcis hæc omnia a lexicographis nondum vel obire saltim tractatis, opus rigidi auctorum indigesto labore adornatum, Amst., 1682, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1728; Synodol. Nicæno-Constant. expositio et ex antiquitate eccles. illustrata, Utrecht, 1718. A. SCHWEIZER.

SUIDBERT, an Anglo-Saxon monk who in 690 accompanied Willibrord to Friesland as a missionary, and was ordained bishop of the Frisian congregation when Willibrord went to Rome. On the return of the latter, however, Suidbert went into the land of the Bructerians, between the Ems and the Lower Rhine; and, when the congregation which he formed there was disturbed by the invasion of the Saxons, he founded a monastery and missionary school at the present Kaiserswerth, under the protection of Pepin. See BRUNN: Hist. Eccl., v. 19. The Vita in Act. Sanct. Boll., March 1, is a later and fully unreliable fabrication. W. KRAFFT.

SULZER, Simon, b. at Interlaken, Sept. 22, 1508; d. at Basel, June 22, 1585. He grew up under very humble circumstances, but was enabled by the support of the government of Bern to study at Basel and Strassburg. After he finished his studies, he spent ten years in reconstructing the schools in the canton of Bern, and was in 1549 appointed preacher at Basel, and professor of theology. In the controversy between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, he occupied a peculiar position, as he held the views of Luther, and openly labored for their introduction in Switzerland. SUMMERFIELD, John, Methodist-Episcopal: b. in Preston, Eng., Jan. 31, 1798; d. in New-York City, June 13, 1825. He was the son of a Wesleyan local preacher, but educated at the Moravian Academy at Fairfield, near Manchester; was sent into business at Liverpool; removed to Dublin, 1813; was converted in 1817, and next year became a local Wesleyan minister. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Methodist Conference of Ireland, and in March, 1821, having emigrated to America, in the New-York Conference. He leaped into astonishing popularity by reason of his eloquence. In 1822 he preached in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, everywhere listened to by great crowds; but in June of that year his health gave way. He spent the winter of 1822-23 in France; returned to New-York, April 19, 1824, but was not able again to do full work. He was a founder of the American Tract Society. He published only one sermon; but in 1812, at New-York, many of his Sermons and Sketches of Sermons were published. His life was written by JOHN HOLLAND, New-York, 1829, 2d ed., 1830, and WILLIAM M. WILKINS, Philadelphia, 1837.

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist minister, professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt University, and general book editor of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South: b. near Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, Eng., Oct. 11, 1812; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 5, 1882. His parents, James and Sarah Summers, died when he was quite young, leaving him to the foster care of a grand-aunt. While yet a youth he came to America, and settled in Baltimore. His parents being independents, his early religious training and reading were Calvinistic. Not being satisfied with the teachings of that system, and knowing no other, he was fast drifting, as he writes, into scepticism and infidelity, when some one to whom he communicated his state of mind gave him a copy of Adam Clarke's Commentary on Romans. This he read with eagerness and intense interest, and became from that time strongly Arminian in his religious belief. Visiting about this time, out of curiosity, a Methodist camp-meeting near the city of Baltimore, he was happily and soundly converted to God, experiencing most sensibly a change of heart. Ever after that, he was a strong believer in and advocate for experimental religion. He began at once to prepare for the ministry, and was "admitted on trial" into the Baltimore Conference in March, 1835; was ordained deacon by Bishop Hedding in 1837, and elder by Bishop Andrew in 1839. In 1840 he was sent as a missionary to Texas, where he remained three years. He was then transferred to the Alabama Conference, of which he continued to be a member until his death, though he remained in that State only three years; during these three years he was stationed, in turn, at Tuscaloosa, Livingstone, and Mobile. He was secretary of the Louisville Convention in 1845, at which the Methodist-Episcopal Church South was organized. In 1846 he was appointed by the General Conference to assist the late Bishop (then Dr.) Wightman as editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, S.C. While here, he started, and edited for four years, the Sunday-School Visitor. At the organization of the Southern Church he was elected general book editor, which office he continued to fill with eminent ability and with great acceptability till his death. In this capacity he edited over three hundred volumes. In 1855 he moved to Nashville, Tenn., where the publishing-house was located, and where he continued to reside until he died. He was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book, which he edited. He was considered an authority in hymnology, having devoted much time to its study. He was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. At the organization of Vanderbilt University he was elected professor of systematic theology; which position he retained until he died, being also dean of the theological faculty. He died, after only two days' illness, during the quadrennial session, in Nashville, of the General Conference, where for the tenth consecutive time he had been elected and was acting as secretary. Surrounded by his brethren and colleagues, he died, as he had wished, at the post of duty, in the midst of his labors, ceasing at once to work and live. Possessed of encyclopedic knowledge, always abreast of the times, thoroughly Wesleyan and Arminian in his creed, but in hearty sympathy with all evangelical denominations of Christians, simple as a child in faith, consecrated, earnest, outspoken, an uncompromising enemy of sin and error in whatever form, he was an ornament to Christianity and an honor to the church of his choice.

Dr. Summers is the author of the following works: Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans, in 6 vols.; Commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South: Christian Holiness; Baptism; Golden Censer; The Sunday-School Teacher, or the Catechetical Office of the Church; Seasons, Months, and Days; Talks Pleasant and Profitable; Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine; Way of Salvation; and some twenty other books and pamphlets on various doctrinal and practical subjects. SUMNER, John Bird, D.D., b. at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, 1780; educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; assistant master at Eaton, rector of Mayle Durlam, 1820-28; canon of Durham, 1820; bishop of Chester, 1828; archbishop of Canterbury, 1848; d. in London, Sept. 6, 1862. He was the leader of the "evangelical party" in the Church of England, and earnestly opposed to Romanism and the Oxford movement. His primacy covered the restoration of "Catholic hierarchy" to England, the "Essays and Reviews" controversy, and the revival of the synodical power of the convocations. His publications include Apostolic Preaching, considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles, London, 1815, 9th ed., 1850; Records of the Creation, 1816, 2 vols., 7th ed., 1850; Evidence of Christianity, 1821, 9th ed., 1861; Practical Exposition [of the New Testament], 1833-51, 9 vols.

SUN, Worship of the. The common Hebrew name for sun is shemesh; but in poetry chamamah and cheres are used. In Gen. i. 16 the sun is called the greater light, and is to serve, in conjunction with the moon, "to rule the day" (Gen. i. 11; Ps. cxxxix. 8; Jer. xxxi. 35) and the year; i.e., the solar year. The sun has not only been once created by God (Ps. lxxiv. 16; Gen. i.), but is always under his command. In the end of the earth he hath set a tabernacle for the sun (Ps. xix. 4; Hab. iii. 11); from thence he appoints his way (Ps. civ. 19), or "commandeth, and it riseth not" (Job ix. 7), and at his command the sun stands still (Josh. x. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11). He, and not the sun, is the God Sabaoth; before his glory the sun is no more light (Isa. xl. 19; Job xxv. 5). This is especially the case before the judgment of God (Joel ii. 10, 31, iii. 15; Isa. xiii. 10, xxiv. 23). As the sun was called into existence, there will also be once a time when it shall shine no more (Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxiii. 45; Rev. vi. 12, viii. 12, ix. 2, xxi. 23, xxii. 5). But the same God will make the light of the sun sevenfold (Isa. xxx. 26). The sun is also spoken of in scripture in a figurative sense. Thus the sun is used to express the image of the ruler (2 Sam. xxiii. 1), especially of his lasting government (Ps. lxxxix. 36, 37). The glory of the righteous is compared to the sun (Judg. v. 31), also the divine protection (Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Isa. lx. 20). The benefit, glory, and purity of righteousness is called the "Sun of righteousness" (Mal. iv. 2). Like brightness, the salvation of Zion and Jerusalem goes forth (Isa. lxii. 1). The sun is also the image of moral purity (Cant. vi. 10). Thus we read (Matt. xiii. 13) that "the righteous shall shine forth as the sun." But the sun is also the image of destruction (Ps. cxi. 6; Job xxx. 28, xlix. 10; Rev. vii. 16). Even poetical personifications are found in the Bible. Thus, when the sun praises God (Ps. civ. 19, cxlviii. 3; Job xv. 15, xxv. 5, xxxviii. 7), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, "and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race" (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be "ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxiv. 23).

Worship of the Sun among the Israelites. — To worship the sun was expressly forbidden (Deut. xvii. 3). This worship, which commenced during the Assyrian period, was abolished by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 5, 11; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4). It consisted in burning incense on the house-tops, in dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5), in adorations directed towards the rising sun (Ezek. viii. 16), in lamentations of the women for Tammuz (Ezek. viii. 11).

Worship of the Sun among the Adjacent Heathen Nations. — The worship of the sun as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. This worship was either direct, without the intervention of any statue or symbol, or indirect. Among the Egyptians the sun was worshipped under the title of Ra. The chief seat was On (sun, light), the Greek, Heliopolis, and Hebrew, Bethshemesh, [i.e., the house of the sun] (Jer. xliii. 13). To the temple at On belonged very many learned priests, one of whom became the father-in-law of Joseph (Gen. xli. 15). In an indirect manner the sun was worshipped as Amun-ra, "the king of all the gods," and which belonged to the first order of gods. To the second belonged Khnum-Hercules, the god of the pillars of the sun. The sun-god of the third order was Osiris. Among the Phœnicians the sun was worshipped under the title of Baal. At Tyro, Gaza, and Carthage, human sacrifices were offered to him. Among the Chaldeans the sun was worshipped under the title of Tammuz; and that the Arabians worshipped the sun we know from Theophrastus (De plant., 9, 4, 5) and Strabo (16, 781). Still more propagated was the worship of the sun among the Syriacs (Arameans). Famous temples were at Heliopolis, Emesa, Palmyra, Hierapolis. Sun-worship there was very old, and direct from the beginning; and even in later times, sun and moon were worshipped at Hierapolis without the intervention of any image (Lucian: De Deo Syria, cap. 34, p. 101). Among the pure Semites, or Argans, direct worship to the sun was paid from the beginning, and still later. Thus among the Assyrians, and afterwards among the Persians, whose sun-worship is one and the same. The idolatrous sun-worship of the Israelites, which since the time of Malaz is mentioned in connection with the worship of the moon and stars, first originated from the Assyrians. The dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11) we also find among the Persians (Herod. i. 189; Xenoph., Cyrop., 8, 3, 6; Quint. Curtius, 3, 3). Besides that the Persians offered to the sun (Herod. i. 31), they also directed their adoration towards the rising sun with branches in their hands (Zend Avesta, ii. 201; Herod., iv. 15, 1; Hyde: De relig. Persarum, 350). Up to this day the Persians worship the sun. The Manicheans also adopted the sun-worship from the Persians, referring it, however, to Christ (Ducris: Orig. de cultes, v. 211, vi. 267). In later times the sun was worshipped among the Persians under the form of Mithras, which finally became the Sol Deus invictus throughout the West, especially through the Romans.

The Sun in the Christian Church and Art. — The Mithras-worship even exercised its influence upon the fixing of the Christian Christmas-festival in December. As the new birth of the sun-god was celebrated at the end of December, so, likewise, in Christ the new sun in the field of spiritual life was adored. Many Christian writers of older times speak of Christ as the sun of eternal salvation, to which the visible sun, with moon and stars, form the chorus (KREIER: Symbolik, ii. 221, iv. 156 [1st ed.]). For the representation of the sun in Christian art, comp. Paint. Mythologie der christl. Kunst, i. 2, 116.

SUNDAY (Dies solis, of the Roman calendar, "day of the sun," because dedicated to the sun), the first day of the week, was adopted by the early Christians as a day of worship. The "sun" of Latin adoration they interpreted as the "Sun of righteousness." Sunday was emphatically the weekly feast of the resurrection of Christ, as the Jewish sabbath was the feast of the creation. It was called the "Lord's Day," and upon it the primitive church assembled to break bread (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). No regulations for its observance are laid down in the New Testament, nor, indeed, is its observance even enjoined, yet Christian feeling led to the universal adoption of the day, in imitation of apostolic precedent. In the second century its observance was universal. See Barnabas, c. 15; Ignatius, Epistola ad Magnes, c. 8, 9; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 67; Irenæus, Adv. Hæc. iv. 16; also Piny, Epi. x. 97. The Lord's Day was not a continuation of the Jewish sabbath, which was also at first observed, but a substitute for it. So long as the Christians were oppressed, they could not keep the day as one of rest from labor as they desired, and as they did after the union of Church and State. The Jewish Christians ceased to observe the sabbath after the destruction of Jerusalem. The Ebionites and Nazarenes kept up the habit even longer; and even to this day the Eastern Church shows traces of its observance by omitting fasting on Saturday, and enjoining standing in prayer. In the Latin Church, Saturday was a fast day, but Sunday was not; and the primitive habit of standing in prayer upon that day was abandoned. The Lord's Day was a time of public worship, with its attendant administration of the Eucharist. Experience abundantly demonstrates the wisdom of such weekly rest, and the blessedness of such a day of worship.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION. The institution of a weekly religious rest-day has existed, and its observance has been the subject of legislation, from very early times. Traces of such laws are found among the remains of Chaldean antiquity. The Assyrians had laws for the observance of their sabbath similar to those by which the sabbath was maintained among the Jews. Civil legislation in behalf of the observance of Sunday, as distinguished from ecclesiastical or purely religious ordinances, commenced with the famous statute of Constantine (321): "On the venerable day of the sun let all magistrates and people residing in the cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, persons engaged in agriculture may freely and lawfully continue their labor, because it often happens that another day is not so suitable for grain-sowing or for vine-planting, lest, by neglecting the proper moment for such operations, the bounty of Heaven be lost." Constantine subsequently prohibited lawsuits on Sunday, while expressly permitting such legal acts as the manumission of slaves and the visitation of prisoners. Theodosius the Great (386) prohibited the transaction of business on Sunday, as well as the shows or spectacles which had become customary on that day among the heathen Romans; to which succeeding emperors soon added the various other games and entertainments of the theatre and circus. The laws of Leo and Anthemius (469) provide that "the Lord's Day be exempt from all compulsory process; let no summons urge any man; let no one be required to give security for the payment of a fund held by him in trust; let the sergeants of the courts be silent; let the pleader cease his labors; let that day be a stranger to trials; be the crier's voice unheard; let the litigants have breathing-time and an interval of truce; let the rival disputants have an opportunity of meeting without fear, of comparing the arrangements made in their names, and arranging the terms of a compromise. If any officer of the courts, under pretence of public or private business, dares to despise these enactments, let his patrimony be forfeited."

These Roman laws are important as forming the basis of the English legislation on this subject, and consequently of the American Sunday laws.

The Lord's Day was embodied in the capitularies, or general statutes, of the Frank emperors; and its observance, as prescribed by canonical authority, was enforced by severe penalties. During the French Revolution of the last century, when the Christian calendar was abolished, and the decade substituted for the week, each tenth day was made a rest-day, and its observance enforced by laws (17 Thermidor, An. vi.) which required the public offices, schools, workshops, stores, etc., to be closed, and prohibited sales except of food and medicine, and public labor except in the country during seed-time and harvest. On the restoration of the Gregorian calendar, Sunday was recognized in the Code Napoleon. A law of 1814 prohibited traffic, ordinary labor, etc., on Sundays and certain church festivals. In 1880 this law was repealed; a provision for the suspension of certain civil and judicial functions on Sunday, and in regard to the employment on that day of young children and minor girls in factories, alone remaining.

In England, Sunday laws have existed from a very early date. Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 693), forbade servile work on Sunday. Alfred (876) prohibited work, traffic, and legal proceedings. His example was followed in subsequent reigns. Edgar (958) prohibited "heathenish songs and diabolical sports," and markets and county courts, and made Sunday to begin at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and to last "till Monday morning light." The laws of Canute (1028-35) strongly insisted on the observance of the Lord's Day; prohibiting marketing, hunting, and the holding of the local courts, except in case of great necessity. After the Conquest, the tendency to greater strictness in the Sunday laws continued. The statute of 28 Edward III. (1354) forbade the showing of wools at the market-town. The 12 Richard II. (1388) forbade servants and laborers to play at tennis and other games, yet ordered them to have bows and arrows, and use the same on Sundays. The statute of 4 Edward IV. (1464) forbade cordwainers and cobblers to sell shoes on Sunday. Under Henry VI. the holding of fairs and markets on Sunday was prohibited. The laws of 5 and 6 Edward VI., prohibiting "lawful bodily labor" on Sundays, allowed husbandmen, fishermen, and others to work in harvest, or at any other times when necessity required. This act was repealed under Queen Mary, but was formally revived under James I. Subsequently (1614) James I. issued The Book of Sports, allowing after divine service on Sundays certain games and recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty to "Papists and Puritans." The issuing of The Book of Sports created intense dissatisfaction, and it soon became a dead letter. Parliament, in the first year of Charles I., passed an act "for the strict observance of Sunday;" and another law of Parliament in 1627 (3 Car. I.) enacted that no carriers, or wagon-men, or drovers should travel on Sunday. In 1633 Charles I., under the supposed influence of Laud, re-issued his father's Book of Sports.

The statute of 29 Charles II. (1676) is the most important of the English laws on this subject, as that which, with some modifications, is still the law of the land, and which, as being in force at the time of the American Revolution, gave more or less color to the laws of the American Colonies and States. It prohibits on Sunday all worldly labor or business except works of necessity or charity, the public sale of goods, the travelling of drovers, wagoners, etc., the service of any legal process except in case of treason, felony, or breach of peace; but it permits the dressing of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, and the crying of milk before nine a.m., and after four p.m.

The early American colonists brought with them the observance of Sunday both as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforced this observance by law. The early laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, required attendance at church. The Massachusetts law (1782) provided that such attendance was not required where there was no place of worship which the person could conscientiously attend. But, as the separation between Church and State became better understood, the Sunday laws were modified in conformity with this principle. The legislatures and courts have carefully distinguished between Sunday observance as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforce only the latter. The laws of the several States differ in minor details, but are alike in their main features. They forbid on Sunday common labor and traffic, except in cases of necessity and mercy, public and noisy amusements, and whatever is likely to disturb the quiet and good order of the day. They make Sunday a non-legal day, when legal processes may not be served, nor the courts and legislatures sit. In many of the States some exception is made in favor of those who observe the seventh day of the week. In Louisiana — which before its admission was under the Code Napoleon, and where alone, of all the States, the common law is not in force — Sunday is merely recognized by law as a public holiday. In many of the States there are also laws, with special penalties, against the selling of intoxicating drinks on Sundays and election-days. The Federal Constitution provides that Sunday shall not be reckoned in the ten days within which the President may return a bill; and the Federal laws relieve the cadets of the military and naval academies from their studies on Sunday; and in the excise statutes distilling on Sunday is prohibited under a fine of one thousand dollars.

The constitutionality of the Sunday laws has been frequently affirmed by the highest courts of the several States, upon such grounds as the following: the right of all classes, so far as practicable, to rest one day in seven; the right to undisturbed worship, on the day set apart for this purpose, by the great majority of the people; the decent respect which should be paid to the religious institutions of the people; the value to the State itself of the Sunday observance, as a means of that public intelligence and morality on which free institutions are conditioned.

The spirit of modern Sunday laws is protection, not coercion. The need of civil intervention, especially to secure to the working-classes the seventh-day rest, becomes more and more imperative with the growth of industries and of the desire for rapid wealth. In evidence of this may be mentioned the petition, hitherto ineffectual, of working-men in Germany, for the help of legislation in obtaining a weekly rest-day. The Social-labor party of Germany, at their meeting at Gotha in 1875, announced as one of their demands in the present exigencies of society the prohibition of Sunday work.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. A Sunday school is an assembly of persons on the Lord's Day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and the ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor. As the family and the church are institutions of divine appointment, so the Sunday school has been approved by divine blessings.

1. BIBLICAL AUTHORITY AND FORM. — Godly instruction of the young and the ignorant has been in harmony with the divine government from the earliest history of the race. Although the word "school" does not occur in the Bible previous to the Babylonian captivity, instruction after the school methods was clearly known and practised from very early times; and not long after the captivity, no less than eleven different expressions for "school" were current in the Hebrew speech. Glimpses of the essential features of the school method appear in the early eras of biblical history. In patriarchal times the school, like the church, was in the family: the father was the teacher and the priest. Omitting a notice of the faithful religious instruction of the young by Abraham, Job, Jacob, Moses, and other patriarchs, and passing over the public training of children indicated by the pass-over service, by the reading of the law from Gerizim and Ebal in Joshua's time, and by the so-called schools of the prophets in the days from Samuel to Elijah, as well as the royal commission sent out by Jehoshaphat to re-establish religious instruction, and a similar movement in the time of Josiah, it will be sufficient here to notice simply the Bible school into which Ezra gathered the people with the children, requiring the priests as teachers to explain the meaning of the law of God, not unlike the instruction in the modern Sunday school (Neh. viii. 7, 8). See EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS.

In the New-Testament period, religious schools connected with the synagogue were found in every city and considerable village in the land. These schools were one branch of an extended system of religious instruction. Lightfoot finds four kinds of schools and teaching among the Jews: (1) The elementary school; (2) The teaching of the synagogue; (3) The higher schools, as of Hillel and Shammai; and (4) The Sanhedrin, or great school, as well as great judicatory, of the nation. Some have questioned the prevalence of the elementary schools in the time of Christ's childhood; but, according to the Talmud, synagogue schools were of earlier origin, and had become common. They used the Hebrew scriptures, and, later, little parchment rolls prepared for children. The Mishna says, "At five years of age let children begin the Scripture, at ten the Mishna, and at thirteen let them be subjects of the law." In this period a synagogue presupposed a school, as with us a church implies a Sunday school. Hence the church and Sunday school, not the church and the district school, is a parallel to the Jewish system. The methods in these schools were not unlike those of the modern Sunday school. Questions were freely asked and answered, and opinions stated and discussed; any one entering them might ask or answer questions. Such a Jewish Bible school, no doubt, Jesus entered in the temple when twelve years old. Paul was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel," a phrase which implies the customary posture of Jewish students at a school. The apostolic age was remarkable for the growth of these schools. Every town having ten men giving themselves to divine things was to have a synagogue; and every place having twenty-five boys, or according to Maimonides one hundred and twenty-five families, was compelled to appoint a teacher, and for forty or fifty boys two teachers. In the apostolic period teachers were a recognized body of workers quite distinct from pastors, prophets, and evangelists (see 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29; Eph. iv. 11; Heb. v. 12, etc.). The best commentators hold that the peculiar work of teachers in the primitive church was to instruct the young and ignorant in religious truth, which is precisely the object of the Sunday school. See SYNAGOGUES.

2. EARLY CHRISTIAN CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS. — These schools were a continuation and improvement of the Jewish synagogue schools. Mosheim and others place their wide prevalence as early as in the first century. Neander at a later date. These catechetical classes and schools were intended to prepare neophytes, or new converts, for church-membership, and were also used to instruct the young and the ignorant in the knowledge of God and salvation. They were effective, aggressive missionary agencies in the early Christian churches, and have aptly been termed the "Sunday schools of the first ages of Christianity." The pupils were divided into two or three (some say four) classes, according to their proficiency. They memorized passages of Scripture, learned the doctrines of God, creation, providence, sacred history, the fall, the incarnation, resurrection, and future rewards and punishments. Their books comprised parts of the Bible in verse, Jewish antiquities, sacred poems, and dialogues. The Sixth General Council at Constantinople (A.D. 680) required presbyters in country towns and villages to hold schools to teach all such children as were sent to them, taking no reward nor any thing therefor, except the parents made them a voluntary present. The Second Council at Chalons likewise required bishops to set up schools giving instruction in the Scriptures. In view of the missionary aim, and the graded and comprehensive instruction of these schools, it might be an interesting problem for a modern scholar to define important features of the present system not to be found in these primitive Bible schools. See CATECHETICS.

3. SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD. — Luther founded regular catechetical instruction on Sundays as early as 1529, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, had a system of schools 1560-84, almost identical in form with the present Sunday school. Children were gathered in two grand divisions, — boys and girls, subdivided into smaller groups or classes, with a minister for each class, aided by a layman for boys and a matron for girls. These schools were introduced into all the churches of his diocese, and are continued on much the same plan now, but without the Bible. The labors of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and the English Reformers, further prepared the way for the modern Sunday-school system. Legions of persons and places claim to have had Sunday schools previous to those in Gloucester. Among the many worthy of recognition, only the few following can be noted. Sunday schools were founded in Scotland about 1560, by John Knox; in Bath, Eng., 1630-68, by Joseph Alleine, author of "Alleine's Alarm;" in Roxbury, Mass., 1674; Plymouth, Mass., 1680; in England, by Bishop Frampton, about 1693; in Glasgow, Scotland, about 1707; in Bethlehem, Conn., 1740, by Dr. Joseph Bellamy; in Ephrata, Penn., 1739-40, by Ludwig Häcker, a school continuing for thirty years with gratuitous instruction, children's meetings, and having many revivals; at Brechin, Scotland, 1760, by Mr. Blair; at Catterick, 1763, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey; at Bodale, Eng., 1765, by Miss Harrison; at Waldbach, 1767, by Oberlin; at High Wycombe, 1769, by Hannah Ball; at Bright Parish, County Down, Ireland, 1770-78, by Dr. Kennedy; in Bohemia, 1773, by Kindermann; at Bolton, Eng., 1775, by James Heyes; at Macclesfield, Eng., by Rev. David Simpson, 1778.

1. MODERN SUNDAY SCHOOLS. — Sunday schools like those just noted were sporadic; there was need for a popular and general movement, bringing them into affiliation with each other, if not into an organized system. Of this great movement, Robert Raikes is justly regarded as the founder. He was a citizen of Gloucester, Eng., and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. Business calling him into the suburbs of that city in 1780, where many youth were employed in the pin and other factories, his heart was touched by the groups of ragged, wretched, and cursing children. He engaged four female teachers to receive and instruct in reading and in the Catechism such children as should be sent to them on Sunday. The children were required to come with clean hands and faces, and hair combed, and with such clothing as they had. They were to stay from ten to twelve, then to go home; to return at one, and after a lesson to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism; to go home at five quietly, without playing in the streets. Diligent scholars received rewards of Bibles, Testaments, books, combs, shoes, and clothing; the teachers were paid a shilling a day. Raikes published a brief notice of his efforts in the Gloucester Journal, Nov. 3, 1783 (copied into the London papers), and, later, another notice in the Gentleman's Magazine of London, which attracted wide attention. William Fox, already interested in the improvement of the moral condition of London youth, saw the notice, opened a correspondence with Raikes, urged the plan at public meetings, and with the aid of Jonas Hanway, Henry Thornton, and other philanthropists, formed the Society for Promoting Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominions, Sept. 7, 1785. From 1785 to 1800 the society expended about four thousand pounds for teachers' wages. The scheme commended itself to popular esteem. Learned laymen and influential persons became its warm friends. Among them were Mr. (afterwards Bishop) Horne, Bishop Porteus, the Bishops of Salisbury and Llandaff, Rev. Thomas Scott, the poet Cowper, Adam Smith, the Wesleys, and Whitefield. It, however, met with determined opposition from professors of religion, who questioned its usefulness. The then Bishop of Rochester violently attacked the movement, and the Archbishop of Canterbury called the bishops together to see what could be done to stop it. In Scotland, sabbath-school teaching by laymen was declared to be an innovation, and a breach of the Fourth Commandment. Sunday schools continued to multiply, however, in face of opposition, rapidly extending throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, upon the Continent, and in America. Though the Gloucester schools founded by Raikes died out in a few years, they were soon followed by others instituted on an improved plan. Following a meeting at Philadelphia, Dec. 19, 1790, attended by Bishop White, Dr. Rush, Matthew Carey, and other philanthropists, the First-Day or Sunday-school Society, was formed Jan. 11, 1791, to give religious instruction to poor children on Sunday. Like the British society, it employed paid teachers. It spent about four thousand dollars in support of schools between 1791 and 1800. As early as 1791 it urged the Legislature of Pennsylvania to establish free schools. This society still continues its usefulness, granting to needy schools in Philadelphia books and other religious publications. It has expended in these donations about thirty-five thousand dollars.

The schools of Raikes, and those of the British society and the First-Day Society of Philadelphia, employed paid teachers. Their chief aim was to reach, not the children of church-members, but of the poor and of those who neglected the church. The schools they established were purely mission Sunday schools. But paid teachers made the system expensive, and necessarily limited its usefulness. Next to founding these schools, the most important step was the securing of instruction by unpaid teachers. Sir Charles Reed says that Oldham, Eng., claims to have had the first Sunday-school teacher who declined to receive pay, and began the gratuitous instruction. John Wesley in 1787 speaks of Sunday schools at Bolton, Eng., "having eighty masters who received no pay but what they received from the great Master." In the famous Stockport Sunday school in 1791, only six of its thirty teachers were paid. In 1790 the Methodist Conference at Charleston, S.C., directed preachers to form Sunday schools for whites and blacks, with voluntary teachers. A Sunday school for Indian children was opened in Stockbridge, N.Y., in 1792, by a sister of Occum, the noted Indian preacher. The children working in a cotton-factory in Passaic County, N.J., were given gratuitous instruction in a Sunday school in 1794; and Samuel Slater had a similar one for his factory-operatives in Pawtucket, R.I., 1797. W. B. Guiney introduced gratuitous instruction into several Sunday schools in London, Eng., about 1796. He also used questions on Scripture-texts, and teachers' meetings, and, with the co-operation of Rev. Rowland Hill and others, formed the London Sunday-school Union at Surrey Chapel, July 13, 1803, to promote Sunday schools having unpaid teachers. A similar meeting at the same place in 1799 had founded the Religious Tract Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools. Gratuitous instruction speedily became a popular feature in the scheme, and in a short time was generally substituted for the earlier plan of paid teachers. Though the growth of the system had been remarkable before, so that, within five years after the beginning by Raikes, it was estimated that 250,000 scholars were enrolled in the schools then established, yet this new feature of voluntary teachers gave it a fresh impetus by adapting it to the needs of the poorest community in city or country. In America the movement was promoted by the visit of Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Bethune to England, who founded schools in New York on their return in 1803, and by the visit to Philadelphia of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary from London, in 1811, who had specimens of reward-tickets, and urged improved methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of Philadelphia. As a further illustration of the rapid growth of Sunday schools, the American Sunday-school Union estimated that in 1827 the number of scholars enrolled in the Sunday schools of the different countries was 1,350,000. According to the census of 1851 the number attending Sunday schools in England and Wales was 2,107,612; in Scotland, 292,519. The number reported for Ireland in the returns of the Sunday-school Society, and by other authorities, was 272,112; making the total for 1851 in Great Britain and Ireland, including the British Isles, 2,687,980. The total estimated number of schools for England, Wales, and Ireland, for the same year, was 27,018, and of teachers, 325,150. The number of Sunday-school scholars in America at the same period was estimated at about 3,000,000. In 1861 62 the number of Sunday schools in Ireland was 3,235, teachers 25,552, scholars 278,390; while a competent authority estimated the number under catechetical instruction in Roman-Catholic parishes in Ireland at 800,000. In 1862 J. Inglis estimated the Sunday schools in Scotland had 10,000 teachers and 180,000 scholars. A competent Welsh authority in the same year stated that 26.5 per cent of its population were in Sunday-school, which would give a membership for Wales of about 295,000; and W. H. Watson of London claimed that there were nearly 300,000 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars in the Sunday schools "of our land." The report of the International Convention in 1881 gave in the United States 81,750 Sunday schools, 932,283 teachers, 6,820,835 scholars, and, including the British and American Provinces, 90,370 schools, 975,195 teachers, and 7,177,165 scholars. The number reported at the Raikes centenary in 1880 for England and Wales was 122,222 teachers and 3,800,000 scholars, and, for the world, 1,559,823 teachers and 15,063,523 scholars. These statistics were gathered by voluntary organizations, and, though not giving satisfaction as to accuracy and completeness, are the best issued. (See statistics at end of this article.) A government census of Sunday schools was commenced in the United States in 1880, but was not completed. A tentative compilation of its reports showed upwards of 91,000 schools in this country.

Nor do numbers alone indicate the immense growth of Sunday schools. The great improvement in the modes of instruction, which will be treated in another paragraph; the beautiful and costly buildings, the ample, airy rooms with glass partitions, carpeted floors, fountains, flowers, and cushioned seats, for the accommodation of these schools in America, as compared with the dark and dingy apartments first provided; the wide enlistment of the ablest talent in the country in teaching, and also in providing lesson-helps and literature; the suitable grading of instruction; the substantial settlement of the right principles of religious education; the clear definition of the place of the Sunday school, not as a thing separate and apart from the church, but as all Christians at work teaching or learning the Lord's message to his church; the remarkable and constant influence this widespread instruction has had in lessening vice and crime, in diffusing a zeal for biblical study, in imparting greater familiarity to its one great text-book, the Bible,—each and all of these are forcible illustrations of the wonderful growth of this Christian institution in modern times.

Foreign Societies.—It is impossible, in this brief space to notice the many Sunday-school societies and organizations which have been formed to promote this cause. A brief description of some of the earlier and more important societies will illustrate the work conducted by all. The London Sunday-School Union—which was formed in 1803, for the improvement of teachers, the extension of Sunday schools, and to supply them with suitable literature at reduced prices—is sustained by members of different evangelical denominations, and conducted by a general committee of fifty-four, divided into various sub-committees. The members of the committee render their services gratuitously. It did not in its early history employ missionaries, but aimed to accomplish its object through the formation of local unions in Great Britain, more particularly in England, and also through affiliated schools. Influenced by the example of the American Sunday-school Union, it employed a missionary in the north of England for some years, but at his death, in 1837, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended in this Continental Mission nearly a thousand pounds annually for the past few years. Its chief work for eighty years has been the improvement of schools, the publication and distribution of juvenile religious literature, and the collection of Sunday-school statistics. It has on its catalogue a large number of books and publications, which it furnishes to schools connected with the society, in special cases, at from one-half to one-third regular prices. The amount of its grants for 1883 was 12,971; its affiliated schools numbered 5,286, having 123,599 teachers and 1,182,199 scholars. Over 16,000 scholars from its schools united with churches in 1883. In London 88 per cent, and in the country 81 per cent, of teachers were church-members; and 88 per cent of the teachers were former scholars in the schools. It maintains a circulating library, a museum, a reading-room, Hebrew and Greek classes, teachers' meetings, normal classes, and competitive examinations for teachers and scholars.

A sabbath-school society was formed in Edinburgh in 1797, and one for the support of Gaelic schools to teach the Scriptures, in 1811. These employed paid teachers; later, voluntary teachers were introduced. The labors of Stowe and James Call brought important improvements in the modes of instruction. The formation of various local sabbath-school unions at Edinburgh and Glasgow, the adoption of schools in the churches, holding conventions, employing missionaries, and the adoption of juvenile services, mark the progress of the work in Scotland. The Sunday-school Society for Ireland was formed in 1809. Among its publications, Hints on Conducting Sunday Schools had a wide sale, and was reprinted in America. The Church of England Sunday-school Institute began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844; and still sustains one of the best Sunday-school magazines issued. In 1881 it had returns from 8,105 parishes, representing 16,198 Sunday schools, 113,412 teachers, and 1,289,273 scholars. Estimating the same average membership for the 6,061 parishes not reporting, it computed the total number of scholars in England and Wales connected with the Church of England as about 2,220,000, and of teachers about 195,500. The Wesleyans of Great Britain formed a Sunday-school Union in 1874. The total number of Wesleyan Methodist Sunday schools in Great Britain and Ireland, according to their report for 1882, is 6,489; teachers and officers, 122,999; scholars, 829,666; library books, 781,176. The various Ragged School societies are efficient in promoting the cause in their respective fields. On the Continent, the Dutch, French, German, Swiss, and Italian Sunday-school societies are growing in importance and usefulness. In those countries the organization of schools on the American or class system of instruction was largely due to the efforts of Albert Woodruff of New York, about 1861, and, later, of the several missionaries of the London Union.

American Societies.—The First-Day or Sunday school Society of Philadelphia, formed in 1791, has been noticed. As early as 1808 the Evangelical Society was formed for promoting sabbath-evening schools in Philadelphia with voluntary teachers. The New-York Female Sunday-school Union and the New-York Male Sunday-school Union were formed in 1815, at the suggestion of Eleazar Lord, who had observed the working of the Sunday-school system in Philadelphia. The Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia was formed in 1817, to unite all the Sunday and adult associations in that city and vicinity. In 1821 it employed a missionary, who organized upward of sixty schools. It also issued a large number of Scripture tickets, cards, tracts, and small reward-books. After seven years of marked efficiency and usefulness, it, with other similar unions, was merged in a national society,—the American Sunday-school Union, in 1821. The Adult Union was at that time the largest society of the kind in the country, having auxiliaries in all the States, with over 700 schools and 50,000 scholars. The object of the American Sunday-school Union, as stated at its formation, "is to concentrate the efforts of sabbath-school societies in different sections of our country, to strengthen the hands of friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday school wherever there is a population." Twenty-one years later, when its charter was obtained, it states the object: "to establish and maintain Sunday schools, and to publish and circulate moral and religious publications." It is an undenominational society, conducted by representative laymen from different evangelical denominations; employs missionaries, lay and ministerial; and clergymen likewise co-operate in its work as editors, secretaries, and literary contributors. The first year it reported 321 auxiliaries, 1,150 affiliated schools, 11,295 teachers, 82,697 scholars; and it estimated the number of Sunday-school scholars in the world at over 1,000,000. Among the more important measures which have been inaugurated or promoted by this Union are the employment of missionaries to form Sunday schools; a world's concert of prayer (monthly) for Sunday schools, in 1825; a system of selected uniform lessons in 1826; the Mississippi Valley scheme for planting Sunday schools throughout that region in 1830; a teachers' magazine (monthly) in 1821, and a teacher's journal (weekly) in 1831; proposing a national Sunday-school convention in 1832; introducing a free circulating library for Sunday schools; a system of graded question-books; issuing cheap illustrated Sunday-school periodicals for children; providing suitable records and manuals for conducting and improving Sunday schools. Its missionary work is sustained by benevolent contributions; and the extent of it may be indicated by the report for the year ending March 1, 1883, showing 2,252 schools organized, with 10,376 teachers and 82,719 scholars. About 5,000 other schools were aided, with a membership of 162,000; 19,029 Bibles and Testaments were distributed, and 35,308 families visited for religious conference. Including 811,000 worth of publications given, it expended in the year's benevolent operations $29,019.51. During the fifty-nine years of its existence it reports over 71,000 Sunday schools organized, with 166,000 teachers, and upwards of 3,100,000 scholars in these schools; and has expended in missionary work $2,825,000, of which over $600,000 were given in books and papers to needy scholars. It has circulated by sale and donation, publications to the value of about $7,500,000.

The Massachusetts Sunday-school Union was formed in 1825 of delegates from different denominations, but disbanded, and the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society instituted in 1832,—a Congregational organization, which was consolidated with the Congregational Board of Publication in 1868. It employs secretaries and agents, and issues publications to promote Sunday schools among Congregational churches. The Sunday-school Union of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was formed in 1827, and re-organized in 1841, and has been very efficient in publishing and distributing literature through the preachers attached to its denomination. It does not employ Sunday-school missionaries. The Presbyterian and Baptist boards of publication have Sunday-school departments; they employ co-workers, who promote the extension of Sunday schools in connection with their churches, and distribute denominational literature. The (Dutch) Reformed Sunday-school Union soon after 1850 was merged in that of its publishing society. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, provide a denominational juvenile literature for schools in that church. The Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York, formerly auxiliary to the American Sunday-school Union, was incorporated in 1878, and labors to promote Sunday schools in foreign lands, chiefly on the continent of Europe.

Conventions.—Early in this century local Sunday-school conventions were held, especially from 1820 to 1830, in many of the Eastern and Middle States. In 1832, at the suggestion of the American Sunday-school Union, a national convention was held in New York, comprising two hundred and twenty delegates from fourteen States and Territories out of the twenty-four States and four Territories then comprising the United States. A second delegated national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1833, at which full reports and papers were presented as arranged for by the previous convention in New York. The chief work accomplished by these early national meetings was to discover and agree on the principles of a system of religious education. That of 1833 also adopted the recommendation of the American Sunday-school Union, that a systematic and simultaneous canvass of the entire country be made, to obtain scholars, and enlist parents in this work, on the 1th of July following. It also approved of a Uniform Series of lessons already introduced. A third national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1859, "marking a revival of interest in Bible study, and in religious training of the young." A world's convention was held in London, Eng., in 1862, at which papers ably discussing the methods and progress of the cause were presented. The fourth national convention in America was held at Newark, N. J., in 1869, attended by five hundred and twenty-six delegates representing twenty-eight States and seven countries; the fifth, at Indianapolis in 1872, marked by the adoption of the present International Series of Uniform Lessons, and the appointment of a general statistical secretary; the first international (sixth national) convention, at Baltimore in 1875; the second, at Atlanta in 1878; the third, at Toronto in 1881; and the fourth, at Louisville in 1884. Besides these, there have been State and local conventions in every part of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, which have given added impetus to the movement, and disseminated useful knowledge in regard to the methods of conducting, and teaching in Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which were very prevalent from 1860 to 1870, the "institute" has been widely ingrafted,—a modification of the convention, aiming to give instruction specially to teachers, rather than simply to create enthusiasm. The wide influence of conventions on the cause may be inferred from the statement that over five thousand were held in the United States in the year 1883. The "institute," exhibiting advanced methods of teaching and conducting Sunday schools, has also been popular since 1865. This form of meeting had likewise been adopted in England for many years previous to that date. Out of these institutes and conventions have come the "summer assemblies," among the most noted of which is that of Chautauqua, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., which has normal courses of study, lectures on teaching, a "literary and scientific circle" of about sixty thousand members, and classes in Hebrew, Greek, and other languages.

Organization.—The modern Sunday-school commonly has three departments, corresponding to three grades of instruction,—the primary or infant, the intermediate, and the advanced. In the intermediate grade the scholars are arranged in classes of from six to ten, with a teacher for each class; in the advanced grade the classes are somewhat larger. In the infant department, until recent years, it was usual to have only one or two teachers for the entire department, even when it consisted of from one hundred to two hundred pupils. The class system is being more widely introduced into the infant or primary grade of the best schools in America. The entire school is in the charge of a superintendent, with an assistant, a secretary, treasurer, and a librarian; the latter gives out the books from the circulating library in connection with the school, charging them to the teacher or scholar, and recording their return at each session. There are church and mission schools. Sunday schools are not intended to be a substitute for, but a supplement to, family and pulpit instruction. Schools in connection with a church are sustained and directed by the church. Mission schools are often established by Christians of different denominations in neglected portions of the country and of large cities. Sunday schools in the United States hold one session each sabbath; formerly many of them held two sessions. A few schools in the cities still hold two sessions, and this custom yet prevails widely in England.

Modes of Instruction and Literature.—The schools founded by Raikes were chiefly for the lower classes in the community, who were ignorant, and hence were taught the elementary branches of reading and writing, with oral instruction in the Catechism. Reading, and memorizing texts in the Bible, followed. Cramming the memory with large portions of Scripture and the Catechism seems to have been a hobby in Scotland, England, and America, for some time. Rev. J. Inglis states that children committed and repeated seven hundred texts every week, until limited to two hundred per week; and R. G. Pardee asserts, that, in the opinion of New-York physicians, it developed a brain-disease in children. James Gall, by his End and Essence of Sabbath-school Teaching and his Nature's Normal School, aimed to introduce a more sensible lesson system in Scotland, which was also used in some schools in America as early as 1820. Stowe's training system, giving prominence to pictorial methods of instruction, also aided in reforming this excessive use of the memory. The reform in America was completed by the introduction of the Uniform Limited Lessons, prepared in 1825, and adopted by the American Sunday-school Union and its three hundred or four hundred auxiliaries in 1826. This scheme contemplated a five-years' course of study for the whole Bible,—one and the same lesson for all, of from seven to fifteen verses, questions and comments in at least three grades, and reviews. It was national in its purpose. In 1829 Mr. Gall urged his lesson system upon teachers in England; and in 1830 regular lessons were furnished, with notes for the use of teachers. Following the wide use of the Uniform Series of Lessons of 1826 to 1832 and the Union Question-Books, in many American schools teachers "appealed to the imagination, and resorted to stories and anecdotes." In 1840 the London Sunday-school Union issued a List of Lessons for general adoption, adding lesson notes in 1842, which it claims to have continued uninterruptedly till the present time, now using the International Series. Mimpri's Graded Simultaneous Instruction for Sunday Schools, founded on the gospel history, and issued in 1841, was an attempt to have one lesson for the whole school; but it had only a limited use. In America, previous to 1865, where the series of "Union Questions" were not used, each school selected its own lessons (or had impromptu lessons); a method of instruction not inaptly termed the "Babel series" of lessons. Schemes of lessons for Sunday schools, with notes, were issued in the Sunday-school Teacher of Chicago, in 1865; and in 1867 B. F. Jacobs suggested uniform lessons anew. The desire for such a series increased, until in 1871 a meeting of Sunday-school publishers was held in New York, at the suggestion of the executive committee of the National Sunday-school Convention, which agreed upon a tentative scheme of uniform lessons for 1872. At the Indianapolis convention in that year, a lesson committee was appointed to arrange a course of lessons for seven years, covering the whole Bible, and which was recommended for the use of Sunday schools throughout the country. This committee was re-appointed and enlarged in 1878, to select a second seven-years' course, and again in 1881 to make a third seven-years' course of Bible-lessons. In 1875 the lessons were reported to be in use in the United States of America, Great Britain, most of the countries of Europe, in Syria, Hindostan, India, and China, in Mexico, Australia, and the Sandwich Islands; and in 1881 it was claimed that this system of study had "created a literature of its own," and has quickened thorough and intelligent Bible-study in the whole English-speaking world." Comments on the text of these lessons have multiplied like the leaves of the forest, publishers issuing notes, questions, and lesson-leaves, and even secular papers give regular weekly comments upon the Sunday-school lesson. The most learned pastors, professors in colleges and seminaries, have contributed the results of their ripest study and scholarship in exposition of these lessons; and Christian publishers vie with each other in producing the best and cheapest helps thereon. In England other series of lessons are used concurrently with the International Series; while schools of the Established Church, and of the Episcopal and some other churches in America, adopt different series of lessons.

When the modern Sunday-school movement began, a century ago, juvenile religious literature did not exist. The Pilgrim's Progress, Watt's Divine and Moral Songs, a few catechisms and similar books, comprised the religious works specially prepared for children at that day. The earliest Catechism in the English language was issued in 1120; one by Crammer, in 1519; and a Short Catechism in Latin and English, in 1553; the Westminster Catechism, in 1617; and Watt's First and Second Catechisms, in 1729-30. Luther also issued his catechisms in 1529. The early books of instruction in Sunday schools in England and Ireland were chiefly spelling-books and reading-books having portions of Scripture. Later, texts of Scripture on small cards, called "red and blue tickets," were given out as rewards to scholars, and also small books. Sometimes, as a reward, the teacher or superintendent would loan books to a scholar to read. Gradually a juvenile religious literature was developed by the desire of Sunday scholars for reading, and the circulating library in connection with each school was introduced, owing largely to the earlier work and issues of the American Sunday-school Union. It is impossible to state the number of books, lesson-helpers, and periodicals, now issued. Dr. John S. Hart in 1870 estimated the number of publishing-houses and religious societies engaged in issuing Sunday-school library books at not less than thirty-six, with a capital of $5,000,000; the whole number of current Sunday-school library books at 7,000, and that the rate of issue for several years had exceeded one a day, reaching 131 in 1568. The number of books, periodicals, and lesson-helpers for Sunday schools, has vastly increased in the last decade by the introduction of the International lesson system and other improvements, and is so extensive that it would be hopeless to attempt to gather statistics respecting them. Among the representative journals specially devoted to Sunday schools, the foremost are The Sunday-school Times, in America, edited by H. Clay Trumbull, D.D.; The Sunday-school Chronicle, issued by the London Union; and the English Sunday-school Times, which are weekly journals. The Sunday-school Journal (Methodist), the Baptist Teacher, the Westminster Teacher, the Sunday-school World (London), the Church Sunday-school Magazine of London, the Westman Sunday-school Magazine, and the Sabbath-school Magazine of Glasgow, Scotland, are among the prominent monthly teachers' periodicals now issued.

(Editor of the American Sunday-school Union).

SUPEREROGATION. The doctrine of works of supererogation (opera supererogatoria) is based on the distinction between precepta and consilia evangelica. The former it is the duty of every man to obey, but the fulfilment of the latter establishes a merit. The doctrine has never been an article of faith in the Roman-Catholic Church; the Council of Trent is silent upon the matter. But in the practice of the church it has played a most disastrous part as the true foundation of the doctrine of indulgences, which art. see.

SUPERSTITION. The derivation of the Latin term superstitio is doubtful. Cicero can hardly be right when he says (De nat. deor., ii. 28), Qui totos dies precabantur et immolabant, ad sui salutem superstitibus essent, superstitionibus esse appellatos. Lactantius is also wrong when he says (Inst. div., iv. 28) those are called superstitious who revere the

The statistics for the United States were compiled by F. Payson Porter, statistical secretary, International Convention, for England and Wales, by F. B. memory the dead leave behind (superstitum), or who, having outlived their parents (parentibus superstitibus), worship them in their homes as penates. The Greek term deudaia was used both for true as well as errant religious devotion. It occurs only in the latter sense in the New Testament (Acts xvii. 22, xxv. 19). [It may well be doubted whether this statement is correct. Paul would not offend and repel the Athenians by calling them "too superstitious;" but he rather compliments them for being "over-religious" in their groping after the "unknown God."]

Superstition is always a false and erring faith. It is a misunderstanding of the bearing of supernatural forces upon the visible world, and of visible forces upon the supernatural world, and contradicts reason and revelation. Superstition always involves a supernatural element. It has often happened that men have combined great knowledge with superstition, which is also as much incident to unbelief as to an unreasoning belief. Voltaire, a man of much learning and of unbelief, was more than once deterred from following his inclinations by the fear which bad omens inspired. Robespierre, Napoleon, Josephine, and the Emperor Alexander, all alike consulted Marie Lenormand, [a French necromancer, who died June 25, 1843]. Our cultivated classes, who pride themselves upon their knowledge, have patronized spiritualistic sciences more frequently than the masses have.

Superstition has assumed as many forms as there have been false conceptions of the Deity, and its relation to the world. It has three phases when regarded as modifying the conception of the Deity. (1) It mixes up imperfect notions with true ones of God and his activity. From this point of view all non-Christian religions are superstitions. Fetishism is crass superstition. The dualistic systems of Asia are more intellectual, but no less superstitions. (2) Superstition has also represented fate as a force above or at the side of God. This idea is found almost everywhere in heathenism, as a monotheistic element in the midst of polytheism. (3) Superstition has also placed at the side of God supernatural beings, good and bad, who are regarded as more or less dependent upon him. Ghosts, elves, dragons, witches, etc., belong to this class.

Another class of superstitions is derived from man's faith that he possesses a certain magical power of influencing the Deity, fate, and the world of spirits. This is called magic, sorcery, witchcraft, etc. The belief in pilgrimages, the wonderful cures of Lourdes, the efficacy of the blood of St. Januarius, belong here. Days and signs are regarded as having a relation to fate. Friday is superstitiously held to be an unlucky day. The breaking of a glass, the falling of the bridal ring, the appearance of a comet, etc., are looked upon as unlucky omens. Sorcery is one of the products of the belief in fate.

Superstition is the product of an unregulated fancy, a deficiency of religious strength. It is immoral, and for that reason transforms Christian theism into polytheism, dualism, or spiritualism. It is the most dangerous despot of the human mind; asserting, as it does, full authority to override the laws of sound thought. It has led to great cruelties and enormities. We need only recall the trials of so-called witches. Superstition, however, is better than unbelief, although harder to cure. We agree with Jean Paul when he says, "I would rather be in the densest atmosphere of superstition than under the air-pump of unbelief. In the former case, one breathes with difficulty; in the latter, one is suffocated." RUD. HOFMANN.

SUPRALAPSARIANISM, a theory held by the strictest Calvinists, according to which God not only foresaw and permitted, but actually decreed, the fall of man, and overruled it for his redemption; it being supposed that nothing could happen independently of the divine will. It is logically the most consistent type of Calvinism, but borders on fatalism and pantheism, and hence was excluded from the Reformed Confessions, all of which deny emphatically that God is the author of sin. See INFRA-LAPSARIANISM and SCULAP-SARIANISM.

SURIUS, Laurentius, b. at Lübeck in 1522; d. at Cologne, May 23, 1578. He was educated in the Protestant faith, and studied at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Cologne; but in the latter place he became acquainted with Canisius, embraced Romanism, and entered the Carthusian order in 1550. He was a prolific writer. In opposition to Sleidan's celebrated work on the Reformation, he wrote a Commentarius brevis, etc., 1566; but the performance is rather weak: he accuses the Reformers of having borrowed their doctrines from Mohammed. His best work is his Vita Sanctorum ab Aloysio Lipomanno olim conscripta, Cologne, 1570-75, 6 vols. fol. [often reprinted; e.g., Turin, 1875 sqq., 12 vols. "He was the first who used a sound criticism in narrating the lives of the saints." — Darling.] NEUDECKER.

SURPLICE (Latin, superpelliceu, "overgarment") is a loose white linen garment, a modification of the alb, dating back to the end of the twelfth century. It is worn by clergymen of the Church of England during celebration of service, as also by clergymen of the Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish churches, but by them only during celebration of the Lord's Supper.

SUSO, Heinrich, b. at Überlingen, March 21, 1295; d. at Ulm, Jan. 25, 1365. He was educated in a Dominican monastery in his native city, studied theology at Cologne, and became an enthusiastic disciple of Eckart; but, having more imagination and sentiment than true speculative talent, he gave his mysticism quite a different form, and became the representative of the poetical mysticism of the middle ages. The idea never satisfied him until it assumed the form of personality, and became clothed with all loveliness and perfection. Thus arose before his eyes from the Solomonian writings the Eternal Wisdom, sometimes identified with Christ, and sometimes with the Virgin. In order to become the true servant of his ideal, he retired to the Dominican monastery where he was educated, devoted himself to a life of severe asceticism, and wrote his book, Von der ewigen Weisheit, 1338. In 1340 he began to preach, stopped for several years in the monastery of Winterthur, and, later on, in a monastery in Ulm; formed connections with Tauler, Heinrich from Nordlingen, the Friends of God; founded brotherhoods, for which he wrote rules; and called many individual converts back from the world. His collected works, which give no consistent system, most of the materials having been derived from other mystics, consist of three parts,—on the eternal wisdom, on the eternal truth, and a narrative of his own inner-history. They appeared at Augsburg in 1182; last ed. by Diepenbroek, Ratisbon, 1829 (2d ed., 1835). The book, Von den neun Felsen, often ascribed to Suso, is by Rulman Merswin. C. SCHMIDT.

SUTTON, Christopher, b. in Hampshire, Eng., 1565; entered Hart Hall, Oxford, 1582; soon transferred to Lincoln, of which he proceeded M.A., 1589; held several livings, and was prebendary of Westminster, 1605, and of Lincoln, 1618; d. 1629. He was pious, eloquent, and admired. He wrote Disce mori (Learn to die), Lond., 1600, frequently reprinted (modern edition, with memoir, 1839, Oxford, 1850); Disce vivere (Learn to live), Lond., 1608 (modern edition, 1553); Godly meditations upon the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, 1622, 13th ed., 1677 (modern edition, with preface by John Henry Newman, Oxford, 1844, again 1866). See sketch in Wood: Athen. Oxon., Bliss edition, vol. ii. pp. 456 sq.

SWAIN, Joseph, a hymn-writer of marked talent; was b. at Birmingham, 1761; and d. in London, April 14, 1796. He was originally apprenticed to an engraver. Removing to London, he was baptized by Dr. Rippon, 1783, and from June, 1791, was a successful Baptist minister. His Walworth Hymns, 1792, while abrupt and unequal, are strong, fervid, spontaneous, and marked by frequent bursts of a really poetic imagination. They have been most extensively used by extreme Calvinists, but some of them may be found in almost every collection. F. M. BIRD.

SWEDEN. Christianity was first preached in Sweden by Ansgar. No doubt the Swedes, like the Danes and the Norwegians, had long before that time become acquainted with Christianity on their commercial and piratical expeditions, but only in a vague and indefinite way. Ansgar made two voyages to the country, in 830 and 857. On his first visit he made Hergir, one of the most distinguished men in the country, a zealous Christian; and by his aid a congregation was formed, and a chapel was built, at Birka. In 831 Gantbert was consecrated Bishop of Sweden, and went thither with his nephew Nithard. But even Hergir's authority was not sufficient to keep the irritated heathens within bounds. They broke into Gantbert's house, and murdered Nithard. The chapel was destroyed, the bishop fled, and when Hergir soon after died, the cause of Christianity seemed lost in Sweden. On his second visit Ansgar came with letters of recommendation from the emperor, with great pomp and costly presents; and, having won the favor of the king, he succeeded, at a great assembly of all the freemen of the people, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansfried, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and the congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his company, who, in the reign of Olat Skotkonung (d. 1021), began the work of converting the Swedish people. It was completed during the reign of Eric the Saint (1150-60), when the first monasteries—Alvastra, Nydala, and Wadhem—were founded. Originally Sweden belonged to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen; but in 1163 it obtained its own metropolitan (settled at Upsala), with the suffragan sees of Skara, Linköping, Strängnäs, Westeras, Wexio, and Abo.

In Sweden the Roman-Catholic Church struck deeper roots than in either of the other two Scandinavian countries, perhaps because the Swedes are a more imaginative and impulsive people, with ready enthusiasm for any thing grand and magnificent. Nevertheless, after the great political revolution in 1523, the Reformation worked its way among the people, without meeting any considerable opposition. Gustavus Vasa found the church in a miserable condition, and addressed himself to Pope Adrian VI. with complaints, and proposals of reform; but he received no answer. He then undertook to reform the church himself; and in the two brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, and their friend Lars Anderson, he found the fit instruments by which to work. The Swedish translation of the Bible appeared in 1526. At an assembly at Oerebro in 1529, all the reforms which had been introduced by the government on the advice of Luther were sanctioned by the Swedish clergy. Laurentius Petri was consecrated the first evangelical bishop of Sweden. Under Eric XIV. (1560-68) the country was opened as an asylum for all persecuted Protestants. Very soon, however, controversies broke out between the Lutherans and the Reformed; and the Roman Catholics were not slow in availing themselves of the opportunities of the situation. Johan III. (1568-92) actually leaned towards Romanism. He restored the monasteries, and re-introduced images, prayers for the dead, and other Roman ceremonies. The Jesuit Antonio Possevo arrived in Sweden under the guise of an imperial ambassador, but in reality as a papal legate; and the king is said to have secretly but formally embraced Romanism. After his death the assembly of Upsala (1593) took the necessary precautions for the preservation of the Evangelical Church; but how long a Roman-Catholic party continued lingering in Sweden may be seen from the fact that Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, became a convert to Romanism, 1656.

The protracted though never violent contest with Romanism had a double influence on the Swedish church: on the one side it retained more of the hierarchical organization of the Church of Rome than either the Danish or the Norwegian Church, and on the other it also became more exclusive and intolerant. By the introduction of the Reformation the clergy did not lose their political power: they continued to form the fourth estate of the diet of the realm until the revision of the constitution in 1865-66. And how this power was used may be inferred from the fact, that, down to 1860, the conversion from Lutheranism to any other denomination was punished with exile, and confiscation of property. Full religious liberty, that is abolition of all connection between civil rights and religious faith, was not introduced until 1877. The consequences are, that, of the 4,578,901 inhabitants of Sweden (in 1879), only an insignificant percentage belongs to other denominations, while the internal state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden by no means can be pronounced healthy. In the present century widespread religious movements (the Readers, the followers of Eric Jansen, etc.) have occurred among the lower classes; showing not the least trace of sectarianism, but giving ample evidence that the spiritual wants of the masses are not duly administered to. They wanted no other theology than that developed by Lutheran orthodoxy, but they wanted more practical religion than that offered by the Swedish Church; and it can hardly be doubted that the emigration, which of late has assumed such dimensions as to frighten the government, is caused as much by the barrenness of the Swedish church as by the poverty of the Swedish soil. It is also a significant fact, that during the last ten years the number of theological students has decreased so much, that it has not always been possible to provide every parish with a pastor. SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was b. in Stockholm, Sweden, on the 29th of January, 1688, and d. in London on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1772. His father's name was Jesper Swedberg; his mother's, Sarah Behm. He was well born. He descended from families of successful and opulent miners, and combined in his nature the energy, insight into the qualities of material substances, and the practical good sense, which such an employment, followed from generation to generation, would tend to produce.

But little is known of his mother. His father was a clergyman, who gradually rose to be chaplain of the court, professor in the university of Upsal, and dean of its cathedral, Bishop of Skara, and superintendent of the Swedish churches in America, London, and Portugal. In 1719 the family of Bishop Swedberg was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora with the name of Swedenborg, which entitled the family to seats in the diet, — a privilege which Swedenborg in due time enjoyed. Bishop Swedberg was simple in his habits, direct in his action, and courageous to attack evil and error wherever he found it, — in king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influence in determining the mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

He was well educated. But little is known of his early life. The following account, written by himself, gives us a glimpse of the qualities and natural bent of his mind. "From my fourth to my tenth year," he says, "I was constantly occupied in thought upon God, salvation, and the spiritual experiences of men; and sometimes I revealed things at which my father and mother wondered, saying that angels must be speaking through me. From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith; saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which inparts life is love to the neighbor, also that God gives faith to every one, but only those receive it who practise that love." Nurtured by such a love, and penetrated by the influences of a pure home and a cultivated society, by which his native endowment became imbued with pure and true principles of life, he spent his early years. These influences and principles formed the groundwork and best part of his education.

In 1709, at the age of twenty-one years, he graduated from the university of Upsal with the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the following year he set out on his travels, at that time an essential part of a young man's education. His mind had now taken a strong bent towards mathematics and the natural sciences, especially in their application to practical use. He sought access to every man in his power from whom he hoped to gain any knowledge upon his favorite studies. He declares that he has an "immoderate desire" for his studies, especially for astronomy and mathematics. But this was not an aimless desire, looking only to the gratification of his thirst for knowledge. He always, even in these early years, regarded knowledge as a means to a practical end. This was a dominant quality of his mind. He even turned his lodgings to use in gaining practical knowledge; living with a watchmaker for a time, afterwards with a cabinet-maker, and then with a mathematical-instrument maker, that he might learn from their arts which would be useful to him and to his country. But he did not let his thirst for knowledge absorb his whole thought and affection. When he found that his intense devotion to study prevented him from being as "sociable as is desirable and useful to him, and as his spirits were somewhat exhausted, he took refuge for a short time in poetry, that he might be somewhat refreshed by it, but with the intention of returning to his mathematics again, in which he intends to make more discoveries than any one else in his age."

He now spent five years abroad; passing his time in London, Holland, Paris, and Germany. His mind was open to every phase of human life. He examined the customs, habits, and character of the people, and the influence of their institutions and industries upon them. He returned home with his mind enlarged and enriched with knowledge gained by observation, experience, and intercourse with learned men, and teeming with new inventions and plans for giving them a practical test.

In 1716, a year after his return from his travels, he was appointed by Charles XII., king of Sweden, assessor extraordinary in the College of Mines. This office gave him "a seat and a voice in the college, whenever he was present, and especially whenever any business was brought forward pertaining to mechanics;" though he was particularly directed in the royal commission "to attend Polheim, the councillor of commerce, and to be of assistance to him in his engineering works and in carrying out his designs." This appointment brought him for a time into personal relations with the king, who was fond of mathematics, and to whom Swedenborg rendered great service by constructing machines by means of which two galleys, five large boats, and a sloop were conveyed overland a distance of fourteen miles.

Swedenborg now devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office. These duties did not require oversight of the practical workings of the mines so much as inquiry into the nature of the elements the miners dealt with. He began to study the nature of heat and the constitution of matter. In the pursuit of this purpose he made several visits abroad, examined the mines and the methods of working them in other countries, and gained knowledge from every source to which he could get access that would throw light upon the subjects he was investigating, and be of any practical value to his country. He continued in this office for more than thirty years, to the satisfaction of his countrymen and the interests of science. During this time he had written and published a great number of works, comprising all branches of science. A catalogue of his writings shows that he had written seventy-seven distinct treatises, some of them of a directly practical nature, others upon the profoundest subjects of scientific research, in the investigation of which he showed the most penetrating insight, and anticipated many of the important discoveries of modern times. Says a recent writer, "Among all the men who rose to eminence in any of the departments of natural science during his time, it would be difficult to name one whose labors in the different departments of applied science it would be more interesting or more profitable to dwell upon." After giving the titles of his scientific and literary works, he adds, "The ability to treat such a variety of topics, and most of them, I may add, upon the authority of perfectly competent testimony, as no other man of his time could have treated them, is due to qualities of mind and character which have not received from his biographers the attention they merit. There was no kind of knowledge which could be made useful to his fellow-creatures that he thought it beneath him to master, or which he neglected an opportunity of mastering."

Having attained the highest rank among the scientists and philosophers of his time, and being in favor with the king and royal family and his countrymen, he laid aside his philosophical and scientific studies, and turned his attention wholly to questions of a spiritual and religious nature. The end he was seeking led directly to this result, though he reached it in a manner most unexpected to himself. He had been for some years in search of the soul, and had written four large octavo volumes, the first two of which were called the Economy of the Animal Kingdom, and the others, the Animal Kingdom, in which he describes his methods and their results. Before the last work came from the press, he had an experience which changed the direction and character of his studies for the rest of his life. After giving an account of his studies and works up to the present time, he says, "But all that I have thus far related I consider of little importance; for it is far transcended by the circumstance that I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared before me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world, and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels; in which state I have continued up to the present day. From that time I began to print and publish the various arcana that were seen by me, or revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, the state of man after death, the true worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, and many other important matters conducive to salvation and wisdom."

From this time until his death, a period of nearly thirty years, he devoted himself entirely to the new work committed to him. He resigned his office as assessor, discontinued his scientific studies, and turned his attention to those subjects which were necessary to the performance of his work. He learned Hebrew, and read the Word attentively and critically in its original languages, and showed the same systematic diligence, and sincere devotion to truth, that he had exhibited in his scientific works. Though claiming special illumination and direction by the Lord, his writings conclusively show that his illumination was gradual, and subject to immutable spiritual laws. His theological works, devoted to an exposition of the spiritual meaning of the Word, to the doctrines of spiritual truth derived from the Word so interpreted, and to what he claims to have seen and heard during his intrinism into the spiritual world, comprise about thirty octavo volumes, and give the most ample means for testing the truth of his claims. To this test they must finally come. They cannot be established or destroyed by assertion or personal authority. They must stand or fall by the only infallible test,—their accordance with the immutable laws of the divine order.

Whatever may be the result of this weighing in the balances of divine truth, with regard to his seership and his claim to be divinely commissioned to reveal new truth to men, the unprejudiced mind can hardly fail to conclude that Swedenborg was in many respects the most remarkable man of his own or of any age.

He had a peculiar genius, which amounted almost to intuition, for penetrating into the secret causes of natural phenomena, while at the same time he was faithful to facts and experience, which he followed as constant guides. He was an unselfish and devout lover of the truth. Regarding it as the order of the divine wisdom, he valued it above all other possessions, and followed wherever it led. He was eminently practical, and valued truth for its use far more than for its beauty and possession. While a member of the Diet, and engaged in writing his religious works, he prepared some of the best papers that were presented on finance, the currency, and other questions concerning the conduct of civil affairs. He saw the evils of intemperance, and proposed measures to prevent them. He was a welcome guest in the highest social circles; and, though absorbed in the great work which he believed had been committed to his hands, he did not forget the children and those who served, with whom he was a great favorite. He was a sincere and devout Christian. Though living in a sceptical age, there is no evidence that he ever doubted the existence of a Supreme Being, and his direct control of human affairs; even his scientific works contain many devout acknowledgments of his dependence upon him for every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. It is a significant fact, that at the present time, more than a century since his decease, his life and works, both scientific and religious, are receiving more attention than ever before. A brief statement of his theology can be found in the article on the NEW-JERUSALEM CHURCH.

SWIFT, Elisha Pope, D.D., b. at Williamstown, Mass., April 12, 1792; d. at Allegheny, Penn., 1865; grandson of Hon. Heman Swift, Revolutionary colonel, by fifth remove descended from John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians;" converted at twenty; graduated from Williams College with honor in 1813; studied theology at Princeton; licensed by New-Brunswick presbytery in 1816; ordained as foreign missionary, Sept. 3, 1817; preached and lectured for missions; no foreign field opening, settled as pastor at Dover, October, 1818, then at Pittsburgh, in Second Church, in 1819; during this pastorate served gratuitously in 1827-28 as professor in Western Theological Seminary; resigned in 1831 to become corresponding secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. From 1835 till his death he was pastor of First Church in Allegheny City.

Dr. Swift was in character consecrated, impressively devotional, humble, transparently sincere, careless of man's applause, and sedulous to please God; in mind, powerful, comprehensive, original; in preaching, massive and effective, a "Webster" in the pulpit; in public spirit, eminent; forward in educational zeal as a friend and a founder of the Western University and of the Western Theological Seminary; as a presbyter, always a leader.

But foreign missions stirred him most deeply, and therein he accomplished his most remarkable work. He had the fore-sight to see the necessity of distinctive church-organization in giving the gospel to the world, the courage to plead for it in the face of opposition and misunderstanding, the organizing power to give it actual existence, and the mingled gentleness and force to secure the adoption and success of the principle with the least possible friction. The Western Missionary Society of 1831, an undertaking, under the circumstances, of moral sublimity, became, "as was intended at its very outset" (Dr. Swift), "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Swift was the originator of the first, and is deservedly considered the father of the second. His comprehension of missionary principles has never been surpassed; and his writings are standards still for fervor, intelligence, insight, and the glowing confidence of faith. SYLVESTER F. SCOVILL.

SWITHUN, St. (SWITHUN, SWITHUM), Bishop and patron of Winchester; d. July 2, 862. He was of noble birth, educated in the Old Monastery, Winchester, where, after his ordination (830), he was made provost, or dean. Egbert, king of the West Saxons, committed his son and successor, Ethelwolf, to his care, and availed himself of his counsel. Ethelwolf, on his accession, made him his minister, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, and in 852 procured his election to the see of Westminster. St. Swithun's Day is July 15; because on that day, in 961, his relics were moved from the churchyard where he had been buried at his own request, so that his grave might be trodden on by passers by, to the Cathedral of Winchester. There is a saying, demonstrably erroneous, "If it rain on St. Swithun's Day, there will be rain, more or less, for forty succeeding days." See BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, July 15.

SWITZERLAND. 1. Introduction of Christianity, and Outline of Ecclesiastical Affairs to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century.—In the middle of the third century Christianity was established in Geneva by Bishops Parakodus and Dionysius of Vienne. From Geneva the new religion spread to Wallis, and then to other parts of the land, the way for it, very likely, prepared by Roman Christian soldiers; but its history is enveloped in great darkness. By the sixth century this wave of Christianity, coming from France, had exhausted itself. Six bishoprics had, however, been established,—Geneva, Sitten, Lausanne, Chur, and Constance. Then came Columban and the monks of St. Gall, and evangelization was given a fresh start. Christianity at length was everywhere embraced. It was, as elsewhere, Oriental in type. Monasticism was its highest development. Monasteries kept on multiplying; yet they were, with the exception of St. Gall, so far from being centres of learning, that, in the fourteenth century, no member of the one in Zurich knew how to write. But in 1460 the first Swiss university (Basel) was founded, and at once a change for the better set in. A printing-press was set up, first at Beromünster (1470), and then at Basel and Geneva; and an abbot of Einsiedeln, Albert of Bonstetten, wrote a history of the Burgundian War, and described the Confederacy. The number of parishes and the might of the bishops had increased, likewise, very greatly, since the eighth century. In 1228 the see of Lausanne embraced 301 parishes, and yielded the bishop 60,000 ducats annually. The see of Constance, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, embraced 330 cloisters, 1,760 parishes, and 17,000 priests. The six Swiss bishops were princes of the Holy Roman Empire; the abbots of St. Gallen, Einsiedeln, Pfäfers, Disentis, and Muri were princes. The church was rich and splendid; but it was luxurious and lax, and not entirely able to carry out its plans; on the contrary, everywhere was opposition to its politics and its doctrines. In the fight between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. Western Switzerland sided with the emperor. The clergy were forced to pay their taxes, like other people. Whole districts purchased their independence of the church. No attention was paid to interdicts, episcopal or papal. The Basellers in 1323 threw into the Rhine the Papal legate who would publish the ban among them. The sermons of Heinrich and Arnold of Brescia, full of intimation of religious changes, were listened to attentively. The Zurichers in 1274, and again in 1331, set before their priests the alternative, either to lay down their ecclesiastical functions, or to leave the city.

At the end of the fifteenth century there were increasing symptoms of the imminency of relief from the intolerable burden of ecclesiastical criminality. Nevertheless, the church everywhere exercised its wonted power over the majority of the people. The Waldenses had shown themselves in the cantons of Bern and Freiburg in 1399, but had quickly been suppressed. The councils of Constance (1414-18) and Basel (1431-43) had only shaken the pillars of the Papacy, not broken them. The Swiss cities of Bern and Zurich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

II. The Period of the Reformation from 1519 till 1566.—In Switzerland as in Germany, the Reformation was carried through in consequence of the capacity of its leaders, the readiness of the people, and the favorable political situation. The Pope, for his own ends, had loosened the Swiss Confederacy; and this state of things wrought against the Papacy. The birthday of the Reformation for Switzerland is April 13, 1525, when in Zurich, under the guidance of Zwingli, who had since 1519 preached Reformed doctrine, the first Reformed Eucharist was celebrated. The next year the canton of Zurich was read out of the Confederacy for its heresy. But this act of arrogance stirred only the deeper the Swiss desire for liberty, and love for independence; and the effort to raise the religious question into a political one aborted. The Reformation before 1529 had carried the day in all the German cantons.

But this happy result had come about in no easy fashion. The Anabaptists had given no end of trouble. The seven Catholic cantons—Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Luzern, Freiburg, and Solothurn—were arrayed against the Protestant; and in May, 1529, Jacob Kaiser was for the Reformed faith burnt at the stake in Schwyz. [See R. STÄHELIN: Der erste Märtyrer d. evangel. Glaubens in der Schweiz, Heidelberg, 1883, 31 pp.] This event made an immense sensation, and was seemed imminent. It was for a time averted; but in 1531 it broke out, and on Oct. 12 Zwingli fell, at the head of the Reformed combatants, in the defeat at Cappel. An humiliating treaty of peace was concluded Nov. 16, 1531; and the future of the Reformed cantons was black enough. On Nov. 23, 1531, Ecolampadius died. The Reformed cantons fell into mutual recriminations; the Anabaptists renewed their disturbances; the latent sympathy for the old religion dared express itself; but the Reformation did not fail. Bullinger appeared as the worthy successor of Zwingli, and Myconius of Ecolampadius. In French Switzerland, Farel labored for the cause; and on Aug. 27, 1535, Geneva abolished the Papal power. In 1536 appeared John Calvin, whose energy made Geneva the metropolis of the Reformed Church; by his side were Viret and Beza. The first authoritative symbol of the Reformed Church of Switzerland was the Second Helvetic Confession (1536), the work of Bullinger; and with its promulgation closes the period of the Swiss Reformation. See ARTS, CALVIN, FAREL, REFORMATION (pp. 2007, 2008), ZWINGLI, etc.

III. The Period from 1566 to the Present.—The conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics, which in Germany lasted until 1618 (the Peace of Westphalia), in Switzerland terminated only in 1712 (the second battle of Villmergen). The Catholic reaction in the second half of the sixteenth century found its leader in Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who introduced into Switzerland the Capuchins and Jesuits, founded the Swiss college in Milan, established a nunciature in Switzerland, and in 1583 entered into a plan to overthrow the Reformation there altogether. At length the two Confessions met in a decisive battle at Villmergen, the result of which was a permanent peace.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Heidegger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorfs, Wolfgang Musculus, Biedert, Spanghelin, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1675, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Buxtonian doctrine of the inspiration of vowel-points, is the symbolical performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought an awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zurich led to a revolution. In 1845 the Vaud canton experienced a similar fate because the radicals arose against the call of Jesuits to teach theology in Luzern. It was really, however, a protest of the ungodly against the progress of evangelical truth. In November, 1815, the Vaudoise clergy left the Established Church, and formed the Free Church of the Vaud canton. (See VAUD, FREE CHURCH OF.) In the Roman-Catholic cantons, Ultramontanism grew apace until it received a severe blow from the Vaudoise revolution. [In 1847-48 the Sonderbund, or union of the Roman-Catholic cantons of Switzerland, vigorously opposed the reorganization of the Diet in the interests of progress; but it was worsted, and the old regulation which forbade the establishment of Reformed congregations in Roman-Catholic cantons, and vice versa, was abrogated. Thus the defeat at Cappel was avenged.]

IV. The Present Religious Condition of Switzerland.—According to the census of Dec. 1, 1880 (reprinted in Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia for 1882), the population of Switzerland was 2,816,102, of which 1,667,109 were Protestants (Reformed Church), 1,160,782 Roman Catholics, 10,838 of minor Christian sects, and 7,373 were Jews. Three cantons¹ (Zürich, Vaud, Schaffhausen) and a half-canton (Appenzel Rhodes ext.) are Protestant; six cantons (Zug, Luzern, Schwyz, Uri, Tecino, Valais) and three half-cantons (Appenzel Rhodes int., Unterwalden-Obwalden, Unterwalden-Nidwalden) are Roman-Catholic; and two cantons (Neuchâtel, Bern, Glarus, Thurgau, Grisons, Aargau, Geneva, St. Gallen, Freiburg, Solothurn) and two half-cantons (Bâle-ville, Bâle-camp) are mixed. The Protestants belong almost entirely to the National Reformed Church of their canton. There are, however, Free Churches in Geneva, Vaud, and Neuchâtel. The Lutheran Church has only a single congregation, at Geneva. Uri is the only canton in which there is no Protestant congregation. In German Switzerland are the three Protestant theological faculties of Basel, Bern, and Zürich; in French Switzerland, three National and three Free,—in Lausanne, Geneva, and Neuchâtel respectively.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Switzerland is divided into five dioceses,—Basel-Solothurn, Coire, St. Gallen, Lausanne-Freiburg, and Sion. The Roman-Catholic clergy are very numerous. Roman-Catholic parishes exist in every canton.

The opponents to ultramontanism, as shown in the infallibility dogma, have since 1871 formed the "Christian Catholic" Church, which has one bishop, whose diocese embraces all Switzerland, and a theological faculty at Bern. They were excommunicated by the Pope. Their first bishop, Dr. Herzog (formerly a priest at Olten) was consecrated by the Old-Catholic bishop of Germany (Dr. Reinkens) in 1876. Their number in 1877 amounted to about 73,000. See OLD-CATHOLICS.

The details of church-life are regulated for each canton by local authority; but the federal constitution of April 19, 1874, lays down certain general principles, to which all the cantons are required to conform. Absolute liberty of conscience is secured to all. Parents and guardians have the sole right of regulating the religious instruction of children less than sixteen years old. No one is required to pay taxes raised for the support of a church to which he does not belong. Free exercise of religion is guaranteed to all, within the limits compatible with order and morality. The cantons are authorized to take measures necessary to maintain peace between the different confessions, or to repress any ecclesiastical infringement upon the rights of citizens. All disputes relative to the creation of religious congregations, and to schisms in existing congregations, are decided by the federal authorities. No new bishopric shall be established without the approbation of the Confederation. The Jesuits and the affiliated orders, whether exercising ecclesiastical or educational functions, are absolutely forbidden to enter any canton, on the ground that such orders threaten the peace of the state. The founding of new convents and religious orders is forbidden.

SYLLABUS, the Papal, is an index, or catalogue, of eighty heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1864, on the basis of several encyclical letters issued by the same pontiff during his long reign. Its full title is, A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostolical Letters of our Most Holy Lord, Pope Pius IX. The number of heresies was probably suggested by the work of Epiphanius against the eighty heresies of the first three centuries, which are mostly of a Gnostic character. The Papal document is purely negative, but indirectly it teaches and enjoins the very opposite of what it condemns as error. It is divided into ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism; the second, moderate rationalism; the third, indifferentism and latitudinarianism; the fourth, socialism, communism, secret societies, Bible societies, and other "pests of this description;" the fifth, errors concerning the Church and her rights; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the ninth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the tenth, errors of modern liberalism. Among the errors condemned are the principles of civil and religious liberty, and the separation of Church and State. The Syllabus indirectly asserts the infallibility of the Pope, the exclusive right of Romanism to recognition by the civil government, the unlawfulness of all non-Catholic religions, the complete independence of the Papal hierarchy, the power of the Roman Church to coerce and enforce, and its supreme control over public education, science, and literature.

It will be seen that the Syllabus condemns many errors which are likewise rejected by all good Protestants. At the same time it condemns, also, important truths. It re-asserts all the extravagant claims of the mediæval Papacy, and is a declaration of war against modern civilization and progress. It is a glaring anachronism.

What authority attaches to this document? Cardinal Newman, in his defence of the Syllabus against Gladstone's attack, virtually denied its dogmatic force, saying (Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, p. 108), "We can no more accept the Syllabus as de fide, as a dogmatic document, than any other index or table of contents." But the Syllabus is more than a mere index, and contains as many definitions and judgments as titles. Moreover, the Papal infallibility decree of 1870 makes all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. It acts backwards as well as forwards: otherwise it would be null and void (Si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus). The Syllabus is certainly an official document, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic world, and sent to them with a Papal encyclical. And herein lies its importance and danger. As a personal manifesto of the Pope, it would be comparatively harmless and unheeded outside of the Roman communion; but clothed with infallible authority, and followed by the decrees of the Vatican Council, it provoked and stimulated the so-called Kulturkampf in Germany, a pamphlet war in England about its bearing on civil and political allegiance, and led to serious conflicts between Church and State in Italy, Austria, Prussia, France, Belgium, and Brazil. Where Church and State are united, there must be collision when both claim sovereignty, and the one claims infallible authority in addition. Even in the United States, where the government has nothing to do with the Church, the influence of the Syllabus is felt in the legislation on marriage and in public education, both of which have a secular as well as a religious aspect. The State claims and exercises the right and duty of educating the people for intelligent and useful citizenship; while the Syllabus condemns all public education which is not controlled by the teaching of the Roman Church, and stimulates the efforts of the priesthood to Romanize or to break up the public schools, or, where neither can be done from want of power, to neutralize them by parochial schools in which the doctrines and principles of Trent and the Vatican are inculcated upon the rising generation. Time must show what will be the ultimate issue of this irrepressible conflict.

SYLVESTER is the name of three Popes. — Sylvestre I. (311-335), of whom it is said that he baptized Constantine the Great, and received the famous donation from him, is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, and commemorated on Dec. 31. — Sylvestre II. (999-1003), whose true name was Gerbert, descended from humble parents in Auvergne, but distinguished himself by his immense learning and brilliant accomplishments, and attracted general attention by his liberal views of the relation between the synods, the bishops, and the Pope. Otto II. chose him as tutor for his son, and made him abbot of Bobbio. Afterwards he taught in the school of Rheims, and was, on account of his knowledge of chemistry and physics, believed by simple people to have sold his soul to the Devil. He defended the decrees of the synod of Rheims (991), against Pope John XV., but was afterwards reconciled with the Pope, and made archbishop of Ravenna. When he ascended the Papal throne, he completely changed his views of the Papal power, and treated all cases occurring with supreme authority. His literary remains, of which his letters are of special interest, have been edited by Masson, Duchesne, and others, last by Pertz. His life was written by Hock, Vienna, 1837; and MAX BÜCHNER, Cassel, 1851. — Sylvestre III. was for three months the Antipope of Benedict IX. and Gregory VI., and was deposed by the synod of Sutri (1016). SYLVESTER, Joshua, b. 1563; d. at Middleburg in Holland, Sept. 28, 1618; was a member of the Company of Merchant Adventurers, and eminent as a linguist. His poems, mostly on sacred subjects, and translated from the French, occupy in the edition of 1620 some twelve hundred folio pages, and won him the epithet of "silver-tongued." Chief among them is Da Bartas, his Divine Weeks and Works. According to Campbell, this "was among the most popular of our early translations," and has "beauties strangely intermixed with bathos and flatness." Charles Dunster, rector of Petworth, Sussex, published in 1800 Considerations on Milton's Early Reading, and the Prima Stamina of his Paradise Lost, maintaining that it was much indebted to Sylvester. SYLVESTRIANS, a monastic order founded by Sylvester Gizzoloni (b. at Osimo in the States of the Church, 1170; in 1231 he founded a monastery on Monte Fano, and adopted the Benedictine rules, with some modifications, for the inmates). The order was confirmed by Innocent IV. in 1217. In 1662 it was united with that of Vallombrosa, but was again separated from it in 1681, and confirmed anew by Alexander VIII. in 1690. SEIDENCKER.

SYMBOL (σμβόλον, symbolum, literally, that which is thrown together) is properly a mark, badge, watchword, or test. It was first used in a theological sense by Cyprian, in his Epistle Ad Magnum (Ep. 76 or 69), in the year 250, but since the fourth century very generally. Originally it had reference to the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession, as a military watchword, distinguishing Christians from all non-Christians, since they were regarded as soldiers of Christ. Luther and Melancthon first applied the word to Protestant creeds. Symbolical books are the symbols themselves. For a discussion of the nature of creeds and their distribution, see art. CREED.

SYMBOLICS treats of the origin, history, and contents of the various creeds of Christendom. It is comparative dogmatics. It was formerly known under the name of "Polemics," and "Controversial Theology," but is now treated in a more historical and irenic spirit. In this modern form it may be said to have begun with Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik. He was followed by Winer, with a comparative presentation of different authorized creeds (1824). Since his day much study has been given to the origin of different creeds, particularly to those of prime importance, e.g., the Apostles', the Nicene, the Athanasian; and much light has been thrown upon the subject. The teachings of the Roman-Catholic Mohler, in his Symbolik (1833), upon the contrasts between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, were met by Baur, Nitzsch, and other Protestants. Among the most eminent scholars in this department may be mentioned Swainson, Lumby, Caspari, and Schaff. See the LITERATURE in the Creeds (N.Y., 1878, 3 vols.) by the last-named. Recent works in this department of study are G. F. OEHLE: Lehrbuch d. Symbolik, Tübingen, 1876; K. H. G. v. SYMBOLUM APOSTOLICUM. See APOSTLES' CREED.

SYMMACHIANS was the name of a sect which lived in Rome, and taught that the human body was created, not by God, but by the Devil, and was consequently to be misused in every way possible. The origin of the sect is doubtful, — whether founded by that Symmachus who translated the Old Testament into Greek, or by some other Symmachus. In the time of Augustine it was rapidly disappearing. See Contra Cresconium, i. 34; see also PHILASTIUS: De Haeresibus, ed. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. NEUDECKER.

SYMMACHUS, Pope, 498-511. After the death of Anastasius II., a double election took place; the popular party in Rome electing the deacon Symmachus, the imperial the archpresbyter Laurentius. Theodoric, the king of the Ostrogoths, was called in as umpire, and decided in favor of Symmachus; but it was several years before Laurentius finally yielded. At the synods of Rome (in 502, 503, and 504), Symmachus introduced various measures, limiting the participation of the laity in the Papal election and in the administration of the property of the Papal see; so, on the whole, his government tended towards the consolidation of the Papal power. SYMPHORIANUS, a Gallie martyr from the reign of Aurelian; d. probably in 180. He was a native of Antum (Augustodunum), and is described as a youth of distinguished appearance and excellent education. Having refused to do homage to the statue of Berecynthia (Cybele), he was carried before the prefect Heraclius; and as he continued repeating, "I am a Christian," and absolutely refused to make any concessions to the demands of the reigning Paganism, he was decapitated. He is commemorated on Aug. 22. See Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 22, and RUINART: Acta prim. martyrum.

SYMPHOROSA, a Christian widow, whose husband, a tribune, had suffered martyrdom. She was summoned before the Emperor Hadrian, and commanded to sacrifice, and partake in the Pagan solemnities at the consecration of the new imperial palace at Tivoli. As she refused, she and her seven sons were cruelly tortured and killed. They are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and RUINART: Acta primorum martyrum, who accepts the story as true, though it does not harmonize with what is else known of Hadrian. GASS.

SYNAGOGUE, the Great, according to Jewish tradition, denotes the council first appointed, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, to re-organize the religious life, institutions, and literature of the people. Ezra, if he was not the originator of that council, certainly was its president. [Comp., against this view, Graetz, in Frankel's Monatsschrift, Leipzig, 1857, etc., pp. 31 sq., 61 sq.] This council consisted of a hundred and twenty men, who were not contemporaneous, but who are to be regarded as transmitters of tradition from Moses and Joshua down to the time of Simon the Just (q.v.), who, according to Pirke Aboth (i. 1), was the last surviving member. As to the work of the Great Synagogue, see the arts. CANON and BIBLE-TEXT (OF THE OLD TESTAMENT), and SCRIBES. The existence of the Great Synagogue [was first questioned by Richard Simon: Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test., lib. i. cap. viii.]; then by Jacob Alting, who was followed by Rau: Diatribe de Synag. Magna [Traj. ad Rhen., 1726], pp. 42 sq.; Aurivillius: De Synag. vulgo dicta Magna [ed. J. D. Michaelis, Göttingen, 1790]. De Wette, and others, who rejected it as one of the inventions of tradition, because it is not mentioned by Josephus, Philo, or the Seder Olam, and because the earliest record of it is in the tract of the Mishna entitled Pirke Aboth, which belongs to the second century of our era. On the other hand, scholars like Eichhorn (Einkleitung, i. § 5), Bertholdt (Einkleitung, i. pp. 66 sq.), Ewald (Gesch. Israel's, ii. 192), Jost (Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. pp. 43 sq.), Zunz (Gottesdienst. Vorträge, p. 33), maintain that there is much historical truth underlying the tradition of a body of men, who, between the time when prophecy was about to die out and the Greek period, were leaders among the Jewish people, transmitted tradition, and made such provision for the spiritual welfare of the people, that the law of God again permeated their life. But the name "Great Synagogue" was probably first adopted some centuries later. Whether there were really a hundred and twenty men or not is difficult to say. We must not, however, identify the Great Synagogue with the Great Sanhedrin (q.v.), or take it as its original form, as does Schickard (De pure reg. Heb., i. part 2), Witsius (Mosc. diss. de synedr., § 28), J. Braun (Sch. Sacr., Amst., 1700, p. 395), Sachs, Herzfeld, Heidenheim.

SYNAGOGUES OF THE JEWS. I. NAME, ORIGIN, AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — Synagogue (Greek, synagoge) is the name of those religious assemblies, which, during the post-exile period, existed first side by side with the sacrificial service in the temple, and which, after its existence, were substituted for it. Metonymically, synagogues denote also "places of assembly." After Israel had lost, not only its national independence, but also its national sanctuary, the Jews were anxious to preserve the unity in faith, doctrine, and life. To achieve this, regular assemblies were inaugurated on certain days, in the different places of Palestine where Jews lived, and where men of learning expounded the law. Thus, in all places where a certain number of Jews lived, synagogues were called into existence, which afterwards became the only bearer and banner of their nationality. According to Jewish law, wherever ten Jews lived, a house of assembly was to be erected. At the time of Jesus, not only each city in Palestine, but also the cities of the diaspora, had each at least one synagogue. Of the many synagogues which were at Jerusalem, the temple synagogue was the most famous.

II. INTERNAL ARRANGEMENT, WORSHIP, ETC., OF THE SYNAGOGUE. 1. The Building. — Taking the temple as the prototype, and following the traditional explanation of words in Prov. i. 21 and Ez. ix. 9 ("to set up"), taken to mean that the voice of prayer is to be raised on heights, the Jewish canons decreed that synagogues are to be built upon the most elevated ground in the neighborhood, and that no house is to be allowed to overtop them. Failing of a commanding site, a tall pole rose from the roof to render it conspicuous. The building was commonly erected at the cost of the district: sometimes it was built by a rich Jew, or even, as in Luke vii. 5, by a friendly proselyte. The river-side outside the city was also deemed a suitable spot for building the synagogue; because, being removed from the noise of the city, the people could worship God without distraction, and at the same time have the use of pure water for immersions and other religious exercises. Often synagogues were erected near the tombs of famous rabbins or holy men. The congregation was divided: men on one side, women on the other — by a low partition, five or six feet high, running between them (Philo. De Vita Contempl., ii. 176). In modern synagogues the separation is made more complete by placing the women in low side-galleries, screened off by lattice-work (Leo Mutin: De eorum. Jud., 10, 4). When the building was finished, it was set apart, as the temple had been, by a special prayer of dedication. From that time it had a consecrated character. No one was to pass through it as a short cut. Even if it ceased to be used, the building was not to be applied to any base purpose, might not be turned, e.g., into a bath, a laundry, or a tannery. A scraper stood outside the door, that men might rid themselves, before they entered, of any thing that would be defiling.

2. Furniture. — In oldest times the people probably stood in the synagogue (Neh. vii. 5, 7), or sat upon the floor. But there were also armchairs, or seats of honor, for the elders of the synagogue, the doctors of the law, etc. (Matt. xxiii. 2, 6; Mark xii. 39; Luke xi. 13; Jas. ii. 2, 3). They were placed in front of the ark containing the law, or at the Jerusalem end; and there distinguished persons sat with their faces to the people, while the congregation stood facing both these honorable ones and the ark. Besides the rostrum or platform, capable of containing several persons (Neh. viii. 4, ix. 4), there was a reading-desk, on which the sacred scrolls were laid. These scrolls were wrapped in linen or silk wrappers, often adorned with letters or other ornaments of gold and silver, and were kept in the wooden chest, or ark, or sanctuary. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps brought by the people, which were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

3. Times of Worship. — Besides on sabbaths and festivals, the people also met on Monday and Thursday, which were the two market-days in the week.

4. Liturgy, or Order of Service. — (1) The prayers which took the place of the daily sacrifices were offered up also at those hours when the daily sacrifices were made. As on sabbaths and festivals additional sacrifices were offered besides the usual, so, likewise, additional prayers were added to the regular ones. The main part of the daily service was the Shema and the eighteen benedictions. The prayer was followed on the sabbath and festivals by (2) the reading of the section of the law, which was originally divided in a hundred and fifty-four sections, or parashoth. After the section of the law (3), a section from the prophets, or Haphtarah, was read; then came (4) the homily, exposition, or derasha. The service closed (5) with the hallel, to which the congregation responded by saying "Amen."

III. OFFICERS OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — The synagogues were governed by the elders (Luke vii. 3), who were presided over by the ruler of the synagogue (Matt. ix. 18; Mark v. 35; John vii. 55; Luke viii. 41; Acts xiii. 15), and constituted the local Sanhedrin. To give unity and harmony to the worship, one was delegated to go up before the ark to conduct divine service. He was called shaliach zibur, i.e., the legate of the congregation. There was also the chazzan, or sexton of the syna gogue, who had the care of the furniture, to open the doors, to clean the synagogue, to light the lamps, etc. Other officers were the almshouses, corresponding to the seven deacons (Acts vi. 1 sq.); and they had to be "men of honesty, wisdom, justice, and have the confidence of the people." We must also mention the Ten Ballium [or "Men of Leisure"], who were independent of business, because they had private means, or were stipendiaries of the congregation. They had to be present at all services, so that there might be no delay in beginning the service at the proper hours.

SYNCELLUS (one who shares his cell with another) denotes, generally, the visitant of one of the higher ecclesiastical officers. The Patriarch of Constantinople had several syncelli, of whom the first (protosyncellus) at one time even ranked before the metropolitans. Syncelli were also known in the West.

SYNCRETISM is a word of Greek origin, though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, referring to a saying about the Cretians, — that they were very much disposed to wage war against each other, but immediately made peace, and joined hands, when attacked by foreigners. It was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melancthon), and became quite commonly used by the Reformers, denoting, not exactly a compromise between different tenets, but a union on the basis of such tenets as were common to both parties. (See ZWINGLI: Opp., ed. Schuler and Schulthess, vii. p. 390, and Butzer's letter to Zwingli of Feb. 6, 1531.) At first it was indifferently used, both in a good and in a bad sense; but in the course of the sixteenth century the Roman Catholics, who wished to suppress Protestantism, but not to compromise with it, and who feared more than any thing an agreement between the Lutherans and the Reformed, succeeded in giving to the appellation, "a syncretist," the meaning of a religion-monger; and that sense the word afterwards retained. During the seventeenth century its compass became somewhat circumscribed. First, all attempts at union between Roman Catholics and Protestants, then all attempts at union between Lutherans and Reformed, were excluded; and finally the word came to designate simply a principle within the pale of Lutheran theology, — the principle of moderation, expansion, development, in opposition to the principle of a stiff and stationary orthodoxy.

Throughout the whole period of the Reformation two opposite tendencies are discernible: one starting from the axiom that all truth is one, and consequently condemning toleration of different opinions as laxity; and the other moving along upon the conviction that all true religion is love, and consequently striving after reconciliation and harmony. In the middle of the seventeenth century those two tendencies clashed against each other; and the result was a sharp and bitter literary contest, known as the "Syncretistic Controversy." The situation is very vividly characterized by the decrees of the synod of Charenton (1631) and the criticism which those decrees called forth. Some French-Reformed congregations asked the synod whether Lutherans living among them could be baptized, married, admitted to the Lord's Supper, etc., in their churches, without first abjuring their specifically Lutheran tenets; and the synod answered in the affirmative. Then the Roman Catholics raised a huge cry, stigmatizing such indifference to religious divergences as mere atheism. (See FRANCIS VÉRON: Méthodes de traiter des controverses de religion, 1638.) The controversy proper, however, began a little later, and was carried on in another field. It broke out at the Colloquy of Thorn (1615), and raged till the death of Calixtus (1656). Renewed by the Colloquies of Cassel and Berlin (1661), it went on till the secular governments commanded silence (in 1669); and once more it finally burst forth during the last years of Calovius' life (1675-86).

Considering the reciprocal hatred between the Lutherans and the Reformed among his subjects as a national calamity, King Ladislaus IV. of Poland arranged a religious disputation between the two parties at Thorn in 1645. As delegates from the evangelical churches of Germany were also invited, intrigues immediately began. The Saxon theologians, representatives of the strictest orthodoxy, were eager to prevent any theologian of the Helmstädt school, whose tendency was syncretistic, from being sent as a delegate to the colloquy; and they succeeded. So, though Calixtus, the head of the school, was elected for Dantzic, they managed to have the election cancelled. He was present, however, at Thorn; and he was seen to converse freely with the Reformed theologians, even to walk along with them in the streets, and to visit them in their lodgings. Such a scandal could not, of course, be tolerated. The colloquy over, and no result arrived at, the Saxon theologians issued a memoir (Dec. 29, 1646), in which they accused the Helmstädt theologians of undermining the Lutheran Church by their novelties. Calixtus answered (Feb. 26, 1647), characterizing the accusation as an infamous calumny. The Saxon theologians now seized upon every, even the most insignificant, deviation of Calixtus from the traditional Lutheran system, and made the most possible out of it, shrewdly calculating, that, if they could prove him to be unsound, the inference would be irresistible that his moderation towards the Reformed was pernicious. They sent a hail-storm of attacks down upon him, — little tracts, and heavy quartos of sixteen hundred pages, Latin and German (HULSEMANN: Dialysis apologética problematis Calixtini, etc., 1649, Judicium de Calixtino desiderio, etc., 1650, Calixtinische Gewissensurtheil, 1651; CALOVIVS: Consulatio nova theologia, Helm., etc., 1649, Syncretismus Calixtinus, 1653). But Calixtus was prompt in answering (De questionibus, etc., 1649; Appendix, 1650; Verandertungen, 1651). Political passions and interests were brought to bear upon the controversy. Jealous of Brandenburg and the Palatinate, the supporters of the Reformed Church in Germany and of syncretism in German theology, the elector of Saxony attempted to deal the Reformed Church in Germany a deadly blow by preventing the Peace of Westphalia from placing it on an equal footing with the Lutheran Church. He failed. As head of the Corpus Evangelicorum, he then sent an admonitory letter to the three princes who maintained the university of Helmstädt, but received a very sharp answer. Finally the Saxon theologians summed up their complaints against Calixtus in ninety-eight heretical propositions culled from his writings, and a new shower of polemics burst over him. In one year (1655) Calovius published Harmonia Calixtino-heretica (twelve hundred pages in quarto), Systema locorum (two heavy volumes in octavo), and Fides veterum. The death of Calixtus, however, brought about a kind of armistice.

In order to establish a more satisfactory modus vivendi between the Lutheran and Reformed subjects, the landgrave of Hesse invited two professors from the Reformed faculty of Marburg, and two from the Lutheran faculty of Rinteln, to a colloquy at Cassel, July 1-9, 1661. The colloquy proved a success. The Brevis relatio which was issued at its close, though it nowhere concealed the actually existing differences between the Lutherans and the Reformed faith, everywhere emphasized their fundamental harmony; and for that very reason it was received with great favor throughout the Reformed Church. Quite otherwise in the Lutheran Church. The faculty of Rinteln was filled with pupils of Calixtus; and their moderation at the colloquy of Cassel was by the strictly orthodox party considered a treasonous surrender of the very principles of Lutheranism. The faculty of Wittenberg, composed of Calovius, Quenstedt, Deutschmann, etc., sent a violent harangue to Rinteln (Epistola de colloquio Cassellano), March 12, 1662, and received an answer of the same character (Epistola apologica), Dec. 18, 1662. Calovius again descended into the arena with a German book (Gründlicher Bericht) of a thousand pages, and a Latin book (Antapologia) of seven hundred pages; and once more the Syncretistic Controversy was raging. Meanwhile, the elector of Brandenburg, encouraged by the success of the landgrave, determined to try the same experiment, and arranged a colloquy in Berlin. But the Lutherans were unwilling and suspicious; and the colloquy dragged on from September, 1662, to May, 1663, without any result. On Sept. 16, 1661, the elector issued a decree forbidding all discussion of the points in question from the pulpit, besides taking other measures for the establishment of peace and order. All ministers were demanded to sign the edict, and those who refused — as, for instance, Paul Gerhardt — were dismissed. In the same year the faculty of Wittenberg published the Consulatio theologica Wittenbergensis, containing the famous Consensus repetitus fidei vere Lutheranae, which aimed directly at the pupils of Calixtus. It was, no doubt, the idea of Calovius to represent the theology of the school of Helmstädt, not only as a deviation from true Lutheranism, but as a new religion, not protected by the Peace of Westphalia. The situation became critical. The syncretists found an able defender in Fr. U. Calixtus, a son of their late leader, who in 1667 published his Demonstratio liquidissima against the Consensus. But he was attacked by Egidius Strach with such an asperity and coarseness, that he had to go to the civil courts for protection. A libel-suit was instituted, and the procedure caused great and widespread scandal. At that moment the elector interfered (1669), and commanded both parties to keep silent.

During the period of quiet which followed, from 1669 to 1675, Duke Ernest the Pious, of Saxe-Altenburg, made great exertions in order to effect a reconciliation between the syncretists and the orthodox party, between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. The memoir of Spener, dated May 31, 1670, made a deep impression; and his practical suggestions pointed in the same direction as the duke's schemes. But all hopes of peace were finally wrecked on the stubbornness of Calovius. Immediately after the death of Duke Ernest, he began the controversy again. Attacks and counter-attacks followed in rapid succession, in Latin and German, in verse and prose. The satirical comedy, Triumphus concordiae, which was acted in Wittenberg by the students at some university-festival, became very famous. The author was imprisoned, the printer was fined, and the elector saw fit to revive the laws forbidding the publication of controversial writings. But Calovius continued; he wrote anonymously or pseudonymously. His principal work from this period is his Historia syncretistica, which appeared in 1682, without name, or place, or date. It was not confiscated; but its sale was prohibited, and that measure seems to have made a very deep impression on him. As the counterpart of the Historia syncretistica, and closing the whole controversy, may be considered FR. U. CALIXTUS' Via ad pacem, Helmstädt, 1700. See, besides the works quoted above, H. HENKE.

SYNERGISM is a sublimated type of Semi-Pelagianism, and had for its representatives Erasmus, and specially Melancthon and his school. Protestant theology in its first stage was the strictest Augustinianism. Luther taught that the fall rendered man incapable of all good, and incompetent to contribute anything towards his conversion. In his Enchiridion in Ps. xc. (1541) he says, "In spiritual matters, so far as the soul's salvation is concerned, man is like a pillar of salt, like Lot's wife, yea, like a clod and stone, a dead picture, using neither mouth nor eyes, mind nor heart." Conversion is solely the act of divine grace. Melancthon held to this view at first. In his Loci of 1521 he speaks of the will as destitute of all freedom, and of a man's works which seem to be good as only "the cursed fruit of a cursed tree" (arboris maledictæ). As a consequence, Luther taught [in his earlier period] the strict doctrine of predestination, as did also Melancthon, who says, "All things which happen, happen by necessity, according to divine predestination,"—the treachery of Judas, as well as the conversion of Paul. This was the theology of Melancthon's head, not of his heart; and in the third series of his Loci (1543) sin is regarded as the work of the Devil and the human will. God is not the cause of it. Man abused his freedom of will, and a certain measure of will-power remained to him after the fall. Three agents are active in every truly good deed,—the word of God, the Holy Spirit, and the human will, which is called the "power of seeking after grace" (facultas sese applicandi ad gratiam). This theory of co-operation between God and man got the name of synergism. It prevailed in the Leipzig Interim. "God does not deal with man as with a block, but draws him, so that his will co-operates." Pfeffinger, professor in Leipzig, in his De libertate voluntatis hum. questiones (Leip., 1555), advocated this view, but was caustically opposed by Amsdorff. Then Flacius took up the controversy, in his Reputation of Pfeffinger's Propositions (1558), declaring that man is absolutely passive (pure passive) in conversion. Man has no more part in it than a stone or piece of wood in the work of the artist who forms out of them a statue. The campaign of the anti-synergists was organized at the recently founded university of Jena, whither Flacius was called in 1557. Wittenberg and Leipzig represented the synergistic theory. Under the direction of the Duke of Saxony, the Weimar Confutationsbuch (Illustrissimi principis ac Domini, Dom. J. Friderici II. . . . confutatio et condemnatio præcipuarum corruptelarum, sectarum et errorum hoc tempore grassantium, 1559) was prepared, which was regarded as theegis of strict Lutheranism, and forced upon the pastors, etc. Melancthon read it with great pain. Strigel, however, one of the professors at Jena, and a synergist, had a public discussion with his colleague Flacius at Weimar (August, 1560). He insisted upon man's freedom of will, and his co-operation with the Divine Spirit. Flacius declared that man was in more wretched plight than a stick of wood; for by nature he can will the bad, and the bad only. He sins "necessarily and inevitably." According to the Confutationsbuch, Strigel should have been condemned, but was not. Flacius was strengthened by Wigand, a pugnacious genius of acerbity rarely equalled. The fortunes of the two parties were for a time in the balance. The duke favored the synergists, and started, thereby, a howl on the part of the Flacians, who reminded him of the destiny of the forty children devoured by the bears, etc., and called Strigel the voracious wolf, etc. Strigel was restored to his place at the university; but, called upon to sign Stosse's Declaration (Catholusmus Stosselii), he refused, and escaped to Leipzig, rejecting all overtures (Oct. 17, 1562) for his return to the university (of Jena), which he had built up. Stosse's Declaration was not orthodox enough, and forty preachers who spoke out against it were exiled. Schnecker, Freilimb, and Salmuth, all Melancthonians, were called to Jena; but a new duke ascended the throne, 1567, and they retired. Wigand, Coelestin, Heshsius, and Kirchner were substituted for them, all Flacians. The duke had the so-called corpus doctrinæ Thuringicum put together, according to which not the least spark (ne scintilla quidem) of spiritual power remained to man after the fall. The human will is absolutely incompetent to good, hard as stone. It only has a passive capacity to be converted by divine grace. Conversion is nothing less than "resuscitation from spiritual death." The Formula of Concord followed, and by its declaration about the will, which pleased the Flacians, closed the controversy. SYNESIUS, b. about 375, at Cyrene, the capital of the Libyan Pentapolis; studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and became a passionate disciple of Hypatia. In 397 or 398 he was placed at the head of an embassy which Cyrene sent to Constantinople, and on that occasion he delivered before the Emperor Arcadius his celebrated speech, On Kingship (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Munich, 1825). He staid two years in Constantinople, but returned home in 400, thoroughly disgusted with the state of affairs, of which he had given a description, Αἰώνιοι (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Salzburg, 1835). For several years he staid on his estates, occupied with agriculture and the chase, studying philosophy, and writing hymns. Neo-Platonic and pompous: in short, leading a life of ease and refined elegance. In 409 or 410 the people of Ptolemais elected him—the Pagan philosopher, a married man—their bishop; and after some hesitation he accepted. Materials for the explanation of this singular fact are found in a letter he wrote to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, immediately after his election. He speaks of the Christian priesthood with the greatest reverence. He considers it as something divine; and in order to obtain it he declares himself willing to give up his fields, his garden, the chase, all his amusements. But he will not give up his wife, and he cannot give up his philosophical ideas. Theophilus, though at times a most stubborn and vindictive adherent of strict orthodoxy, gave his consent; and Synesius was consecrated. Very soon, however, after entering upon his office, he came into conflict with the prefect of the province, Andronicius. It seems that the church was liable to misuse its right of asylum; and it seems that Andronicius fell into the opposite extreme, trying to cancel the right altogether. Synesius finally excommunicated him, and the speech he delivered on that occasion is still extant. It gives a very vivid picture of the dreary and unhappy life he led, unable to fulfil his new duties, and abandoned by his old friends; and new calamities—the invasion of the barbarians, the loss of his children, etc.—made it still worse. He seems to have died in 414, at all events before the cruel death of Hypatia in 415 or 416. His collected works first appeared at Liege, 1612, and again in 1633. See

SYRIA, AND MISSIONS TO SYRIA. 1. HISTORICAL SKETCH.—Syria is called Bur-esh Sham by the Arabs, who include in the title Palestine (Filistin). The name Syria is derived from Tsur, or Sur (Tyre). The Greeks early became acquainted with that city, and gave its name to the country. At a remote era the Arameans had founded political communities in Syria; and the kingdoms of Aram, Dameshik (Damascus), and Abam-Zobah (the Bukaa), are mentioned in the Bible.

The Phoenicians, or Canaanites, were the most remarkable of all the ancient inhabitants of the country, and with the Damascenes long held the northern part of Syria. Phoenicia attained its greatest power about B.C. 1050, and continued in almost uninterrupted prosperity five hundred years. During the period of the judges, Syria was more or less under the suzerainty of the Pharaohs; and David extended his dominions over Damascus and Hamath.

From the time of Cyrus (536 B.C.) until the rise of the Grecian power, Syria and Palestine were governed by a Persian satrap, resident in Damascus.

After the battle of Issus (333 B.C.), Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine yielded to Alexander the Great, excepting Tyre and Ascalon.

After the death of Alexander, Syria continued under the reign of the Ptolemies for sixty years, and then was conquered by the Seleucids, who held it until 113, the era of the Maccabees.

In B.C. 31 Syria passed under the Roman yoke, Herod the Great being made king of the Jews. After the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), Judea was attached to the province of Syria; and, soon after, Syria and Palestine were placed under the direct dominion of a Roman prefect, Antioch being the seat of government.

In this state the country continued under the Roman and Byzantine Empire until the Muslim conquest in A.D. 634.

Christianity was established under Constantine; and the "extent, wealth, and architectural taste of the Christians" in the subsequent period may be inferred from the splendid ruins of their churches in every part of Syria. The finest mosques in Damascus, Beirut, and Tripoli, the Akra in Jerusalem, and the Agia Sophia in Constantinople, were Christian churches.

In A.D. 639 Damascus was made capital of the Mohammedan Empire. Syria was full of splendid cities, such as Antioch, Palmyra, Damascus, Heliopolis, Apamea, Geisara, Bostra, Ascalon, and Caesarea; but under the blight of Islam these all fell into decay, and Damascus alone remains prosperous.

In 750, under the Abbassides, the Caliphate removed to Cufa, and then to Bagdad; Syria becoming a mere province of the Mohammedan Empire.

In the middle of the tenth century it was taken by the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt; and toward the close of the eleventh century, Syria was invaded by the Seljukian Turks, and annexed to their empire.

The period of the Crusades continued from A.D. 1099 until A.D. 1291, when Acre was taken by the Mameluke Sultan of Egypt.

For more than two centuries after this period Syria suffered from the fierce wars of the "Shepherd hordes of Tartary," and their brethren the Tartar Slav sovereigns of Egypt. In 1401 Timur the Tartar (Tamerlane) invaded the country, burnt Antioch, Emessa, Halebek, and Damascus, and either massacred their inhabitants, or sold them into slavery.

In 1517 Syria and Palestine were conquered by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., and have continued under Turkish rule to this day, declining in wealth and prosperity until the people of the interior provinces sunk to the lowest point of intellectual and moral degradation.

In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha conquered Syria for his father, Mohammed Ali, but was expelled by the English in 1841, and Syria restored to the Porte.

II. THE LAND.—Syria and Palestine lie along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, extending from Egypt and the Sinaitic desert on the south to the confines of Asia Minor on the north, and reaching from 31° to 36° 30' north latitude. The length of the country is 300 miles, and its breadth from 60 to 100 miles; its area being about 28,000 square miles.

A mountain chain, under different names, runs through the land from north to south, being intersected at different points, thus forming distinct ranges. From the wilderness north of Beersheba, the foot-hills rise to mountains about Hebron; and the broken, undulating range extends north-west to the headland of Carmel. North of the Carmel range lies the plain of Esdraelon, which extends through to the Jordan. Over this plain a railway route has just been surveyed.

North of Esdraelon the range continues broad and broken, to the deep ravine of the Litany, which empties into the sea near Tyre. Beyond the Litany rises the noble range of Lebanon, which runs a hundred miles to the north, varying in height from four thousand to eleven thousand feet, and breaking down northeast of Tripoli into a broad plain, which sweeps from the sea eastward to the Orontes at Hama and Hamath, forming the "entrance of Hamath," mentioned by Moses as the northern border of the land of Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8). North of this plain rises the Jebel el Hama, the southern spur of the Nusairiyeh range, anciently Bargylus Mons, which extends north, and terminates in the beautiful conical peak of Mount Casius at the mouth of the Orontes.

North of the Orontes the range is known as Gawar Dagh, the Amnus of Ptolemy, which extends north fifty miles to Mount Taurus.

The chain of Anti-Lebanon rises in the plain of Hamath, about twenty miles east of the northern end of Lebanon, and runs parallel to the latter, culminating in Mount Hermon, which has an elevation of about ten thousand feet. From Hermon the ridge breaks down into an irregular and lower range, which runs due south along the eastern bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea to the mountains of Edom.

The political geography of Syria has changed with every change of dynasty for centuries. At present Syria and Palestine constitute one Welaïet, or pachalic, extending from Antioch to Gaza, which is styled the Pachalic of Damascus.

The province of Mount Lebanon was erected into a distinct pachalic after the massacres of 1860; the pacha being always a Latin Christian, appointed by the Porte, with the approval of the great powers of Europe. David Pacha was the first pacha of Lebanon; Franco Pacha, the second; and the next mutseriff was Rustem Pacha, an Italian by birth, a man of enlightened views and liberal education. The present pacha is Wassa Pacha, a Catholic Albanian. Under this régime, Lebanon has become, in proportion to its size, the most prosperous part of the Turkish Empire. Schools are encouraged, roads built, new land cultivated, and everywhere is security to life and property.

III. THE PEOPLE.—The population of Syria in 1881 was estimated at 2,076,300, as follows:—

Mohammedans, Sunnites, and Metawileh	1,000,000
Nusairiyeh	250,000
Maronites	250,000
Orthodox Greeks	235,000
Papal sects	80,000
Jews	30,000
Ismailiyeh Gypsies, etc.	30,000
Armenians	20,000
Jacobites	15,000
Druzes	100,000
Protestants	6,300
Bedawin Arabs	60,000
Total	2,076,300

The limits of this article forbid a detailed description of these sects; but of the more obscure it may be said, that the Druzes and Nusairiyeh are semi-Pagan; the Bedawin, nominally Muslim, but really ignorant and superstitious deists; the Maronites, devoted adherents of the Papacy; the Ismailiyeh and Metawileh, heretical Muslims; while the Greeks, Armenians, and Jacobites are Oriental Christians.

The bulk of the population in the cities is Mohammedan, excepting Beirût, of whose population of eighty thousand not more than one-third are Mohammedans.

The northern part of Lebanon is almost exclusively Maronite; the southern portion, south of the Damascus road, being chiefly Druze, with scattering villages of Greeks, Maronites, Muslims, and Metawileh. In Palestine Proper the most of the villagers are Muslims, the Greeks and Papal Greeks being dispersed in Northern Palestine and on the plain of Sharon.

IV. THE NATIVE ORIENTAL CHURCHES are the Orthodox Greek, the Maronite, the Papal Greek, the Jacobite, Armenian, and Papal Armenian.

The Greeks are supposed to number about two hundred and thirty-five thousand. They are Syrians by birth and descent, and speak only the Arabic language. The doctrines and ritual are the same as in Greece and Russia. They differ from the Roman Church in the following points: (1) the calendar, (2) the procession of the Holy Spirit, (3) the use of pictures and the exclusion of images from sacred buildings, (4) the rejection of purgatory, (5) communion in both kinds, (6) the marriage of the secular clergy.

The church is divided into the patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, which, though nominally independent, are really under the control of the Primate of Constantinople.

The Patriarch of Antioch governs the bishoprics of Beirût, Tripoli, Akkar, Ladakiyeh, Hamah, Hums, Saidnaya, and Tyre. The patriarchate of Jerusalem includes Palestine and Perea, and has under it the bishoprics of Nazareth, Akka, Lydda, Gaza, Sebaste, Nâbulus, Philadelphia, and Petra. Among these the Bishop of Akka is the only one who resides in his diocese: all the others live in the convent at Jerusalem.

The Greek Church allows the reading of the Scriptures by the people, and hence they have become more enlightened than any other of the Syrian sects.

The Syrians, or Jacobites, separated from the Oriental Church on account of the monophysite heresy. The Syriac language is used in the church services, although it is not understood by the people. Their head is the Patriarch of Mardin. Their number is small, chiefly in Sudud, Karyetein, Hums, Nelek, Damascus, and Aleppo. They are poor and industrious, and receive the Scriptures without opposition.

The Maronites originated as monothelites in the seventh century, although Bishop Dibbs of Beirût has written laboriously and vainly to disprove their heretical origin. Their name was derived from a monk, John Marôn, who died in 701. In 1180 they renounced monothelism, and submitted to the Pope. They are devoted Romanists, and call their part of Lebanon the Holy Mountain.

Although adhering to the Pope, they still retain many of their former peculiarities. Their ecclesiastical language is Syriac. Their patron saint, Marôn, is not found in the Roman calendar. They have their own church establishment, and the people regard their Patriarch as not inferior to the Pope. Their secular clergy marry.

Their convents, numbering nearly 100, own the best estates in Lebanon, and support about 2,000 monks and nuns, with a revenue of not less than $350,000.

The people are independent, hardy, and industrious, but are left in gross ignorance, illiteracy, and superstition. Their clergy are educated at Ain Werka; and those trained in Rome are men of fair learning; but the mass of the priests are lamentably ignorant.

The Papal schismatic churches—the Papal Greek, Papal Syrian, and Papal Armenian—have sprung from the missionary efforts of Romish priests and Jesuits during the past two centuries. The Papal Greeks retain the marriage of the clergy, their Arabic service, Oriental calendar, and communion in both kinds.

The Armenian population is confined to the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, speaking the Turkish and Armenian languages.

The Jews of Palestine are foreigners, numbering about fifteen thousand; having come from every country on earth, and living chiefly in Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed. But the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirût, are natives, speaking the Arabic, and many of them possessed of great wealth.

V. MODERN PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN SYRIA. (a) American Presbyterian. — The first modern Protestant mission to Syria began in January, 1819, when Rev. Messrs. Pliny Fisk and Levi Parsons, missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M., landed in Smyrna. In February, 1821, Mr. Parsons reached Jerusalem. In 1823 Messrs. Fisk, Jonas King, from America, and Way, of the London Jews Society, reached Beirût, and summered in Lebanon.

Jerusalem and Beirût continued for years the two centres of American missionary labor, until 1843, when the American mission was withdrawn from Jerusalem, and confined to Syria Proper, leaving Palestine to the Church Missionary Society.

In 1871 the Syria mission of the American Board was transferred to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of the United States, owing to the then recent re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church.

The whole number of American missionaries laboring in Syria under these two boards from 1823 to 1883, is as follows: male missionaries, 55; female missionaries, 63; printers, 1; total, 122.

The missionaries were at first directed to attempt the reform of the Oriental churches, leaving the converts within the Oriental communions; but it soon became necessary to organize a distinct Oriental Evangelical Church.

The great work undertaken by the American Syria Mission, however, was not merely for the two millions in Syria, but, through the medium of the Arabic Scriptures and Christian Arabic literature, for the hundred and seventy-five millions of the Mohammedan world. The work of translating the Bible from the original tongues into Arabic was begun in 1818 by Dr. Eli Smith, who labored assiduously until his death, Jan. 11, 1857.

Only Genesis, Exodus, and the first sixteen chapters of Matthew had received his final revision; but he had revised and nearly prepared for the press the whole of the New Testament, and all except Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the last fourteen chapters of Isaiah, of the Old Testament.

On his death, Rev. Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck continued the work of translation. In 1860 the New Testament was completed, and issued from the press; and in 1865 the entire Bible was finished, and sent forth to the world. Mr. Smith had prepared in 1837, with the aid of Mr. Homan Hallock, the punches of a new font of Arabic type, made from the best specimens of Arabic calligraphy. The type were cast by Fauchnitz, in Leipzig. This type, which at first was anatomized by the religious heads of the Oriental sects, has now been adopted by the Turkish Government journals, the Dominican press at Mosul, the Greek and other native presses, and the Leipzig Arabic press.

Several editions of the Arabic Bible have been electrotyped in Beirût at the expense of the American Bible Society.

The Arabic Bible, during the past eighteen years, has been distributed throughout Syria and Palestine, Mesopotamia and Egypt, and in Asia Minor, Tunis, Algiers, Tripoli, and Morocco, Sierra Leone and Liberia, Zanzibar, Aden, Bagdad, India, and China.

In addition to this, nearly two hundred different books have been printed at the Beirût press; comprising works on medicine, surgery, anatomy and physiology, chemistry, natural philosophy, botany, astronomy, the higher mathematics, geography with atlases, grammar, arithmetic, history, theology, homiletics, church history, evidences of Christianity, mental philosophy, hermeneutics, etc., together with religious books and tracts, and illustrated books for the young, and weekly and monthly journals.

Mr. Butrus Bistany, a learned convert from the Maronite faith, who aided Dr. Eli Smith in the Bible translation, has published a fine dictionary of the Arabic language, in two volumes octavo, 1,200 pages, and is now publishing an Arabic encyclopedia in twelve octavo volumes, 800 pages each, of which the sixth is already completed.

During the year 1882, 21,000,000 pages in Arabic were printed at the Beirût press, making 213,000,000 from the foundation of the press. The demand for the Beirût publications is greater in Egypt than in any other country. The Beirût press has an Arabic type foundry and electro-type apparatus.

Education is a prominent branch of the mission-work in Syria. The first missionaries found the people in a deplorable state of intellectual and moral ignorance. The only schools were the Muslim medrischs, attached to the mosques, and the clerical training-school of the Maronites in Ain Wurka, Mount Lebanon. Books were to be made for readers, and readers for books.

Drs. Thomson and Van Dyck founded a seminary for boys in Abeil in 1816, which was placed under the care of Mr. Calhoun in 1819, and continued in his care until 1876. It was the highest literary institution in Syria for years, until the founding of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirût.

This institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York in 1863, and is under the control of a board of trustees residing there. The college began with a preparatory class in 1865, and the college proper opened in the fall of 1866. A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirût were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882-83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy to the year 1882 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 71; total, 153.

Progress has been made in founding a library and scientific museums.

The mission has also three female seminaries, in Beirût, Salon, and Tripoli, — with about 100 boarders and 300 day pupils, and 113 common schools, with about 5,000 pupils.

A theological seminary building adjoins the college, in which several members of the mission give instruction to candidates for the Christian ministry.

Fourteen native evangelical churches have been organized, of which four have native ordained pastors; and twenty-seven licensed preachers aid in the work of evangelization. The number of communicants is about 1,000, of whom 400 are women. Eighty-four Sunday schools contain about 4,000 scholars. The number of Protestant adherents is about 1,000.

Medical mission-work has received especial attention, both in hospital services and in medical practice among the poor in the interior towns and villages.

The American Bible Society and the American and London Religious Tract societies have given substantial aid in the printing and publishing work of the mission.

(b) The Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus was founded in 1813. The United Presbyterian Church of the United States soon entered upon the work, and continued to co-operate with it until a few years since, when the latter church concentrated its work upon Egypt. Rev. Messrs. Crawford and Phillips, with a corps of lady-teachers, now carry on the work, with 14 catechists, 7 preaching-stations, 110 communicants, and 430 pupils in their schools. Their work embraces Damascus and vicinity, and the eastern and southern parts of Anti-Lebanon.

(c) The Church of England Missions in Palestine have their centre at Jerusalem, and embrace (1) the London Jews Society, with 8 foreign laborers, 8 native teachers, 80 communicants, and 2 schools with 104 pupils; (2) the Church Missionary Society, with 20 European laborers, 4 ordained natives, 37 catechists, 21 female teachers, 25 preaching-stations, 214 communicants, 45 schools with 1,142 pupils.

The Protestant bishopric of Jerusalem, founded by Frederick William IV. of Prussia, is supported half by Prussia and half by England. The first bishop was Dr. Michael S. Alexander; the second, Dr. Samuel Gobat; and the third, Dr. Barclay, who died in 1881. At present there is no incumbent. See JERUSALEM, EPISCOPAL SEE OF ST. JAMES IN.

The Church Missionary Society labor in Palestine Proper as far north as Acre, and east of the Jordan.

(d) The German Evangelical Missions embrace (1) the German Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, whose work comprises orphan-training, higher education, and hospital-nursing (they began labor in Sidon in 1860 after the massacres, then transferred their work to Beirut, where they have spacious premises, and are engaged in a work which is of the greatest value to the people of Syria. They have in Beirut 16 deaconesses, 6 native female assistants, and 240 pupils. They have also the care of nursing the indoor patients to the number of 500 in the Johanner Hospital in Beirut. In Jerusalem four of the deaconesses act as nurses in the hospital, with about 700 indoor patients annually); (2) German chaplains in Beirut and Jerusalem, who preach to the German and French speaking Protestants; (3) The Jerusalem Verein of Berlin, which supports Dr. Reinicke at Jerusalem, and Mr. Muller at Bethlehem, whose work embraces 135 communicants, 8 schools with 296 pupils.

(e) The British Syrian Schools, founded by the late Mrs. J. Bowen Thompson, and now conducted by her sister, Mrs. A. Mentor Mott, are doing a great work for female education in Syria. They have schools in Beirut, Damascus, Baalbek, Tyre, Hasbeya, Bukfeia, Mukhtara, Zahleh, and Ain Zehalteli. This society has 17 foreign laborers, 22 catechists, 75 female teachers, 21 Bible-women, and 30 schools with 2,878 girls and 452 boys; total, 3,330 pupils.

(f) The Free Church of Scotland has a mission in the Metn district of Mount Lebanon, in connection with the Lebanon schools' committee. This mission has 23 catechists, 7 female teachers, 35 communicants, 21 schools, and 832 pupils. Rev. W. Carslaw, M.D., labors in harmony and close connection with the American mission.

(g) The Society of Friends in England and America have a mission in Lebanon at Brummana, and also schools at Ramallah and vicinity in Palestine. Mr. Theophilus Waldemeier of the mission at Brummana was one of the captives in Abyssinia under King Theodore, and has labored industriously in founding the Boys' Industrial School, the Girls' Boarding-school, and the Hospital and Dispensary, together with various village schools. The society have 10 schools with 300 pupils.

Other societies besides those mentioned above are laboring in Syria and Palestine, the chief of which are the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews, Miss Taylor's Muslim Girls' School, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission in Latakiah, the Crishona Orphan-House Mission, Miss Arnett's School, the Mary Baldwin Memorial School, and Miss Mangun's Medical Mission (the last three at Jaffa).

The whole number of foreign laborers, male and female, in Syria and Palestine in 1881 was 191, with 581 native teachers and catechists, 26 churches, 140 preaching-stations, 1,700 communicants, 6,311 Protestant adherents, 302 schools with 14,624 pupils, of whom 7,475 were boys and 7,149 girls.

The medical missions are 12 in number, with 15 physicians, 21 nurses, 1,805 indoor-patients, and 73,432 outdoor-patients in polyclinique.

In addition to the Protestant educational institutions in Syria and Palestine, numerous schools have been opened by other sects, foreign and native; and the Turkish Government is urging upon the provincial governors the opening of midrises for the Muslim children.

VI. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE may be said to date back to the Crusades, when the Latin priests made an attempt to convert the Oriental churches to Rome. But within the past two centuries their efforts, as stated above, have resulted in the founding of various affiliated churches, known as Greek-Catholic, Syrian-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic, etc. More recently the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Lazarists have set themselves to the work of caring for these native Catholic sects, proselytizing the Oriental sects, and counteracting the influence of Protestant missions.

The Jesuits have a college in Beirut with 250 pupils, and other schools with 1,000 pupils. They have also a large printing-house, and have made, under Dr. Von Hamm, an Arabic translation of the Bible from the Vulgate, including the Apocrypha. It is an elegant and expensive work, varying but slightly in text from that made by Drs. Smith and Van Dyck.

The Franciscans have a monastery and church, the Capuchins, a church and schools, and the Lazarists, schools, in Beirut. The Lazarists also have a large boys' boarding-school at Aintura in Mount Lebanon.

The French institution of the Sœurs de Charité de St. Vincent de Paul embraces an orphanage of about 600 pupils, and a day-school and boarding-school.

The Dames de Nazareth have also erected a stately building east of the Damascus Road, and have about 130 pupils.

The most important of the native Catholic institutions are the Maronite Bishop Dibbs's college with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarcal Grec Catholique with nearly 300 boys.

The city of Beirut takes the lead in education, and has become a city of schools, as the following official statistics for 1881 will show:—

While the Protestant schools are 30 in number, with 125 teachers, 575 male pupils, 2,429 female pupils, a total of 3,004, the non-Protestant schools (as Orthodox Greek, Maronite, Jesuit, Papal Greek, Lazarist Monks, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Nazareth, Maronite Bishop Dibbs's, Mohammedan, Jewish, Italian, Malame Melhany [a Maronite lady], and the Catholic St. Joseph's) number 58, with 301 teachers, 1,893 boys, 3,192 girls, a total of 8,385 pupils. Adding to these the 3,004 Protestant pupils, we have 11,389 pupils in the schools of Beirut.

The most remarkable proof of a popular awakening on the subject of education is the opening of boys' and girls' schools by the Mohammedans in Beirut, Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, Hama, and other places.

They have erected neat school-edifices, fitted with seats and desks (the girls' schools with American sewing-machines); and in Beirut they now have 1,150 boys and 120 girls under instruction.

One of the great obstacles to the evangelization of the Mohammedans is the politico-religious alliance between Islam and the State. This has increased the fanaticism of the Muslim masses. But contact with European influence, the growth of education, the reading of the Bible, the newspaper press, and the spread of a pure Christianity, are gradually leavening the minds of the Mohammedans. In 1860 the Muslims everywhere sympathized with the massacre of Christians. In 1882 the Muslims of Beirut formed a relief committee to aid the ten thousand Christian refugees who fled from the Muslim fanatical outbreak in Egypt.

Diplomacy can never regenerate the East. The patient work of education, the preaching of the gospel, the distribution of God's word among the masses, and the diffusion of Christian literature, will gradually disarm prejudice, awaken inquiry, promote social harmony, destroy polygamy, reform the Oriental churches, and bring the followers of Islam to the religion of Jesus Christ. Thus will the press, the church, and the school co-operate in hastening the true regeneration of that most interesting, and, until recently, so degraded land.

SYRIAC LITERATURE. The literature of the Syriac tongue is mostly biblical and ecclesiastical; the rest being historical, poetical, legendary, folk-lore, and translations (chiefly) from the Greek classics and Fathers. The extant Syriac literature (proper) begins with the second century A.D., and ends shortly after the Crusades; though later works exist, related to the earlier, like the Latin of the middle ages to that of the classic period. The modern Syriac, easily acquired by a reader of ancient Syriac or of Arabic, has a literature of its own, both native, and fostered by the American and the Jesuit missionaries, and current from Mosul to Urm (Oroniah). For an account of this language and literature, see Dr. Justin Perkins's Eight Years in Persia, Andover, 1843; also a partial bibliography in the Introductory Remarks of Rev. D. T. Stoddard's Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (in Journal of the American Oriental Society, also separately, New Haven, 1855); also Socin's Die Neu-Aramäische Dialecte von Urmia bis Mosul (autolithographic text, with German translation, Tübingen, Laupp, 1882); and Noldecke's notice of the same in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 609 ff. The words of this dialect are incorporated into R. Payne Smith's Thesaurus Syriacus, vol. i. Oxon., 1879. The chief monument of this dialect is the Bible by Dr. Justin Perkins (Urm, New Testament, 1846; Old Testament, 1852), and, next, a manuscript lexicon, Syriac-English, compiled principally by Deacon Joseph, Dr. Perkins's assistant and translator. (See art. PERKINS.) Other works are missionary literature, Protestant and Catholic, with a few native historical, poetical, and moral works. A great portion of this literature is still extant only in manuscript.

Another dialect, called Turāni, is spoken in the Mesopotamian region of Tūr 'Abdin, a portion of which has been reduced to writing, and published by Eugen Prym and Albert Socin. For an account of this dialect, see Prym and Socin's Der Neu-Aramäische Dialect von Tūr 'Abdin (Göttingen, Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1881, 2 vols.), and art. by Socin, in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 238 ff. Neither the modern Syriac nor the Turāni has yet superseded the ancient Syriac in the church service-books, except among the Protestants.

The ancient Syriac literature might be treated under various divisions, but the most convenient is that of age. There are three well-marked periods: I. From the second century to the Mohammedan conquest, A.D. 636; II. From the Mohammedan conquest to the decay of Syriac as a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From 1318 onward, when Arabic was established as the common vernacular, and writers wrote in either tongue, and some in Greek also. Throughout, the Syriac maintained itself as a beautiful and flexible language; easily receiving accessions from other tongues, abounding always in Grecisms and Greek words, till it even naturalized French and English words in the times of the Crusades, and later.

Period I., Second Century to A.D. 636.—Chiefly worthy of note are the Bible versions. First, doubtless, the Curetonian, dating, probably, from the second century, extant only in fragments of sixth-century manuscripts (found at the convent of Sta. Maria Deipara, in the Nitrian Desert), named from the discoverer, and published by him (London, 1858); other fragments privately printed by W. Wright [London, 1872]. Second, the Peshitto, a recension of the Curetonian, perhaps, which probably assumed its present shape in the fourth century; a noble version, and the best monument of the ancient language. The New Testament lacks the Epistles, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and Jude, with the Apocalypse. Third, the Philoxenian, made by the chorepiscopus Polycarp, A.D. 508, for Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis (or Mabûg). This was based on the Peshitto. It is probably extant in those Epistles which are lacking in the Peshitto, but printed in the common editions of the Syriac New Testament; and in the Gospels it is probably most nearly represented by a manuscript belonging to the Syrian-Protestant College at Beirut, and brought to light by the present writer. (See Notes on the Beirut Syriac Codex, in Jour. Soc. Bibl. Lit. and Exegesis, 1882, pp. 2 ff.) Fourth, the Harklensian, a recension of the Philoxenian, made by Thomas of Harkel, A.D. 616. The Gospels are extant in several manuscripts. The rest of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, is extant in one manuscript. Fifth, contemporaneous with the Philoxenian, and almost a part of the same labor, is the Hexaplar version of sundry portions of the Old Testament, made by Paul of Tella, A.D. 616. Sixth, the Palestinian or Jerusalem version, extant only in portions of an Evangelistarium in the Vatican Library (published at Verona, 1861, by Count F. Miniscalchi Erizzo), and a few fragments published by Land in his Anecdota (tom. iv., Lugd. Bat., 1875). A few other versions of portions (at least) of the Bible are extant only in scraps and quotations.

In this connection it is to be mentioned the Diatessaron of Tatian the Assyrian, which was either originally composed in Syriac, or had its chief circulation in a Syriac version. The work itself is now lost; but a commentary thereon by Ephrem Syrus (fourth century) is extant in an Armenian translation (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1536; Latin version again, revised, Venice, 1876). Tatian's work dates about A.D. 155-170, and is the most important early witness to the general recognition of the four Gospels.

Other works of this early period were translations of the Epistles of Clement of Rome, of the Festal Letters of Athanasius (extant in one of the earliest known Syriac manuscripts, discovered by Cureton, and published by him at London, 1848), of portions of Eusebius, of Josephus, etc.

The commentaries, and especially the hymns, and homilies of Ephrem Syrus (fourth century, deacon of Edessa) have been hitherto as noted as any non-biblical Syriac remains. (The homily, in Syriac, is usually a sermon in verse, heptasyllabic, octosyllabic, or dodecasyllabic.) Ephrem was inspired to sing by the earlier poetry of Bar Desanes the Gnostic. Ephrem is the greatest name in early Syriac literature and sainthood, and many works of others have wrongly been attributed to him. His hymns and homilies are beautiful and poetic, but very didactic and dogmatic.

A throng of writers—homilists, chroniclers, and translators—belong to this period, many of whose works are lost, and many others extant only in manuscript, for a catalogue of whom reference is best had to Aug. Friedrich Pfeiffer's condensation of J. S. Assemani's Biblioth. Oriental., Erlangen, 1776. Of especial note are Joshua the Stylite, whose Chronicle (A.D. 507) was best published by W. Wright (Cambridge, 1882); Jacob, or James, of Sarûg, of whose works one of the most curious is the Homily on the Baptism of Constantine, published at Rome, 1882, with Italian translation and notes, by Arthur L. Frothingham, jun. Of very great importance is the anonymous Chronicle of Edessa (circa A.D. 550), containing a great wealth of church and secular history. Edessa was the literary home of the Syriac tongue, as Antioch of the Syrian Church.

The Syriac hymnology and liturgical literature of this period deserve a volume for their treatment, if for no other purpose than to show their influence on the Western hymnology and liturgies.

The publication of many important works of this period has been accomplished in great part by the enterprise of scholars of the present generation.

Period II., A.D. 636-1318.—During this period chroniclers and poets were more in fashion, and they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Lexicographers and grammarians also, with law-writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, likewise abounded in this period; although almost every writer was an ecclesiastic of some grade, or a monk.

Prominent is Dionysius of Tell Mahre, a Jacobite bishop and patriarch (Jlor. A.D. 750-845), established in power by the Caliph Abdallah. His Chronicle was written before he became bishop, or before A.D. 775; and in it he treated of historical subjects from the beginning of the world to about A.D. 755. His Chronicle incorporated, and preserved as well, the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite above mentioned. A long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Salibi, bishop of Amida (Jlor. circa A.D. 1154-71), whose commentaries, theological works, and liturgies are of great value for critical purposes. Then, after another swarm of writers, appears Gregory Bar-Hebraeus, called also Abu-l-Farag (Abulpharagius) (b. A.D. 1226). His Chronicle and commentaries are crowded with invaluable material of every sort. He wrote Arabic, as well as Syriac. His works are quite voluminous, and among Syriac authors he ranks among the very first for utility and value, although of so late a date.

A long list of writers on other topics might be named as belonging in this period, but we can stop to mention but one for his importance, — Jeshua (Jesus) Bar-Bahlul (circa A.D. 963), who published a lexicon of his tongue that is still extant. Several grammars of the period are extant, both in manuscript and in print.

To this period belongs also the Nestorian (a word which ought to be replaced by "Chaldean") writer, Ebed-Jesu, metropolitan of Soba and Armenia (d. 1318). His most noted and noteworthy book is his catalogue of the Sacred Scriptures and of patristic writings or writers, including many, if not most, of the known Greek and Syrian Fathers. This work, like that of Gregory Bar Hebraeus, is among those indispensable to the biblical critic.

This period was one of great literary activity, as well as of life, throughout the Syriac-speaking peoples. Missions were extended eastward to the Pacific. It was in A.D. 781 that the famous Chinese-Syriac monument was set up, which records the planting of Christianity in China by the Syrian missionaries. Copies of this tablet, in facsimile, are in several of our libraries; and notices and translations appear in a long series of books in many languages, from Kircher (1631) to Doolittle and Williams. (See, e.g., Pfeiffer, ubi supra, pp. 193 ff.)

Period III., from A.D. 1318 onward. — The death of Ebed-Jesu marks the close of the classic period. After him there follows a very long and numerous series of writers of less note, among whom few, if any, could require particular mention here. Their works are chiefly valuable to the linguist, or in special limited investigations. As in earlier times, most of them were ecclesiastics.

Concerning the development of the language, the contrast between the Peshitto and the Harklensian versions appears very strong to one who reads only those specimens of the literature. Such a reader is apt to suppose that the Peshitto represents the pure Syriac, and the Harklensian a strong Greek element; but a more extended reading shows that the Harklensian bears also a later Syriac character, and that the Peshitto was already rather solemn and antiquated before the Philoxenian was made. The idiom of the Harklensian has much in common with the style of the secular writings, both those of earlier and those of later date than itself. As time went on, the Grecisms scarcely decreased, but the Arabisms became more frequent. The secular language, also, is more flexible, and indulges more in complex syntactical structures.

A catalogue of printed Syriac books would far exceed the limits of this whole article. The best bibliography of printed ancient Syriac literature is to be found in Dr. EDWARD NESTLÉ'S Biblical Ling. Syr. Gen., Literature, etc. (one of the series Porta Ling. Orientalis, begun by Petermann, Carlsruhe, at Lipsie, Reuther, 1881, Literatura, pp. 1-39); but a very considerable number of printed books have appeared since that work. The best accounts of Syriac manuscript literature are to be found in the following works: Hebædusa Peshito, etc., ed. AMR. ECHHELLENSIS (Rome, 1653); J. S. ASSEMÂNI: *Biblioth. Of the editions of the Bible in ancient Syriac, a critical edition of the Peshitto is still a desideratum. For the New Testament, the best editions are (for text) the ed. princeps of WIDMANNSTADT (Vienna, 1555, now very rare) and the American editions (Urm, 1816, New York, 1871); of the Old Testament, the Urm edition of 1852. The Ambrosian Codex of the Old Testament, edited by A. M. Ceriani (Milan, 1876, etc.), is the oldest Old Testament manuscript, and all important. For other editions, and editions of the Apocrypha, see NESTLÉ (ubi supra). A very useful work is the Psalter, the "first labor" of the American press at Urm (1811), printed for the use of the Nestorian (Chaldean) ecclesiastics. It contains parallel Scripture references and the prayers and rubrics used in public service. Much of this accessory matter has found its way into other editions of the Psalter. The older editions of the New Testament give the Nestorian (Chaldean) church-lessons. For further information respecting the Syrian writers mentioned in this article, see respective arts. SYROPULOS, Sylvester, a Greek ecclesiastic of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable history of the Council of Ferrara-Florence (see art.). He was desambonias ("law-officer") and chief saeristan in Constantinople, one of the five dignitaries immediately about the patriarch. He was passionately devoted to his church, and opposed to the Latin. Nevertheless, he was a delegate to the Council of Ferrara-Florence, especially designed to effect a union between the Greek and Latin churches, took part in its deliberations, and by command of his sovereign signed the decrees. This act of weakness he deeply lamented; and by his efforts to defeat the practical effect of the decrees he encountered such opposition, that he was forced to retire to private life. The only edition of his work is the copy of the Paris Codex, which unhappily lacks the first book, issued by Robert Ceygton, Vita hist. manus., . . . see Concilia Florentina auctissima narratio, The Hague, 1660. TABERNACLE (ohel mo'ed, or ohel ha-eduth, or mishkan ha-eduth) denotes the movable sanctuary of the Hebrews prior to the time of Solomon. Other terms are mikdash (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4), mishkan (Exod. xxv. 9), bayith, i.e., house (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31), ohel, i.e., the tent, also heykal, i.e., temple (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and ma'in, i.e., dwelling (1 Sam. ii. 29, 32).

PREPARATION OF THE BUILDING.—As Jehovah went before the people in the pillar of cloud and of fire, as it was his intention to show and to reveal his presence unto the people, whether they were on the way or in their tents, therefore he promised unto the people, "In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee" (Exod. xx. 21). To make this place of blessed meeting a visible reality, not only does God show unto Moses the model pattern of the tabernacle and of all the instruments (Exod. xxv. 9, 40, xxvi. 30, xxvii. 8), but the people are also directed to bring freewill offerings, or rather the material, which is to be used under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The sin of the golden calf apparently delays the execution. On the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched (probably that of Moses himself, which had hitherto been the headquarters of consultation) outside of the camp, to be provisionally the tabernacle of meeting. This provisional tent is accepted of God, and dedicated by his divine presence (Exod. xxxiii. 9). After God has become reconciled again to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves under the direction of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan.

STRUCTURE OF THE TABERNACLE AND THE COURT (Exod. xxv.-xxvii., xxxv.-xxxviii.).—1. The Tabernacle formed a rectangle of thirty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high. The outside length was thirty cubits and a half: the outside width, eleven cubits. The walls were built of forty-eight planks of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold on both sides, ten cubits high, and a cubit and a half broad. Of these boards, which were in close contact with each other, twenty were on the north, and twenty on the south side; for the west end were eight boards. From the foot of each plank came out two "tenons" (qadaboth), which were thrust into two silver sockets, of which two were prepared for each plank, each socket being the weight of a talent of silver (xxxviii. 27). These tenons were to be "coupled together." The walls or planks were bound together by five bars or bolts, thrust into rings attached to each plank. These bars ran along the outside: one is said to have gone in the middle. The structure was adorned by four kinds of hangings. The roofing material was canvas, consisting of ten "curtains," each twenty-eight cubits long and four cubits wide. Ten of these were to be "coupled," i.e., sewed together, five in one sheet, and five in another. This was done by means of fifty "loops" and as many taches of "gold." The connecting line run over the curtain of the Holy of holies. This curtain was of byssus, with figures of cherubim stitched upon it, apparently with the art of the embroiderer. The second set of curtains, or tent-roof, of goat's hair, called also ohel, consisted of eleven pieces of stuff, each thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. They were sewed into two large cloths, and suspended on fifty knobs, or taches, of brass by means of fifty loops. A coat of "rams' skins dyed red, and tachash (A. V. badgers') skins," was furnished as an additional covering (xxvi. 14, milmalah, i.e., from upward). The entrance to the tabernacle was towards the east, and closed by a "hanging" of byssus, and embroidered, suspended upon five copper-socketed and gilded pillars of acacia-wood by means of golden hooks. A "veil" divided the interior into two apartments, called respectively the "holy place" and the "most holy." This partition-cloth was suspended upon four pillars precisely like those of the door "hauging," except that their sockets were of silver.

2. The Court was a large rectangular enclosure a hundred cubits long and fifty broad. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shod by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twined shesh, that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shesh (A. V., fine linen).

THE FURNITURE OF THE TABERNACLE.—The only piece of furniture within the inner or most holy place was the ark of the covenant (q.v.). The furniture of the outer room, or holy place, consisted of the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the "golden candlestick" (q.v.). In the court was the altar of burnt offering and the laver (q.v.).

3. Provisions for the Transport (Num. iv. 4-33). The Levitical family of Kohath, to which Aaron's family also belonged, had to carry all the vessels of the Holy of holies (Num. iv. 1, 15). Then came the family of Gershon with the tabernacle and its lighter furniture, while the Merarites had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The sons of Aaron prepared for the removal by covering every thing in the Holy of holies with a purple cloth. The Kohathites had to carry every thing on their shoulders; the Merarites had four wagons for their transport.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TABERNACLE.—As the name indicates, it was to be the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of his people. As king of his people he dwells in his palace. His throne is over the kophereth ("the mercy-seat"), between the cherubim, which, however, must not be taken in an anthropopathic manner. If there was to be a mutual relation between the holy and living God and his people, which he selected from among the nations of the earth to be the bearer of his name, revelation, and word, it was necessary to have some means of approaching God. This access is mediated in a gradual manner. In the court, as the lowest grade, the people meet, partly to bring their offerings to Jehovah, partly to hear the revelation of his divine will, and to receive his mercy and blessing. Being sinful, the people do not dare yet to enter the sanctuary: they need human mediators, the priests, who in their stead present themselves to God. But the priests themselves can only approach Jehovah in an immediate manner in their high priest, who only once in the year can enter the Holy of holies, where the throne of Jehovah's glory is. This leads us to the New-Testament idea of the Tabernacle (cf. Heb. viii. 2, 5, ix. 1-11, 23 sq., x. 1, 19 sq.; cf. Col. ii. 17; Eph. ii. 14-22; Rev. xxi. 3), — that the entire structure of the tabernacle was nothing but a typical prophecy of the New-Testament economy, according to which, after the eternal high priest had entered the Holy of holies with his own blood, all curtains are removed, and that all who have become Abraham's children by faith have a daily access to the mercy-seat, and that they shall once also enter the Holy of holies of the heaven (Heb. xii. 1 sq., 23 sq.). As to the symbolic signification of the tabernacle, there can be no doubt that the structure of the same was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning remains one of the things which will always be guess-work. Jewish rabbis as well as Christian theologians have exercised their ingenuity, with more or less success. Thus the material, not less than the forms, in the Holy of holies, was significant. The metals, colors, and numbers had their signification. Thus three is the numerical "signature" of the Divine Being and of all that stands in any real relation to God (Num. vi. 21-26; Isa. vi. 3). The number three being the "signature" of God, of the Creator, four is the signature of nature, of the created things of the world; not of the world as "without form, and void," but as a kosmos, as the revelation of God so far as nature can reveal him. Ten is the symbol of completeness and perfection, while five represents one-half of the "signature" of perfection. Seven (i.e., 3+4) is the note of union between God and the world, the number of religion, the signature of salvation, blessing, peace, perfection. Twelve denotes by multiplication the combination of the signature of God and the signature of the world (3+4).

HISTORY OF THE TABERNACLE. — After the sanctuary was completed, under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab, it was dedicated on the first day of the second year from the exodus, and the ritual appointed for it began (Exod. xl. 2). After the entrance into Canaan, the tabernacle was in the camp of Israel, at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 19, v. 10, vi. 24, ix. 6, x. 6, xiv. 6), and, after the taking and division of the country, at Shiloh (xviii. 1, 10, xiv. 51). At Shiloh it continued during the whole period of the judges; but, when the ark of God was taken, the sanctuary lost its glory. It probably became once again a movable sanctuary; less honored, as no longer possessing the symbol of the divine presence, yet cherished by the priest-hood, and some portions, at least, of its ritual kept up. For a time it seems, under Saul, to have been settled at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 1-6), which thus became a priestly city. The massacre of the priests probably caused its removal from Nob to Gibeon, where it connected itself with the worship of the high places (1 Kings iii. 4), while the ark remained at Kirjath-jearim. The capture of Jerusalem, and the erection there of a new tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctuary. The provisional tabernacle erected by David was to make room for the temple which he intended to build. His purpose was fulfilled by Solomon, who had the tabernacle, and the ark, and all the holy vessels, brought to Jerusalem, and put in some place within the temple, to remain there as holy relics (1 Kings vii. 1; 2 Chron. v. 5).

LEYRER. (B. PICK.)

TABERNACLE is a term originally applied to an ambry above the altar, for the preservation of the Eucharist, contained in the pyx, which had the shape of a tower, more often that of a dove. This ambry stood either on the altar, or was suspended. From the fourteenth century on, the pyx containing the Eucharist was preserved in a stationary place called tabernacles, built either in the form of a tower, and standing near the wall or a pillar, or made like coffers, which were more or less decorated. In both forms they were on the right side of the altar. They form an indispensable piece of furniture in the Church of Rome. In the Evangelical Church, which refuses the ultra-sacramental use of the body of the Lord, they have no liturgical value; yet as works of art there still exist some very fine tabernacles in some evangelical churches, as in Nuremberg and Ulm. Since the sixteenth century, the tabernacles have been connected with the altar in order to be more conspicuous. The tabernacle, as well as the pyx, is also termed tabernaculum, which must not be connected with the Latin tabula (i.e., board), but with the Greek tabaron, meaning the canopy on the altar, supported by columns. The term ciborium was also applied to the pyx, the monstrance, and to the tabernacle itself, because it formed as it were a protecting cover. The monstrance may be regarded as a portable tabernacle. MEUKER.

TABERNACLES, The Feast of (חג המצות ḥag ha-matzot in the LXX., συνταγία in John vii. 2 and Josephus, συναί in Philo, ἡ συναί in Plutarch, Symp. iv. 6, 2), also called the feast of ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16), is the last of the three yearly festivals which the Mosaic law ordained to be celebrated at the tabernacle. The account of its institution is given in Exod. xxiii. 14 sqq.; Lev. xxiii. 31 sqq.; Dent. xvi. 13 sqq. The descriptions of the Old Testament absolutely exclude the hypotheses of some recent writers, who identify the festival with the harvest festivals of heathen peoples. The feast of tabernacles was designed to be a reminder of the time when the Israelites dwelt in booths in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii. 43), and lasted seven days (Lev. xxiii. 39),—from the 15th to the 21st of Tisri. The people were to dwell in booths (Lev. xxiii. 42), and to take "branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook." This festival was emphatically a festival of rejoicing; [and a proverb in Succah says, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life"]. Burnt, meat, drink, and other offerings were to be made. Deuteronomy alone designates the place of celebrating the feast,— "the place which the Lord shall choose" (xvi. 15). Zechariah (xiv. 16) insists upon its celebration, and Nehemiah (viii. 17) says the feast had not been celebrated since the days of Joshua as it was in his day. This notice cannot exclude, however, all celebration of the festival during the interval (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. vii. 8-10).

The booths were erected in the streets, outside the walls of Jerusalem, and on the roofs. Joy and mirth prevailed in them. The main features of the public celebration were the sacrifices by day and the illumination at night. Four hundred and twenty-four priests were in attendance, to serve those who brought sacrifices. Once every day the entire congregation encompassed the altar of burnt offerings, waving palm-branches. On the seventh day this was repeated seven times, in memory of Jericho. The branches mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40 were tied into a bunch, and called lulabh. During the sacrifices the great Hallel (Ps. cxiii.-cxviii.) was sung, and at the twenty-fourth verse of Ps. cxviii. every one shook his palm-branch a number of times. After the sacrifices the priestly blessing was conferred. Wine, and water from the brook of Siloam, were used for the drink-offering, both morning and evening. One of the priests carried a cup of the water through the water-gate of the temple, when another priest took it, with the words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). The priests and people took up the shout; and the priest, going to the altar, mixed it with wine, and poured it out into a duct which led to the Kidron. The origin of this custom is unknown; but it is very generally agreed that our Lord had reference to it when he said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John vii. 37). The words of John viii. 12 ("I am the light of the world") seem to contain an allusion to the great illumination which took place on the evenings of the feast of tabernacles; four golden lamps, or candelabra, in the court of the women, being illuminated. Upon the lighting of these lights, there followed dancing and processions.

The eighth day of the feast, a sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 39), had a special name, yom azereth, and marked the dismantling of the booths. The seventh day marked the culmination of the feast, and was undoubtedly "the great day of the feast," referred to in John vii. 37. W. PRESSEL.

TABOR (mount). This interesting and remarkable mount in Palestine, at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun (Josh. xix. 22; Judg. iv. 6, 12, 14), rises abruptly from the north-eastern arm of the plain of Esdraelon, and stands entirely insulated, except on the west, where a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth. It presents to the eye, as seen from a distance, a beautiful appearance; being so symmetrical in its proportions, and rounded off like a hemisphere, yet varying somewhat as viewed from different directions, being more conical when seen from the east or west. It is now called Jebel et-Tûr. The body of the mountain consists of the peculiar limestone of the country. Mount Tabor lies about six or eight miles almost due east from Nazareth. The ascent is usually made on the west side, and it requires three-quarters of an hour, or an hour, to reach the top. The path is circuitous, and at times steep. The trees and bushes are generally so thick as to intercept the prospect; but now and then the traveller, as he ascends, comes to an open spot which reveals to him a magnificent view of the plain. All round the top are the foundations of a thick wall built of large stones. The chief remains are upon the ledge of rocks on the south of the little basin, and especially towards its eastern end. The walls and traces of a fortress are seen here. Whilst now a little chapel stands here, where the priests from Nazareth perform divine service, in olden times the mountain had cities and a large population. Thus a city of Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron. vi. as a city of the Merarite Levites in the tribe of Zebulun (77). Mount Tabor makes a prominent figure in ancient history. Here Barak assembled his forces against Sisera (Judg. iv. 6-15). The brothers of Gideon were murdered here by Zebah and Zalmunna (viii. 18, 19). In the year B.C. 218 Antiochus the Great got possession of Tabor by stratagem, and strengthened its fortifications. In the monastic ages Tabor, in consequence, partly, of a belief that it was the scene of the Saviour's transfiguration, was crowded with hermits (but there is no foundation for this tradition); partly because, according to Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, Luke ix. 28, the transfiguration must have taken place on some high mountain near Caesarea-Philippi; and partly because a fortified and inhabited place could hardly have been a proper place for such a scene. The crusaders again fortified the mount, at whose base the main street runs from Egypt to Damascus. In their time Mount Tabor was an archiepiscopal see belonging to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Tancréd built there a church, and the Chmiciensians a monastery. But all was lost in the battle of Hattin, July 5, 1187.

The Saracens, under Saladin, destroyed the fortresses; and in 1283 Brocardes only found the remains of palaces, convents, and churches there.

TADMOR, mentioned only in 2 Chron. viii. 1, is undoubtedly the name of that ancient city which to the Greeks, Romans, and to modern Europe, is known by the name of Palmyra. In the Chronicles the city is mentioned as having been built by Solomon after his conquest of Hamath-zobah, and is named in conjunction with "all the store cities which he built in Hamath." It was probably built with the view of securing an interest in, and command over, the great caravan traffic from the East, similar to that which he had established in respect to the trade between Syria and Egypt. We do not again read of Tadmor in Scripture, nor is it likely that the Hebrews retained possession of it long after the death of Solomon. No other source acquaints us with the subsequent history of the place, till it reappears in the account of Pliny (Hist. Nat., v. 21) as a considerable town, which, along with its territory, formed an independent state between the Roman and Parthian Empires. In the second century it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian, as may be inferred from a statement of Stephanus of Byzantium, as to the name of the city having been changed to Hadrianopolis ("city of Hadrian"). Under Septimius Severus it became a Roman colony, and received the jus Italicum; but it had a government of its own, and was ruled by its own laws. The most interesting period in the history of Tadmor is the time of Odenathus and Zenobia. The Emperor Valerian being captured by the Persians, Odenathus, one of the citizens of Palmyra, revenged the wrongs of the fallen emperor, and vindicated the majesty of Rome. He marched against the Persians, took the province of Mesopotamia, and defied Sapor beneath the walls of Ctesiphon (A.D. 260). The services thus rendered to Rome were so great, that Odenathus was associated in the sovereignty with Gallienus (A.D. 261). He enjoyed his dignity but a short time, being murdered only three years afterwards. Zenobia, his widow, succeeded Odenathus as Queen of the East, and ruled the country during a period of five years. In A.D. 271 the Emperor Aurelian turned his arms against her; and having defeated her in a pitched battle near Antioch, and in another at Emesa, he drove her back upon her desert home. He then marched his veterans across the parched plains, and invested Palmyra. Zenobia attempted to escape, but was captured, and brought back to the presence of the conqueror. She was taken to Rome, and there she was led along in front of the triumphant Aurelian. Palmyra, which was taken in A.D. 272, never recovered its former opulence. Twenty years later, under the reign of Diocletian, the walls of the city were rebuilt. It eventually became the seat of a bishop, but never recovered any importance. When the successors of Mohamr med extended their conquests beyond the confines of Arabia, Palmyra became subject to the caliphs. From this period Palmyra seems to have gradually fallen into decay. Not once is it mentioned in the history of the crusades. In 1173 it was visited by Benjamin of Tudela, who found there a large Jewish population, besides Mohammedans and Christians. It was again visited in 1751 by Wood and Dawkins. In our century many travellers have visited the place, and their descriptions are very valuable. A complete list of all travels till the year 1851 is given by Ritter, Erkunde von Kleinasien, vol. viii. 2d division, 3d section, pp. 1132 sq.

TAI-PING (great peace), a Chinese religious sect established by Hung-Sin-Tsuen, b. in a little village thirty miles from Canton, 1813; d. at Nanking, July 19, 1862. While on a visit to Canton to attend the official examinations, he received from L. J. Roberts, an American missionary, a package of tracts in Chinese. Five years afterwards he fell sick, and had visions, in which an old man with a golden beard commanded him to destroy the demons (i.e., the idol-gods) of his countrymen. He then first read the tracts; and associating the man in his visions with Christ, and catching up several Christian ideas, he abandoned the Chinese religion, and started forth valiantly to preach his new faith. He retired to the mountains, and gathered by 1840 many converts, whom he styled "God-worshippers." He carried out his supposed commission, and destroyed some Buddhist idols. This brought him in conflict with the government, so that he again retired to the mountains. In 1850 he started upon a new enterprise. The time was ripe for rebellion; and he slowly proclaimed himself as sent by Heaven to drive out the Tartars, and set up a native Chinese dynasty. His standard was pushed victoriously forward. Nanking was captured in 1852. The Tai-ping dynasty was founded, with himself as the first emperor, under the title Teen-Wang ("the heavenly king"). The rebels would probably have been able to carry out their plans, had they not been defeated by the English and French troops, acting in concert with the Chinese. When Nanking was taken, Sin-Tsuen burned himself and wives in his palace.

Sin-Tsuen's religious views were a mixture of Christian and Chinese elements. He considered Christ the oldest of the sons of God, and himself one of the younger. In his manifestoes he grouped God the Father, Jesus Christ, himself and his son, whom he styled the "Junior Lord," as the co-equal rulers of the universe. He adopted baptism, but rejected the Lord's Supper, allowed polygamy (he had himself a hundred and eighteen wives), punished adultery and opium-smoking with death. Cf. TAIT, Archibald Campbell, Archbishop of Canterbury; the son of Craufurd Tait, Esq., a Scotch lawyer; was b. in Edinburgh, Dec. 22, 1811; d. at Croydon, Dec. 3, 1882. After passing through the high school and academy of Edinburgh, he went in 1827 to Glasgow University, and in 1830 entered Balliol College, Oxford, graduating B.A. with first-class honors, and becoming fellow and tutor. He took a prominent part in opposing Tractarianism, and was one of the four tutors who entered a protest against Tract No. 90, written to show that a Roman Catholic might sign the Thirty-nine Articles. In 1842 he was appointed Dr. Arnold's successor at Rugby, administering the office with success. While at Rugby he married a daughter of Archdeacon Spooner. Mrs. Tait died Dec. 1, 1878. In 1850 Mr. Tait accepted the deanery of Carlisle, and became well known as a hard-working parish clergyman. In 1856 he was appointed Bishop of London, as successor of Dr. Blomfield; the immediate occasion of the appointment being, as it is supposed, the Queen's sympathy for him in the loss of five daughters by scarlet-fever. Bishop Tait initiated the scheme for raising a million pounds to meet the deficiency of church accommodation in London. In 1868 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, he having before refused the archbishopric of York. Dr. Tait presided over the Pan-Anglican synod at Lambeth, July, 1878. His only son died in 1878. Archbishop Tait was a representative of Low-Church views, and managed with great courtesy and excellent judgment the conflicting relations of the ritualists, and ecclesiastical law of England. He was a man of sound piety and practical common sense rather than of pre-eminent literary attainments. His relations to dissenting ecclesiastical bodies were friendly, as is witnessed by his letter to the Evangelical Alliance held in New York, 1873. Among his published writings are two volumes of Sermons, 1861; The Tempers and Supper of Modern Theology, 1861; The Word of God and the Ground of Faith, 1863, 1861, 2 parts; Some Thoughts on the Duties of the Church of England (a clerical charge), 1876; The Church of the Future (a clerical charge), 1880, etc. See Memoirs of Catharine and Craufurd Tait, by Rev. W. BENHAM, London and New York, 1880; A. C. BICKLEY: A Sketch of the Public Life of the Late Archbishop of Canterbury [A. C. Tait], London, 1883; Lord and Tait, by a churchman, London, 1883.

TALLIS, Thomas, b. about 1529; d. Nov. 25, 1585. He was organist of the Chapel Royal, under Queen Elizabeth, and has been styled the "father of English cathedral music." He published, with his pupil William Byrd, a collection of music for churches, which is still in use.

TALMUD, written also THALMUD (from lamad, "to learn," is the designation given by the Jews to their body of law not comprised in the Pentateuch. It was long forbidden to reduce it to writing; and hence it bears the name of the oral law, to distinguish it from the written law contained in the five books of Moses, of which it professes to be the guardian (hedge) and explanation. According to the rabbis, the oral law was necessary from the beginning for the understanding of the written law, and was actually given to Moses by God. This latter point they attempt to prove by appealing to Exod. xxiv. 12, where the Lord declares to Moses, "I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them." Of these words we have in the Talmud (Berachoth, fol. 5 a) this curious exposition: "The tables are the ten commandments. The law is the written law. The commandments is the Mishna. Which I have written means the prophets and Hagiographa. To teach them means the Gemara. It teaches us that they were all given to Moses from Sinai." In this quotation, mention is made of the two parts of which the Talmud is composed.—The Mishna and the Gemara. The former is the text, and the latter the commentary. The name Talmud is often restricted, especially by Jewish writers, to the Gemara. The compiler of the Mishna (from shanah, "to repeat," also "to learn") was Rabbi Jehudah, surnamed Hak-kadosh, the Holy, and Hannasi, the Prince. He is often called simply rabbi by way of eminence. According to Jost, he died A.D. 219 or 220; according to others, shortly before the close of the second century. He undertook to sift and reduce to order the oral law. Such an attempt had been made before him, but he completed the work. He wrote nothing down, but arranged every thing in his mind. He twice subjected his compilation to a revision and correction. The doctors introduced as speaking in the Mishna are called Tanaim, from the Aramaic form of the root of Mishna. The Tanaim profess to be the repeaters of tradition. The teachers of the oral law were first called scribes (Sopherim), next elders (Zekenim), next the wise (Chakhamim); after the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, Tanaim; after the compilation of the Mishna till the completion of the Gemara, Amoraim, lit., speakers, interpreters. Comp. Jost's Geschichte des Judenthums, ii. pp. 219 sq.

The Mishna is divided into six books or orders (sedirim), entitled (1) Zeraim, seeds; (2) Moed, festivals; (3) Nashim, women; (4) Nezikim, damages; (5) Kodishim, sacred things; (6) Tohoroth, purifications. Under these six orders there are sixty-three treatises, which are again subdivided into chapters. After the completion of the official Mishna by Rabbi Jehudah, additional laws were collected by his successors; but they were not incorporated in the proper Mishna, but kept distinct from it; and this is indicated by the designation given to these extra-Mishnaic laws, Baraitas, from the word bar or bara, which means without. There are also additions to the Mishna, called Toseftas, collected during the third century. It was not till the year 550 A.D. that the Mishna was committed to writing comp. Graetz: Geschichte der Juden, iv. p. 491. The scribes, by setting up their oral law, violated the strict injunction not to add to the law of Moses (Deut. iv. 2). Traditional precepts additional to the written law were at an early date current in Israel. Isaiah complains of these human ordinances (Isa. xxix. 13); and our Lord charged the Pharisees with making the word of God of none effect by their traditions. The oral law, instead of securing the observance of the written law, superseded it. Very significantly it is said in the Book Sohar, "The grave of Moses is the Mishna, and therefore no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." The Sadducees rejected the divine authority of the oral law; and so do the Karaites, who arose in the eighth century, and who, though few in number, still exist as a distinct sect. The Mishna was not sufficient to satisfy the Jewish doctors. On its basis they formed the Gemara, a word meaning complement, or doctrine; for it can bear both these significations. The Gemara exhibits the opinions and discussions of the wise men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, called the Jerusalemite and the Babylonian, both expounding the same Mishnaic text. It was at Tiberias, near the close of the fourth century, that the redaction of what is commonly called the Jerusalemite Talmud was finished. Hence its proper title should be, not the Talmud of Jerusalem, but the Palestinian or Western Talmud. Its compilation is often attributed to Rabbi Jochanan of Tiberias, who, however, only began the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Babylonian Talmud had for its chief compiler Rabbi Ashe, head, till 427 A.D., of the school of Sura in Babylon; but its completion was reserved for Rabbi Abina, who died in 498, and who is regarded as the last of the Gemaraic doctors. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Moses went on increasing from age to age by the addition of the sayings of later doctors; and thus, like a snowball, the longer it rolled, the greater the bulk of the conglomeration.

It should be stated that only a portion of the treatises of the Mishna have their commentary in the Gemara. The Babylonian Talmud is much more highly esteemed by the Jews than the Jerusalemite, and is about four times as large as the latter. It contains two thousand nine hundred and forty-seven leaves, or double that number of folio pages. Its paging in the various editions is kept uniform, to facilitate reference. The Mishna is written, for the most part, in Hebrew in its later form, with a mixture of foreign words (Aramaic, Greek, and Latin). It is composed with extreme conciseness; the aim in expression being to use the fewest words possible, so as not to overburden the memory, when it was unlawful to write down the oral law. The language of the Gemara is a corrupt Chaldee or Aramaic. The Talmud is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. Delitzsch specifies brachylogy as characteristic of its style. Deutsch affirms, that, "in the whole realm of learning, there is scarcely a single branch of study to be compared for its difficulty to the Talmud." Lightfoot, in the preface to his Hora Hebraica et Talmudica, thus depicts the unattractiveness of the Talmudic writings. "The almost unconquerable difficulty of the style, the frightful roughness of the language, and the amazing emptiness and sophistry of the matters handled, do torture, vex, and tire him that reads them. . . . In no writers is greater or equal trifling." But he adds, "And yet in none is greater or so great benefit." And he maintains that Christians "may render them most usefully serviceable to their studies, and most eminently tending to the interpretation of the New Testament."

The Talmud treats of a vast variety of subjects. There are separate works on its civil and criminal law, its religious philosophy, its ethics, its psychology, its education, mathematics, medicine, magic, geography, zoology, botany, etc. Dr. Pick, in his article on the Talmud, referred to below, gives the titles of monographs on all these subjects. The Talmud is described by Disraeli, in his Genesis of Judaism, as containing a "prodigious mass of contradictory opinions, an infinite number of casuistical cases, a logic of scholastic theology, some recondite wisdom and much rambling dotage, many puerile tales and Oriental fancies, ethics and sophisms, reasonings and unreasonings, subtle solutions, and maxims and riddles. Nothing in human life seems to have happened which these doctors have not perplexed or provided against."

It is not necessary to take much trouble to find in the Talmud places illustrating these charges. Wagenseil (Teles Ignea, p. 587) refers to the very first words of the Mishna to show the contradictory opinions which are brought together in the Talmud. It begins with the question regarding the time of evening prayer. The answer of the Mishna and Gemara to this simple question will be found in Frossel's article on the Talmud, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie. Those who have the patience to read it will admit that it fully establishes the point for which Wagenseil made the reference. Two distinct currents of teaching may be traced in the Talmud. These are denominated respectively Halakha and Haggadha. Halakha from halakh, ("to go") means the way which one ought to go, rule, authoritative precept. Haggadha is literally what is said, declared. It is homiletical teaching, intended to edify, console, or even to entertain, and combines instruction with parable and legend. The Talmud commends the study of the oral law above that of the written word of God. "Attend, my son, to the words of the scribes rather than to the law of Moses" (Tract. Gittin, fol. 75 a). "He who goes from the Halakha to the written word has no more peace" (Tract. Chagigah, fol. 10 a). A man is directed to divide his time into three parts, and to devote one-third of it to the written law, one-third to the Mishna, and one-third to the Gemara. And the man who transgresses the words of the scribes is pronounced worthy of death (Tract. Eruvin, 21 b). Such views of the Talmud are now discarded by the more enlightened Jews. But there has been of late a persistent attempt made by Jews, who own its human origin, to glorify the Talmud at the expense of the New Testament. Deutsch's celebrated article, which appeared in The Quarterly Review, London, October, 1867, is the best known essay of this kind in the English language. But it is only one of a considerable number of writings having the same aim. Deutsch makes Christianity to have appropriated the teaching of the Jewish doctors of the Mishnaic period, and "to have earned those golden coins, hidden in the schools and among the silent community of the learned, into the market of humanity." He would have us to regard even Paul's doctrine concerning faith as genuine Pharisaism! "The faith of the heart—the dogma prominently dwelt upon by Paul—was a thing that stood much higher with the Pharisees than the outward law. It was a thing, they said, not to be commanded by any ordinance, yet was greater than all. 'Every thing,' is one of their adages, 'is in the hands of Heaven, save the fear of Heaven.'" How any one who had read Paul's writings could make faith in his system of doctrine identical with the simple fear of God may well excite astonishment. The adage which Deutsch quotes, and which is a rabbinical commonplace, is diametrically opposed to the great principle of salvation by grace, which Paul so strongly insisted on (comp. Eph. ii. 1-10), and contradicts the Old Testament, which expressly teaches that it is in the power of God to infuse his fear into the heart of man. "I will put my fear in their hearts," is a promise which the Lord has actually made (Jer. xxxii. 40, comp. xxxi. 33; Ps. lxxvi. 11; Deut. xxx. 6).

It is matter of debate whether or not the Talmud sanctions the doctrine of original sin. Graetz and Deutsch deny that it does. But Jost (Gesch. d. Jud., i. 265) expresses the opposite view. Some Christian writers have affirmed that the teaching of the rabbis on this subject does not differ from the orthodox doctrine of the church. But Vitringa (Obs. re. Sac., L. iii. C. ix.) shows that the difference between them is real and important. According to the Jewish doctors, it is the connection of the soul with the body that produces the yetsera, the evil disposition. Borrowing from Platonism or Oriental sources, they make the body the originating cause of the inclination to sin. To adopt the language of Vitringa, the church places the seat of corruption in the mind; the synagogue, in the body.

Among the questions debated by the wise men in Israel was one which is freely discussed in the present day; viz., "Is life worth living?" For full two years and a half the schools of Shammai and Hillel contended on the point whether it were better for man to have been created or not. When at last a vote was taken, a majority declared that it would have been better for man not to have been created. To this decision the addition was made, that, since man is in being, he is to be very careful in his actions (Eruvin, 2). We are utterly at a loss to understand how Graetz (Gesch., iv. 235), Deutsch, and others could assert that the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, knows nothing of a hell. If this were true, then we might vindicate for the New Testament independence of Mishnaic teaching on this point. But that treatise of the Mishna, the Pirke Aboth, from which Deutsch has culled his choicest sentences, contains in its first chapter these words: "The wise have said, Every one who talks much with the woman (his own wife, as the context shows) lays up evil for himself, and ceases from the words of the law, and his end is—he shall inherit hell (Gehenna)."

Whatever may be stated to the contrary, the Talmud, in opposition to the Old Testament, sanctions astrology. It is true, that in one place it is taught that a majority of the rabbis (not all) maintained that Israel was not under the influence of the stars, as the heathen nations confessedly are (Shabbath, fol. 156). Rashi explains that God changed the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah, in order that they might escape the baleful influence of the stars, and have a son. Astrology, as affecting all, without exception, is taught in various places in the Talmud (comp. McCaul: Old Paths, chap. xxiii.).

"Life, children, and a livelihood depend not on merit, but on the influence of the stars. . . . An eclipse of the sun is an evil sign to the nations of the world. An eclipse of the moon is an evil sign to Israel; for Israel reckons by the moon, the nations of the world, by the sun."

The virtue of amulets is recognized both in the Mishna and in the Gemara. The Mishna (Shabbath, fol. 61 a) teaches it is not lawful to go forth on the sabbath with an amulet that is not approved. An approved amulet is one that has cured three men (comp. Buxtorf: Lex. Talmud., p. 2057, under Qama). The charm prescribed in the Talmud for the scratch and bite of a mad dog has been often quoted. It is an extraordinary specimen of profane folly. We give the briefer and less known statement of the way by which we may obtain a sight of the mischievous demons, invisible to ordinary eyes, who wear out the clothes of the rabbis by rubbing against them, cause bruised legs, and want of room at the sermon:—

"Whosoever wishes to see them, let him take the interior covering of a black cat, the daughter of a first-born black cat, which is also the daughter of a first-born, and let him burn it in the fire, and pulverize it, and let him then fill his eyes with it, and he will see them," etc. (B. Rakhoth, fol. 6 a).

The little effect, it has been rightly observed, produced on the minds of the scribes and Pharisees by the display of divine power in the miracles wrought by our Lord and his disciples, was largely owing to their faith in charms and magical arts. They forgot the teaching of the law of Moses, for the observance of which they could profess such zeal (Deut. xviii. 10-12).

It is idle to quote from the Talmud examples of teaching similar to what we read in the Gospels, and thence to argue the dependence of the latter on the former. The Gospels were, we know, extant in a permanent written form long before the Mishna was compiled, and centuries before it was reduced to writing. And what if authorities for Talmudic sayings analogous to words in the New Testament can be shown to have imbibed instruction from Christians? This can be done. The Mishnaic doctor Rabbi Eliezer, to whom a striking saying, very like one uttered by our Lord, is credited, confessed to Rabbi Akiba that he had intercourse with James, a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, and that he was greatly pleased with instruction which James communicated to him as he had heard it from Jesus (Aboth Sara, fol. 16, 17). So Jonathan ben Joseph, whose teaching (Tract. Joma, 85 b) strikingly resembles that of our Saviour concerning the sabbath, is said to have had much intercourse with Christians (comp. Biesenthal: Zur Geschichte der christl. Kirche, erstes Kap.). Biesenthal calls attention to the fact that the Mishna (Tract. Megillah, cap. 4, 9) prohibits the use of Christian phrases in the public prayers of the synagogue. Expressions recognized as of Christian origin were actually heard, according to the testimony of the Mishna, at the public worship of the Jews. It is admitted, too, that the Talmud has borrowed from the neighbors of the Babylonian Jews superstitious views, and practices notoriously contrary to the spirit of Judaism (Graetz, iv. p. 410). Why, then, may it not have appropriated Christian sentiments also?

Of the rabbis whose life and teaching are related in the Talmud, none has of late years been so much spoken of as Hillel, who was still alive when our Saviour was born. The attempt has been repeatedly made to represent Jesus as standing in the relation of dependence on Hillel, as having appropriated his doctrines, and given them a wider circulation. To give some plausibility to this attempt, even the few sayings of Hillel which can fairly be compared with words of our Lord have been sometimes mistranslated. But Hillel's whole bearing toward the traditions of the elders was the very opposite of Christ's. According to Hillel, the unlearned man, who is not a student of the oral law, cannot be pious (Pirke Aboth, ii. 5; Am haetzah lo chasid). Hillel's famous saying about not doing to others what we should not like to be done to ourselves is, as Jost observes, repeated by him as a rule with which people were familiar. It is not an original thought of his; and, unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by Christ, it sets forth only the negative side of our duty to our neighbor. A full and fair statement of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus from his unique position of having none of the sons of men worthy to be placed on a line with him. Indeed, the account which Jost gives of Hillel is of itself sufficient to show how absurd it is to think of comparing him with our Saviour (comp. Jost's Gesch. des Judentums, i. pp. 251-270, and Delitzsch's Jesus und Hillel). The English reader may consult Schaff's History of the Christian Church, i. pp. 159 sq.). The precious sayings ascribed to Hillel and others, which have been extracted from the Talmud, are, to use Da Costa's language, "a few bright pearls found at the bottom of an immense heap of rubbish."

Hillel's disciples, who were the contemporaries of Christ, and leading scribes of his day, must have been extraordinary men. The Talmud tells us of them, that "thirty of them were as worthy as Moses to have the Shechinah resting on them. Thirty others were as worthy as Joshua, the son of Nun, that for them the sun should stand still." The least of all of them knew, among other things, "the language of demons, the language of palm-trees, and the language of the ministering angels" (Bera Bathra, fol. 131 a). The knowledge of these languages was in order to use enchantments. This is what the Talmud has to say of the Jewish leaders who would not acknowledge the claims of Jesus.

One is interested to know what the Talmud relates concerning the Founder of Christianity and his church. Those who have investigated this subject (Wagenseil's Tela Ignea, pp. 57 sq.) allow, that in the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, no word of blasphemy against Christ can be found. There are, however, allusions to Christian practices even in the Mishna (Biesenthal, ubi supra). The horrid blasphemies against Jesus contained in the Gemara, the older Jews, fearful of persecution, tried to refer to another Jesus than the author of the Christian religion. But modern Jews have abandoned this evasion. The English reader will find the principal blasphemous passages reflecting on the origin and character of our Saviour in Lardner's Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies (chap. v.). He will see there that the rabbis have exhibited the same malicious spirit of foul invention against the Roman general Titus, and he may form his own judgment of the trustworthiness of the Talmud on historical questions. Jost confesses (i. p. 404, note) that the Babylonian rabbis are in error beyond conception in regard to the time of Jesus, making him to have lived a hundred years too early, and that, in regard to the early Christians, the rabbis of the third or fourth century grope entirely in the dark, and have recourse to unjustifiable fables. The unmentionable calumnies fabricated against the mother of Jesus (they call her Stada; see Buxtorf: Lex. Talm., pp. 1158 sq.) are perhaps without a parallel. The account of the trial of Christ's five disciples (given also by Lardner) is one of the strangest specimens of transparent fiction, and of silly tritling with the words of Scripture. In the Basel edition of the Talmud the blasphemies against Christ are omitted.

The Mishna has been translated by Surinhusius, Rabbe, and Jost. But, though a translation of the whole Talmud has been promised and begun, there is yet no complete version of it in any language. In an age in which the sacred books of all nations are made accessible to those who cannot study them in the original, those who speak of the inexhaustible mine of wisdom hidden in the Talmud ought not to suffer it to be concealed in a language which few can read. Geiger (Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1869, p. 197) affirms that even Ewald, the celebrated Hebrew grammarian, could not accurately understand and translate a single sentence of the Talmud. [Translation of the Jerusalem Talmud, by Moses Schwab, into French, Paris, 1872 sq.; into English, London, 1885 sq.]

DUNLOP MOORE.

TAMMUZ, a sun-god, worshipped with peculiar rites by women among the Chaldeans, and even in Jerusalem (Ezek. viii. 14). In Babylon, and also in the Jewish sacred year, his month was from June 20 to July 20, the time when the days begin to shorten; in Jerusalem in the autumn, when the nights begin to be longer than the days. His annual festival, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, was a time of mourning, followed by one of joy. The old (Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome) and the majority of the new commentators connect Tammuz and Adonis, who was similarly mourned for. In the beautiful story of Istar's descent to Hades, Lenormant (Premières civilisations, vol. ii. pp. 82-99) sees the Tammuz legend, because Istar is the widow of the "Son of life," Du-mu-zi (DMZ) or Du-zi, which he thinks was changed into TMZ, as might easily be, in view of the frequency with which D and T exchange places. Tammuz was the name of the fourth month of the Jewish sacred year. See W. BARDISSIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 300 sq.; SCHRADER: Keilinschriften u. das A. T., 2d ed. p. 425.

TANCHELM, or TANCHELIN, or TANQUELIN, is a characteristic specimen of that peculiar kind of opponents which arose in various places, towards the close of the eleventh and in the beginning of the twelfth century, attacking, sometimes the dead dogmas of the scholastic speculation, sometimes the hypocrisy and corruption of the clergy, but sometimes, also, the whole fabric of the Church of Rome. Thus Tanchelm rejected not only the Pope, the bishops, the clergy, but the whole existing church, which he designated as a hypocritaria. The true church comprised only his followers, for he alone had the fulness of the spirit of God. He preached in Holland, and caused great disturbances, as he was generally received by women and persons of the lower classes as an angel from heaven. From Utrecht he was expelled by the Archbishop of Cologne. He afterwards appeared at Bruges and Antwerp; finally he was killed on board a vessel, by a priest, 1124 or 1125. The followers were brought back into the church by St. Norbert. See Epistola Trajectensis eccl. ad Fridricum Archiepiscopum Coloniensem, in TENGSTAGEL, Collectio veterum monument., Ingolstadt, 1612, and in D'ARGENTRÉ, Collectio judiciorum, Liège, 1728, tom. i. NEUDECKER.

TANCRED OF BOLOGNA, sometimes but mistakenly designated as Tancredus de Corneto, was one of the most celebrated canonists of his time; taught at Bologna since 1210, and was in 1226 made archdeacon at the cathedral. His Summa de matrimonio was written between 1210 and 1213. The first printed edition of it, by Simon Schard (Cologne, 1563), is much interpolated. The best edition is that by Agathon Wunderlich, Göttingen, 1841. Of much greater importance is his Ordo judicarius, written in 1214, often re-edited, and steadily used for many centuries. Best edition by Bergmann, Göttingen, 1842.

H. F. JACOBSON.

TÀOISM is a popular and widespread religion of China, recognized by the government, which, in A.D. 1015, granted large tracts of land as an endowment for its pope, or hereditary chief, whose name is Chang, and title, Heavenly Master, and who lives on the Lung-hü mountain, in the department of Kwang-hsin, Chiang-hsi. Taoism was originally not an organized religion, but a mass of indigenous Chinese superstitions, a belief in magic and kindred hallucinations. Its priests were necromancers, and its objects of worship were spirits. Under the rivalry of Buddhism, introduced from India A.D. 65, Taoism was developed into a religion with idols, temples, monasteries, and public services. The three great idols found in Taoist temples are called San Ching ("The Three Holy Ones"); viz., "The Perfect Holy One," "The Highest Holy One" (Lao-tsze), and "The Greatest Holy One." But, besides this triad, Taoism owns innumerable gods. Confucius unhappily ignored, rather than opposed, the base superstitions out of which Taoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the "yellow-topped" Taoist "priests," (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Taoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Taoism is its eschatology. It teaches that each one has three souls, one of which remains with the corpse, one with the spirit-tablet, while the third is carried off to purgatory, which consists "of ten courts of justice, situated at the bottom of a great ocean which lies down in the depths of the earth." The soul can pass through endless transmutations; and, if its punishments do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless hell. Some become "immortals" without passing through purgatory. The offerings of the living, and the services of the priests (either Buddhist or Taoist), deliver souls from purgatory. The two most important functions of a Taoist priest are, (1) to deliver unfortunate persons from the domination of evil spirits, and (2) to choose gravesites. He does the first by writing charms, and preparing amulets. The head of the religion has unrivalled skill in this way. "It is said, that about his residence on the Lung-hu mountain there are thousands of jars in rows, all tenanted by demons whom the great magician has shut up in them." The second function is very important; for, if a proper spot be not selected, "the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose." The Taoist priest seeks the site on geomantic principles.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Manchester, Mass., April 21, 1752; d. at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1803. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1771; was pastor of Third Church in Newbury, 1771, until, on Dec. 26, 1792, he became Hollis Professor of Divinity in Harvard University. He held the position at his death. After his death, two volumes of his writings appeared, — Sermons on Important Subjects, Boston, 1807; Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, 1807. See biographical sketch in the first-named volume; also SPRAGUE: Annals, ii. pp. 97-103.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, D.D., LL.D.; b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., April 23, 1805; d. at Vevey, Switzerland, November, 1881. He was graduated at Union College, 1825; studied theology at Princeton; was pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N.Y., and subsequently of a Congregationalist church in Pittsfield, Mass. (1828-32). From 1832 to 1838 he was professor of moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York. After keeping a private school for some years, he was elected chancellor of the University of Michigan in 1852, and held the office until 1863, when he resigned. He spent the rest of his days in Europe. He was an eminent educational and philosophical writer. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, 1859. Among his works may be mentioned, A Review of Edwards's On the Will, New York, 1839; Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Conscience, 1840; Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility, 1841 (the three volumes were issued in a revised form in Glasgow, 1857, 1 vol.); Elements of Logic, 1841, new ed., 1856.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, b. at Beverly, Mass., Oct. 29, 1791; d. at West Needham, Mass., June 18, 1849; began life as an apprentice in Boston, but removed to Philadelphia, 1815, and there became engaged in business and in teaching. From 1822 he was in the employ of the American Sunday-school Union, and in its service lived a while in Cincinnati, but chiefly in Boston. In 1841 he was licensed as a Congregational preacher. He published New England and Other Poems, 1819; Poems, 1822; Lyrics, September, 1822, and, after a long interval, Poems and Lyrics, 1842; Poetry of the Heart, 1845; Sacred and Miscellaneous

Poems, 1846; Poetry of Life, 1847; The Sunday School, etc., 1848; Late and Early Poems, 1849. Some of these are reprints; but Griswold called him "the most industrious and voluminous of our religious poets." Some of his hymns have been extensively used, especially the two beginning "There is an hour," which appeared in his first volume, 1819.

TARASIVS, Patriarch of Constantinople; d. 806; was secretary of state during the reign of Constantine and Irene; and, when the empress discovered that he was an ardent worshipper of images, she raised him, in 781, to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, though he was a layman. By some adroit manoeuvres he procured the recognition even of Adrian I.; and at the synod first assembled in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then re-assembled at Nicaea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

TARGUM (i.e., translation) is the name given to a Chaldee version, or paraphrase, of the Old Testament. The origin of the Chaldee paraphrase may be traced back to the time of Ezra. After the exile it became the practice to read the law in public to the people, with the addition of an oral paraphrase in the Chaldee dialect. Thus we read in Neh. viii. 8, "So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense;" which expression the Talmud (Bab. Megillah, fol. 3, col. 1) explains "to give the sense means Targum." At what time these paraphrases were written down, we cannot state; but it must certainly have been at an early period. [In the Talmud Shabbath, fol. 115, col. 1, a written Targum on Job, of the middle of the first century, is mentioned. "Since it is not likely that a beginning should have been made with Job, a still higher antiquity, as very probably belonging to the first renderings of the law, may be assumed" (Zunz, p. 62). The two oldest paraphrases are the Targum of Onkelos on the law, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the earlier and later prophets.

1. As to the person and time of Onkelos, he was, according to tradition, the disciple and friend of the older Gamaliel; and thus the Targum of Onkelos must have originated at least in the first half of the first century of our era.

The language of Onkelos greatly approaches the biblical Chaldee. His translation is, on the whole, very simple and exact. His elucidations of difficult and obscure passages and expressions, perhaps less satisfactory, are commonly those most accredited by internal evidence, and in particular he is worthy of a more careful regard and assent than have usually fallen to his lot. Larger additions, and deviations from the original text, are found mostly in the poetical parts of the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiv.; Deut. xxxiii. and xxxiv.). In passages relative to the Divine Being we perceive the effect of a doctrinal bias in certain deviations from the Hebrew text. Anthropomorphism and anthropopatheic expressions are avoided, and Elohim and Jehovah are rendered by "the word of God." It is obvious, from the character of the work, that the author was in possession of a rich exegetical tradition.

On the manuscripts of Onkelos, comp. Winer: De Onkelosius ejusque paraphr. chald., Lipsiæ, 1820, pp. 13-34.

Editions.—The Targum of Onkelos was first published, with Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch, Bologna, 1482. It was subsequently reprinted in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [A new and critical edition according to that of Sabionetta (1557) is in course of preparation by Dr. A. Berliner of Berlin, the author of Die Masorah zum Targum Onkelos, Leipzig, 1877. This Targum has been translated into Latin by P. Fagius and by John Mercier, 1568. The translation of Fagius is the best. It was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65.]

II. THE TARGUM ON THE PROPHETS [i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets] is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a pupil of Hillel, according to tradition (Baba Bathra, 131 a; compare Succah, 28 a, Megillah, 3^r). As to his paraphrase, it is simple, and tolerably literal in the historical books; but in the prophetic books the text is more freely handled. Another peculiarity of this Targum is the Jewish dogmatical opinions of that day, with which the work is interwoven, and the theological representations, in introducing which a special preference was given to the Book of Daniel. Examples of this are the interpreting of the phrase "stars of God" by "people of God" (Isa. xiv. 13; comp. Dan. viii. 10; 2 Macc. ix. 10), the application of the passage in Dan. xii. 1 to that in Isa. iv. 2, etc. Here and there the author indulges in many perversions. There is little doubt that the text has received several interpolations.

Editions.—First edition was published at Leira, 1194, then again in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [For the different editions, translations, and older literature, see Furst: *Bibl. III. PSEUDO-JONATHAN AND JERUSHALMI ON THE PENTATEUCH.—Besides the Onkelos Targum, there are still two targumim on the Pentateuch,—one on the whole Pentateuch; the other, on single verses and words. The former is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel; the latter goes under the name of Jerushalmi. That Jonathan is not the same as the paraphrast on the prophets is acknowledged on all sides. That he wrote at a later period, we see from his mentioning of Constantinople, Mohammed's wives (Chadija and Fatima), and other things which betray the later date,—the second half of the seventh century. That Pseudo-Jonathan had Onkelos before him, a very slight comparison of both shows. Substantially in the same dialect is the Jerusalem or Jerushalmi Targum written. The similarity of both is striking, and yet there is so much divergence as to prove diversity of authorship. But how is their resemblance to be explained? Only by the fact that both have relation to Onkelos. The author of the Jerusalem Targum worked upon that of Onkelos; his object being to correct it according to certain principles, and to insert in it a selection of Haggadadic current among the people. Pseudo-Jonathan afterwards resumed the same office, and completed what his predecessor had begun. The Jerusalem Targum formed the basis of Jonathan, and its own basis was that of Onkelos. Jonathan used both his predecessors' paraphrases; the author of Jerusalem Targum, that of Onkelos alone.

Editions.—The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first published in Venice, 1590; then at Hanau, 1618; Amsterdam, 1649; Prague, 1646; [Berlin, 1705; Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859]. It is also in the London polyglot, vol. iv. [together with a Latin translation made by Antony Chevalier. It was translated into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65]. The Jerusalem Targum was first printed by Bomberg, Venice, 1518. [and reprinted in the subsequent rabbinical Bibles issued by him], and in the London polyglot; [also at Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859; Warsaw, 1875. Francis Taylor made a Latin version of this Targum (London, 1649); but the more correct one is that of Antony Chevalier, above noticed. There are also commentaries on these Targums].

IV. TARGUMS ON THE HAGGADICA.—These Targums are generally divided into three groups; viz. (a) Job, Psalms, Proverbs; (b) the five Megilloth; (c) Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra. Tradition ascribes to Rabbi Joseph the Blind the authorship of these Targums; but this is contradicted by writers, even of the thirteenth century.

(a) [The Targum on the Book of Job.—A feature of this Targum is its Haggadical character. In many places we find a double Targum. The language is intermixed with Latin and Greek words. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint or with the Peshito. It was published by John Terentius, Franck., 1665. Latin translations were made by Mercier, Franckfort, 1663, and Scialoi, Rome, 1618. Compare on this Targum, Bacher, in Graetz: Monatsschrift, 1871, pp. 208-223; and

Weiss: De Libri Jobi Paraphrasi Chaldaica, Breslau, 1873.]

(b) The Targum on the Psalms. — Sometimes it follows the original with a tolerable degree of closeness, as in i. iii., v., vi., etc. In more cases, however, it indulges in prolix digressions, absurd fables, and commonplace remarks. Two or three different versions of the same text occasionally follow one another without remark, though the introductory notice 875, i.e., another Targum, sometimes precedes. [Comp. Bacher: Das Targum zu den Psalmen, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1872, pp. 108-116, 163-173. It was printed in Justiniani's polyglot Psalter (Genoa, 1516) and in the hexaglot edition of the Psalter published at Rostock, 1613. It is also printed in the latest rabbinical Bible, Warsaw, 1875. The Antwerp and following polyglots (1572, 1615, 1657) contain the Latin version of Arias Montanus. From the Codex Reuchlin it was published by Lagarde, in his Hagiographa Chaldaica (Leips., 1873), and republished by Nestle, in his Psalterium Tetraglotum, Tübingen, 1877-79.]

(c) The Targum on Proverbs. — This Targum is not Haggadic, and adheres more closely to the original text. Its remarkable agreement with the Syriac version has been noticed, — an agreement which extends even to the choice and position of words; comp. i. 1-6, 8, 10, 12, 13; ii. 9, 10, 13-15; iii. 2-9; iv. 1-3, 26; v. 1, 2, 4, 5; viii. 27; x. 3-5; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 2, 5, 6, 8; xxix. 5, 6; xxxi. 31. Comp. Dathe, De Ratione Consensus Versionis Chaldaicae et Syriacae Proverborum, Solomonis (Lips., 1794), who endeavors to prove that the Chaldaean interpreter was dependent on the Syriac. [An opposite ground to that of Dathe is taken by Maybaum, Ueber die Sprache des Targum zu den Sprüchen u. dessen Verhältniss zum Syriac, in Merx's Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments, ii. 66 sq.; cf. also Pick's art. "Relation of the Syriac Version to the Septuagint and Chaldaean," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclop., vol. x, pp. 121-121.]

(d) The Targum on the Five Megilloth [i.e., on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and the Lamentations] is written in an intermediate dialect between the West Aramaean of Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and the East Aramaean of the Babylonian Talmud. The whole, which may perhaps belong to one author, bears the impress of a date considerably posterior to the Talmudic time, and is a Midrashic paraphrase, exceedingly loose and free in character, containing legends, fables, allusions to Jewish history, and many fanciful additions.

[1. The Targum on Ruth was published separately, with a Latin translation and scholia by J. Mercier, Paris, 1561.

2. The Targum on Ecclesiastes has been translated into English by Ginsburg, in his Commentary on Ecclesiastes, London, 1861.

3. The Targum on Canticles is found in the rabbinical Bibles. It has been translated into Latin, and also into English by Gill, at the end of his Commentary on the Song of Solomon, London, 1751, pp. 535 sq.]

4. The Targum, or rather Targums, on Esther. — One translation of concise form, and adhering closely to the text, occurs in the Antwerp polyglot. It was issued enlarged, with glosses by

Tailor, in Targum Prius et Posteriori in Esther, studio F. Tailori, London, 1655, and forms the Targum Prius, which is contained in the London polyglot. Much more prolix, and amplifying still more the legends of this Targum, is the Targum Posteriori, in Tailor. [Its final redaction probably belongs to the eleventh century. With a commentary, the second Targum is found in the Warsaw rabbinical Bible. A separate edition, with notes, etc., was published by Munk, Targum Scheni zu d. Buche Esther, Berl., 1876. It has been translated into German by P. Cassel, in an appendix to his Das Buch Esther, Berlin, 1878. It has been treated in essay by Reiss, Das Targum Scheni zu dem Buche Esther, in Graetz's Monatsschrift, 1876, pp. 161 sq., 276 sq., 398 sq.]

5. The Targum on the Book of Chronicles was published from an Erfurt codex of the year 1343, by Beck (Augsburg, 1680-83), with learned notes and a Latin translation. Another edition was published by Wilkins (Amsterdam, 1715), from a codex belonging to the Cambridge University, with a Latin version. [This latter was lately republished by Rahmer (Thorn, 1866), with the deviations from Beck's edition. The origin of this Targum cannot be put earlier than the eighth century, or the beginning of the ninth. Comp. Frankel, Monatsschrift, 1867, pp. 319 sq.; Rosenberg, Das Targum z. Chronik, in Geiger's Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1870, pp. 72 sq., 135 sq., 263 sq. There is not any Targum, so far as is known, upon Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. An edition of the Chaldaei Hagiographa was published by Lagarde, Leips., 1873.

TARSHISH. 1. A geographical or ethnographical idea, to comprehend which it is necessary to examine the different passages in which this word occurs.

1. What is meant by Tarshish in the genealogical table, Gen. x. 1, 5, where it is placed among the sons of Javan, — Elisah and Kittim and Tarshish and Dodanim, (a) the Dorians (Zeller, Lionnet); (b) the Tyrrhenians (or Etruscans, Tuscan), so Knobel; (c) Tarsus in Cilicia, so Delitzsch; (d) a famous port or region, so Movers.

2. As for the passages of the Bible, there is no doubt that Tarshish is to be fixed somewhere in or near Spain; so already Eusebius. For Spain we must also look on account of the metals (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12) which were brought from thence. There can therefore be no doubt that Tarshish must have been near the mouth of the Guadalquivir. In fixing more precisely the locality, Movers, with whom Knobel also seems to agree, has come to the conclusion that Tarshish-Lintessus was not the name of a city, but that it was the name of a people and country in the south-west of Spain, beyond the Columns of Hercules. With this view of Movers agree not only the biblical notices, but also the older Greek writers. This also will explain the fact, that nowhere the destruction of Tartessus is mentioned. With this fact, that Tarshish is the name of a Spanish people and country, all etymological efforts to derive the word from the Shemitic are in vain.

In fine, the two passages of the Book of Chronicles in which Tarshish occurs need to be mentioned. While we read in 1 Kings x. 22, that Solomon had at sea a navy of Tarshish with a navy of Hiram, bringing once in three years gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, which (with reference to 1 Kings ix. 26-28) leads to the supposition that a voyage to Ophir is meant, — Tarshish-ships only meaning "large vessels," — we read in 2 Chron. ix. 21 of a trip to Tarshish. The same is the case with 1 Kings xxii. 48 sq. and 2 Chron. xx. 36. The difference in the two statements is only to be explained by assuming that the Tarshish-ships intended for Ophir were changed into ships going to Tarshish. Keil's efforts to save the correct statement of the chronicler-writer are unsatisfactory; and we can only assume, with Bleek (Eindeutung, pp. 397 sq.), that the writer did not correctly understand the expression, hence his endeavor to fix it more precisely, which he did in an incorrect manner, — a view which is also adopted by Bertheau and Ewald; or, with Movers, that in the course of time the knowledge of the real Tarshish was lost among the Hebrews, and that it came to mean all distant countries in the west or in the south, or, as Movers says, a western and eastern Tarshish.

II. A precious stone, which was probably found in Tarshish, whence it took its name (Exod. xxxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. i. 16, x. 9, xxviii. 13; Cant. v. 11; Dan. x. 6). The Septuagint, followed by Josephus, makes it the "chrysolite" or topaz. Comp. BRAUN; De Vestitu Sacerdot., ii. 17.

III. Proper noun (Esth. i. 14: 1 Chron. vii. 10).

E. OSLANDER.

TAR'SUS, the chief town of Cilicia, was in Xenophon's time a city of some considerable consequence (Anab., i. 2, 23). In later times it was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors; and Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria, giving, as regards the zeal for learning shown by the residents, the preference to Tarsus (xiv. 673). To the Christian, Tarsus is of the greatest importance, because it was the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul. His rabbinic training he received at Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 3). At Tarsus he prepared himself for his apostolic work; and here, as well as in the neighborhood, he first preached (Acts ix. 11, 30, xi. 25, xxi. 39, xxii. 25 sq., xxiii. 31). At a very early period Tarsus had a Christian church, and at the time of the Council of Nice it had an episcopal see. In the period of the crusades Tarsus had an archiepiscopal see. The learning which was there cultivated exercised also its influence upon the Christians there. We only mention Diodorus of Tarsus, the founder of the school of Antioch, and Theodore of Tarsus, whom Pope Vitalianus sent to England as archbishop of Canterbury in the year 667. The caliph Harun al Rashid fortified the city, especially against the Byzantines; but under the Turkish régime it lost all its former splendor. Many ruins remind of the former magnificence of Tarsus; but the city is dirty, and has about six thousand inhabitants. In modern times the European residents have contributed largely to the amelioration of its affairs. It is remarkable, that up to this day the main industry is the same as in the time of the apostle (Acts xviii. 3).

TARTAN (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. xx. 1), not a proper name, but an Assyrian title equivalent to our field-marshal, — the commander-in-chief of the army. This officer occupied the highest rank, and is named immediately after the king. A tartan mentioned in the inscriptions as being under Sennacherib was Belemurani, and it was quite likely that he was the one sent to Jerusalem to solicit the people to revolt from Egypt.

TASCORQUITES (from tascois, "a wooden nail," and δρονγκος, "a nose"), a nickname applied to an heretical sect which arose in Galatia in the fourth century, because they placed the finger on the nose while praying: Epiphanius (Hær., 48) and Augustine (De Hær., 63). According to Theodoret, they rejected the doctrines of the sacraments, the incarnation, etc.

TASMANIA is a triangular-shaped island, a hundred and twenty miles south of the Australian Continent. It is situated between 40° and 41° south latitude, and between 144° and 149° east longitude. In extent, it is one hundred and seventy miles from north to south, and one hundred and sixty from east to west, with an area of over fifteen millions of acres. It is nearly the size of Scotland. The climate is proverbially one of the most healthy and delightful in the world. The annual rainfall averages twenty-four inches; being higher than on the Australian Continent, and lower than in Britain and America. The mean midwinter temperature is about 46° F.; and that of midsummer, 63° F. There are no extremes of heat or cold. The winter is scarcely severe enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1612, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, who had fitted out the expedition. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually opened up what had so long been as a sealed book. The settlement of the colony took place in 1803, when the convict establishment at Botany Bay, near Sydney, which had existed for about fourteen years, being overcrowded, a number of the most dangerous felons had to be dispersed, and were brought to Tasmania. Transportation ceased a quarter of a century ago; and in 1856 the event was signalized by changing the name from "Van Diemen's Land" to "Tasmania," in honor of the rightful discoverer. Practically there is now nothing to remind one that the land was once a convict settlement. The aborigines, who presented, probably, almost the lowest type of savage tribes, numbered somewhere from five thousand to ten thousand in the early part of the century. The last of them died in 1866. Tasmania, like other colonies, has a governor of her own, appointed by the British cabinet, who holds office for six years. The Parliament consists of two chambers, — the Legislative Council with sixteen members, and the House of Assembly with thirty-two members, both elective. The system of education is compulsory, secular, and free. "By exhibitions from the schools, a certain number of pupils of both sexes are enabled annually, even in the absence of private resources, to proceed to the best private schools, and thus qualify themselves eventually for examination for the local degree of associate of arts. Two Tasmanian scholarships, of two hundred pounds a year each, tenable for four years at a British university, are awarded annually to associates of arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination." There is no lack of mechanics' institutes, public libraries, and scientific societies. New books, and all leading British and some American periodicals and journals, arrive regularly. The population is now only a hundred and twenty thousand, and composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, without almost any admixture of foreign nationalities. But there are signs of awakening activity and enterprise, giving hope of a successful future. Mineral and other resources are being vigorously developed; and by liberal land-laws such encouragement is given to immigration as affords a reasonable prospect of a steady, though it may not be rapid, increase of population. The chief exports are wool, tin, timber, gold, jam, fruit, hops, grain, bark, stud-sheep, etc. Hobart is the capital, with a population (in 1878) of 22,500. Launceston, the only other considerable town, has 13,000.

As in the rest of Australasia, the usual religious bodies flourish in Tasmania; although it may be noted that the Presbyterian Church has not been quite so prosperous as in the other colonies. There is an Anglican and a Roman-Catholic bishop. The church-buildings throughout the country are suitable, and some of them handsome, especially St. David's Cathedral and St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hobart, and St. Andrew's, Launceston. There is no state church. For about fifty years, however, after the settlement of the colony, the ministers of the churches of England, Scotland, and Rome, were in the position of colonial chaplains, paid by government, like other civil servants. But the State-aid Abolition Act put an end to this a quarter of a century ago; the churches receiving as compensation a certain sum in government debentures. Most of the Presbyterian ministers, and some of the Episcopalian, come from the Old Country or the neighboring colonies; but progress is being made in all the churches towards training a native ministry. According to a recent census, the nominal returns are as under: —

Episcopalians	53,047
Roman Catholics	22,091
Presbyterians	19,064
Wesleyans	7,187
Independents	3,931
Baptists	931
Jews	232
Society of Friends	82
Other sects	2,759

At the time of the above census the ministers of all denominations numbered a hundred and twenty-nine. As is the case in Australasia generally, they are for the most part efficient pastors, and highly respected.

TATE, Nahum, b. in Dublin, 1652; d. Aug. 12, 1715, in the precincts of the Mint at Southwark, being in hiding from his creditors; was a son of Faithful Teate, D.D., a voluminous but long-forgotten versifier; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; went to London; became poet-laureate, 1690; published various poems of no great fame or value. He is remembered by A New Version of the Psalms of David, made in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, D.D., who was born at Brandon, Ireland, 1659, and died 1726; held preferments in London, and at Richmond, Surrey; published some sermons, and a Translation of the Æneid. It is impossible to assign the precise authorship in the case of any of their renderings; but Tate is supposed to have been the better poet, and to have shown it chiefly here. Twenty psalms appeared 1695, and the entire psalter 1696. This first edition is rare; "as, from some objectionable passages, the whole edition was recalled and destroyed." It was soon after (probably by 1698) revised, and in parts rewritten. Having been by the king "allowed and permitted to be used in all such churches, chapels, and congregations as shall think fit to receive the same" (Dec. 3, 1696), it was recommended by the Bishop of London, May 23, 1698. It made its way slowly but surely in popular acceptance, not entirely driving out Sternhold and Hopkins till the present century was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and use of hymns in the Church of England. In one section, at least, of this country, it was largely used in preference to the New-England version, or Bay Psalm-book; many editions appearing in Boston between 1750 and 1800. This extended and long-continued use may be pleaded against the unfavorable opinions of critics. James Montgomery speaks of its "neutral propriety," and found it "truly as inanimate, though a little more refined," than the old version; and Bishop Wilberforce gave "Tate and Brady" as the definition of "a dry-salter." From the stand-point of modern taste, no one has ever succeeded in versifying the entire Psalter. Any close rendering designed to be sung must of necessity make dull reading. Of all such attempts, that of Tate and Brady is probably the least discreditable, and the most useful. It contains some fairly poetical portions, many that are still well adapted to public worship where metrical psalms are preferred, and a few that are able to hold their own simply as hymns. The Supplement to the New Version (1703) is supposed to be the work of Tate alone. It contains versions of the Ti Deum, Lord's Prayer, Creed, Commandments, and other passages of Scripture or Prayer-Book. Some of these are well done, and have been largely used in the English Church; and one, "While shepherds watched," is in nearly universal use. F. M. BIRD.

TATIAN, one of the most prominent Christian writers of the second century; was a native of Assyria, but thoroughly conversant with Græco-Roman civilization. His education was that of a common sophist, combining a rich and varied store of learned lore with a more or less superficial philosophical training; and his life, which, however, is very imperfectly known, seems to have been that of a common travelling teacher of rhetoric. Finally he came to Rome, heard Justin, received a very deep and decisive impression of Christianity, and wrote his Λόγος πρὸς Ἑλλήνας. In accordance with its apologetic purpose, the book is a reductio ad absurdum of Paganism, rather than a positive representation of Christianity; but its views, though somewhat crude, and deficient in historical breadth, are strong and original. The darkness of Paganism is placed in the most glaring contrast to the light of Christianity. Not only is Greek mythology treated as a maze of indecent follies, in which even the most strained allegorical interpretation has proved unable to infuse any vital interest, but Greek art is rejected as a mere deification of the flesh, and Greek philosophy is described as a bundle of contradictions, alluring its pupils into hideous vanity and avarice. The book made a great sensation, and Tatian remained several years in Rome as a Christian teacher. He left the city, probably shortly after the death of Justin, in 166, and repaired to the Orient. In Syria he entered into intimate connection with the Gnostics, adopted many of their heretical doctrines, and became one of the leaders, if not the founder, of the sect of the Encratites. See IRENEUS, I. 28 (comp. EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., IV. 29); HIPOLYTUS: Refut. hæc., viii. 16; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA: Strom., iii. 460; ORIGEN: De orat., 13; TERTULLIAN: De jejuniis, 15; EPIPHANIUS, 46; THEODORET, I. 20. On basis of these reports of his gnosticism, modern scholars have claimed to find gnostic views also in his Apology, though without sufficient reason. His Oratio ad Græcos was first edited by Frobenius, Zurich, 1546, and afterwards often. The principal editions are those by Worth, Oxford, 1700, and Otto, in Corp. Apolog., Jena, 1851, vol. vi. Of his numerous other writings, only the titles and a few fragments have come down to us, with the exception of the Diatessaron. See DANIEL: Tatianus der Apologet, Halle, 1837, which contains a complete account of the older literature; DUCKER: Apolog., Göttingen, 1850, pt. ii.; [DEMBOWSKI: Die Apologie Tatians, Leipzig, 1878; THEODOR ZAHN: Erscheinungen 1st Theil, Tatians Diatessaron, Erlangen, 1881 (this volume contains a reconstruction of the Diatessaron from the Latin translation of Ephrem's Commentary upon it, edited by G. TATTAM, Henry, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Orientalist; b. in Ireland, Dec. 28, 1788; d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, Jan. 8, 1868. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the universities of Göttingen and Leyden, from which he received doctorates in laws, theology, and philosophy respectively. From 1844 to 1866 he was archdeacon of Bedford, and from 1849 till his death, rector of Stamford Rivers, and also chaplain-in-ordinary to the Queen. His fame rests upon his work in Coptic, in which he was a chief authority. He discovered in the Nitrian convent, and secured for the British Museum, a splendid collection of ancient Syriac manuscripts. He published, besides a Coptic grammar (1828) and dictionary (in Latin, 1835), Coptic versions of the Minor (1836) and Major Prophets (1852, 2 vols.), and the Apostolical Constitution (1849), and other learned works.

TAULER, Johannes, b. at Strassburg about 1290; d. there June 16, 1361; one of the most prominent representatives of mediæval German mysticism, and one of the greatest preachers of his time. Of his life very little is known. He entered the Dominican order, and studied theology in Paris, but drew more mental nourishment from the writings of the Areopagite, St. Bernard, and the mysticism of St. Victor, than from the dialectical exercises of the professors. After finishing his studies, he returned to his native city, where he became acquainted with Meister Eckart, and spent the rest of his life; making short voyages to Basel (where he entered into connection with the Friends of God), to Cologne, and other cities. That he continued officiating during an interdiction laid upon Strassburg by the Pope for political reasons, is a legend first put into circulation in the sixteenth century by Speckle. It may contain some kernel of historical fact, not now to be discerned with certainty; but all its main features are due to the eagerness of the Reformers to enroll the great and famous preachers among their predecessors. Still more fictitious is the tale of his conversion by Nicholas of Basel. His works consist of sermons, a few minor treatises, and some letters. The first collected edition of his sermons was printed at Leipzig in 1498, and often reprinted, English translation by Miss Winkworth, London, 1857, and New York, 1858 (edited by Dr. Hitchcock). The Nachfolgung des armen Leben Christi, Exercitia super vita et passione Christi, and Institutiones divine (also called Medulla animæ), are not by Tauler. The doctrinal views of Tauler often remind the reader very strongly of those of Meister Eckart, though, generally speaking, they evince another character: the speculative element is weaker; the devotional, stronger. Tauler was of a practical turn of mind, a preacher, not a philosopher. The speculative bearing of his ideas is consequently only slightly developed, while their application to real life is emphasized with great energy. It was this practical, and for that very reason, truly evangelical tendency of his preaching, which gave him a much greater influence on his time than any of the other celebrated mystical teachers. They were either too metaphysical, as was Meister Eckart, or too fantastic, as was Suso, to reach the great majority of the laity; while the words of Tauler came home to the heart of both high and low, spreading light everywhere, and justly procuring for him the title of doctor illuminatus. See SCHMIDT: Johannes Tauler, Hamburg, 1841; DENIFLE: Das Buch von der geistlichen Armut, etc., Strassburg, 1877, and Tauler's Bekehrung, Strassburg, 1879; JUNDT: Les Amis de Dieu, 1879; R. HOFFMANN: Johannes Tauler, Berlin, 1883 (31 pp.); also Miss WINKWORTH'S Life in the translation mentioned above.

TAUSEN, Hans, b. at Birkinde in the Danish Island of Funen, 1191; d. at Ribe, Jutland, Nov. 11, 1561. As a monk of Antvorskov in Sealand, he was by his abbot sent to foreign countries to study. He went to Wittenberg; and on his return, in 1521, he began to preach the Reformation. The abbot shut him up in the convent dungeon; but he was released by order of the king, who made him his chaplain, and afterwards pastor of the Church of St. Nicholas in Copenhagen, 1529. Tausen was the first who preached the Reformation in Denmark; and, together with Bugenhagen, he was the principal agent in its establishment in the country, after its adoption by the Diet of Copenhagen in 1536. In 1542 he was made Bishop of Ribe. He translated the Psalms into Danish, wrote several hymns, and published a number of sermons and treatises bearing on the Reformation.

TAVERNER, Richard, a translator of the English Bible; was b. at Brisley, Norfolk, 1505; studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Cardinal College, Oxford, where he graduated; studied law, became, at Cromwell's recommendation, clerk of the signet, 1537; was licensed to preach by Edward VI., 1552; appointed high sheriff of Oxfordshire, 1569; and d. July 14, 1575. For reading Tyndale's New Testament at Oxford, he was imprisoned in the college cellar. Taverner was a learned man, and published some translations (The Confession of Faith of the Germans . . . with the Apology of Melancthon, Lond., 1536). He will always be remembered for his edition of the English Bible (Lond., 1539), commonly called Taverner's Bible. It appeared both in folio and quarto, the latter edition in parts, so that all might be able to secure a portion of the Scriptures. It was a revision of Matthew's Bible. See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 734, and MOMBERT: Handbook of the English Versions of the Bible, New York, 1883, pp. 191-201.

TAXATION, Ecclesiastical. In the earliest times the Christian Church was able to defray its expenses for liturgical purposes, for the care of the poor, etc., from the voluntary offerings of its members, consisting of wine, bread, oil, incense, and fruit. The Jewish custom of presenting first-fruits was very early adopted; and in the time of Tertullian (d. 215) contributions of money—monthly, annual, or occasional—are mentioned (Conc. Anthaq., iii. c. 21; Tertullian: Apolog., 39). In the time of Jerome (d. 420) and Augustine (d. 430), tithes began to be introduced; and from the close of the seventh century they were quite generally established. The clergy, however, by degrees, as a distinction between clergy and laity developed, were entirely exempted from taxation; though, on the other hand, they were not at liberty to dispose, by will or otherwise, of the property accumulated from their ecclesiastical income. From the end of the fourth century such property was considered as belonging to the church.

The first traces of a real taxation of the clergy occur towards the close of the sixth century, and that at once under three different forms. First, an annual tax was paid by every diocesan church to the cathedral. It was called honor cathedralis, or cathedraticum, or, as it was paid during the episcopal visitations, synodalis census, synodus, or synodaticum. It is first met with in Spain, where it was paid in money; Conc. Bracar., c. 1 (572). In the Frankish Empire, where it was paid in kind, it is mentioned in a capitularium of Charles the Bald (841); in Italy it became common under Innocent III. (d. 1216) and Honorius III. (d. 1227). Next, a fee was paid, by any one appointed to a benefice, to the patriarch, or archbishop, or bishop who ordained him. In the East it is mentioned as a custom in Nor. Just., a. 123, c. 3 (516); and it was no small burden, since it was stipulated that it should not exceed one year's income. In the West a council of Rome (595) declared that voluntary gifts to the ordaining bishop and his chancery were not simony; but a council of Paris (829), as well as the letters of Ivo of Chartres (Ep. 133), complains of the magnitude of those gifts. The money, which, since the ninth century, the metropolitans paid in Rome for their pallium, was a tax of the same kind; and it became a very heavy one. Finally, it was the duty of the clergy to entertain the bishop on his tour of visitation. This duty, which occurs under various names,—procuratio, mansio parata, circada, circatura, consortio, albergaria, etc.—is first met with in Spain: Concil. Tolet., iii. c. 20 (589), and vii. c. 4 (616). It afterwards became customary for the clergy to rid themselves from this duty by the payment of an annual sum of money; but that custom was forbidden by Innocent IV. (d. 1251), and Concil. Lugdun., ii. c. 1 (1274).

As the constitution of the church more and more assumed the form of a feudal monarchy, the ecclesiastical system of taxation developed in the same direction. Secular rulers, such as the kings of Poland, Hungary, England, Norway, Sweden, Naples, Arragonia, and Portugal, paid an annual tribute (census) to the Pope, thereby recognizing that they held their titles and realms as fiefs of the holy see. The Peter's-pence (denarius St. Petri), which from several of those countries was paid annually to the Pope by every household, had also a feudal character, and so had the protection-money of many monasteries, the exemption-money of many episcopal sees, etc. Most taxes of this character, however, have afterwards been discontinued, though two still remain,—the subsidium charitativum and the jus deportum. In a moment of great distress the bishop may levy a tax on the whole clergy of his diocese. This extraordinary subsidium charitativum is first mentioned in Concil. Lateran., iii. c. 6 (1197). Allied to it is the Pope's right to appropriate, under circumstances of distress and for ecclesiastical purposes, one-tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues, which right he often made free use of, as, for instance, during the crusades. The jus deportum, or annalia, or annate, originated under Honorius

III. cl. 1227, and became firmly established under Boniface VIII. (d. 1305). It means a right which the bishop has of appropriating the first year's revenue at a new appointment to a benefice in his diocese. It occurs partly as a right established once for all times, partly as a privilege granted by the Pope for a certain number of years; for originally the Pope claimed the right for himself alone, and he still retains it as far as the higher ecclesiastical benefices are concerned.

When the decay of the Church began, after the fourteenth century, great modifications of the ruling system of taxation became necessary. Old taxes were abolished, and new ones were invented. Among the latter were the absence-money and the so-called servitia. Absence-money consisted in a fee paid to the Pope for their non-residence by such ecclesiastics as held several benefices. See JÄGER: Über Absent- und Tugend-solden, Ingolstadt, 1825. The Servitia Cumra Papoi, or servitia communia, originated from the Pope assuming the exclusive right of ordaining bishops, on account of which all ordination-fees flowed into his treasury. With the establishment of the Reformation, all special ecclesiastical taxation was swept away in the Protestant countries. In England the papal annats were originally transferred to the crown, but by Anne they were formed into a fund ("Queen Anne's Bounty") for the improvement of the smaller livings. No monograph on ecclesiastical taxation exists; but much material is found in THOMASIN: Lexus et norma ecclesiastica disciplina circa beneficia, Paris, 1688, 3 vols., especially in the third volume; and in the common handbooks of ecclesiastical law.

MEJER.

TAYLOR, Dan, founder of New Connection of General Baptists (see p. 2203); b. at Northwram, Halifax, York, Eng., Dec. 21, 1738; d. in London, Dec. 2, 1816. Like Luther, a miner's son, and at five years of age worked in the mine with his father. He was strong, fearless, and eager for learning, and gave promise of the prodigious industry of his manhood by carrying his books into the coal-mine, and converting it into a study. As with all superior minds, religion was his first thought. His sense of sin was acute; and his passionate yearning for pardon and light urged him to travel ten and even twenty miles to hear Wesley, Whitefield, and Grimshaw. But he did not rest till he understood and accepted the message of universal love in John iii. 16; that gave the trend to his character and career.

He joined the Wesleys, and became a "local preacher," but his essentially independent and growing spirit forced him out of the Methodist ranks, and he accepted the pastorate of a few like-minded folk at Nook, Birchcliffe. Further study of the Bible led him to the Baptist idea, and so he came into contact with the General Baptists. Detecting their Unitarian drift, he confronted it, and sought to arrest it. Failing, he, together with the Barton Independent Baptists, formed, in June, 1770, the New Connection of General Baptists. Now he found his true sphere, discharging his duties as a pastor with conspicuous nobility, first at Birchcliffe (1763-83), next at Halifax (1783-85), and finally at Church Street, Whitechapel, London (1785-1816). He meanwhile wrote copiously and ably on the theological questions of the day, and also shaped the course of the General Baptist denomination. He was its leading spirit for nearly half a century, founded its college in 1797, started and edited its magazine, 1798, presided at its annual gatherings, and impressed his sturdy, enterprising, progressive, and liberal individuality on its institutions and churches. His chief literary works are, Fundamentals of Religion in Faith and Practice, Dissertations on Singing in Public Worship, Letters on Andrew Fuller's Scheme.

TAYLOR, Isaac, English theological writer; b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, Aug. 17, 1787; d. at Stanford Rivers, Essex, June 28, 1865. His father was a fine engraver, and later a dissenting minister, and author of popular children's books; but he entered the Established Church. After following for a while the profession of engraver and artist, he turned his attention to literature and inventions. He invented two very ingenious engraving-machines; one for illustrations, and another for patterns upon rollers for calico-printing. As an author he was very prolific and original. Among his religious and theological writings may be mentioned History of Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times, 1827; Natural History of Enthusiasm, 1829 (very popular); Natural History of Fanaticism, 1833; Spiritual Despotism, 1835; Physical Theory of Another Life, 1836 (after this work he dropped his incognito); Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times, 1839-40, 8 parts, 4th ed., with supplement and indexes, 1844, 2 vols. (a reply to those who desired to restore "primitive" doctrine, and magnify the "Primitive" Church, by showing the seamy side of the early church; but it goes too far, and thus really conveys a false impression); Man Responsible for his Dispositions, Opinions, and Conduct, 1840; Loyalty and Jesuitism, 1849; Wesley and Methodism, 1851; The Restoration of Belief, 1855; Logic in Theology, 1859; Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1861; Considerations on the Pentateuch, 1863 (a reply to Bishop Colenso). Almost all his books have been reprinted in New York, and to the reprint of the Spirit of Hebrew Poetry Dr. W. Adams contributed an introduction.

TAYLOR, Jane, was b. in London, Sept. 23, 1783; and d. at Ongar, Essex, April 12, 1824. She learned her father's profession as an engraver, which was soon deserted for literature. Her life was spent mainly at Lavenham, Colchester, Ongar, and Marazion in Cornwall. Her memoir of her brother Isaac appeared 1825. She was among the best and most successful of writers for youth. Of her many publications (Display, Essays in Rhyme, Contributions of Q. Q., etc.), not the least important were the Original Poems, 1805, and Hymns for Infant Minds, 1809 or 1810 (new ed., London, 1884), written conjointly with her sister Ann (1782-1866), afterwards Mrs. Gilbert. In these it is seldom possible to fix the authorship.

F. M. BIRD.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, — the Chrysostom of English theology, but in brilliancy of imagination surpassing his Greek autotype, — was born at Cambridge, Aug. 15, 1613. There he entered Caius

College, and, after seven years' study, took his degree of M.A. Archbishop Laud noticed and patronized the youth, and gave him a fellowship in All Souls', Oxford, 1636. Probably through the same influence, he obtained a royal chaplaincy about the same period; and soon afterwards he became rector of Uppingham, in the county of Rutland. Of that living he was deprived by Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism and attachment to the Church-of-England Prayer-Book. He is described as following Charles the First's army; but after its total defeat he sought refuge in Wales, where he kept school in the town of Newton Caernarthenshire. The Earl of Carbery, then living at Golden Grove in that county, appointed him domestic chaplain; and in this capacity he remained during the greater part of the Commonwealth. It was the most fruitful, probably the most pleasant, part of his life. In retirement amidst beautiful scenery, enjoying noble patronage, surrounded by the comforts of life, and sharing in refined society, he produced a series of works which are the wonder of posterity. In 1647 he published his Liberty of Prophesying; in which, suffering from intolerance, he pleaded against it, and advocated a theory of comprehension which he had not the power to put in practice. It was, in fact, an eloquent plea in behalf of deprived Episcopal clergymen, based on principles broader than were sufficient to support their case alone, but which, when the tables were turned, he was not prepared to apply to Presbyterians. The beautiful Life of Christ followed in 1650; and this was succeeded the same year by his Holy Living, completed in 1651 by his Holy Dying. Some of his Sermons came next, and in 1652 appeared his Discourse on Baptism. More Sermons were issued in 1653, and in 1654 came forth from the press his book on The Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament. The Golden Grove, a guide of infant devotion, succeeded in 1655; and in 1656 a Collection of Polemical and Moral Discourses was given to the world. These are most remarkable works, all of them full of original illustration, multifarious learning, ingenious argument, poetical imagination, and exuberant, florid diction. The rhythm of his sentences flows like music, and captivates the taste, when his reasoning does not satisfy the judgment. His opinions were all struck in the Anglo-Catholic mould; though he practically claimed for himself "a liberty of prophesying," which led him sometimes to break bounds, to wander out of the orthodox enclosure, and to enter fields of Pelagian thought. His Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, printed in 1655, especially laid him open to this charge, and involved him in very serious controversy. He was one of those thinkers who cannot endure the trammels of a system, and though faithful, on the whole, to a certain creed, feel compelled by a restlessness of speculation to deviate from it in many particulars. He was decidedly anti-Calvinistic and anti-Puritan, advocating sacramental doctrines with immense ardor, speaking extravagantly of baptismal regeneration, piling up figure on figure to illustrate its efficacy, and, though less figurative in his exposition of the Lord's Supper, insisting that the symbols of bread and wine become changed into the body and blood of Christ after a sacramental, that is, a real and spiritual manner. Generally it may be said of Jeremy Taylor that he was one of the last men from whom qualified and cautious statements could be expected. He certainly was like a cloud, "which moveth altogether, if it move at all." Upon the doctrine of justification he is very misty, deprecating inquiries respecting it as leading into useless intricacies; in short, cutting away the ground from any definite theological representation of it whatever. In argument he is often defective; in declamation, always unrivalled.

In 1658 Taylor removed to Ireland, and carried on clerical ministrations at Lisburn and Portmore. He returned to London in 1660, and promoted the restoration of Charles II. by signing the Loyal Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry in the April of that year. In 1660 also, he published his elaborate Ductor Dubitandum, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, pronounced by Hallam to be "the most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language." Taylor's acuteness, and command of quotations, his insight into human nature, and his wonderful agility of thought, qualified him to make a mark in this department of moral and religious literature; but the usefulness of the whole is more apparent than real, and supplies little that is of much practical value. Casuistry is more fitted to suggest excuses for what is wrong than to convey clear unmistakable rules for doing and thinking what is right. The Worthy Communicant, by Taylor, bears date 1660; and that year the author was raised to the bishopric of Down and Connor.

His Episcopal career was not successful. He found his cathedral chair full of thorns. The Episcopalians of the Commonwealth troubled the Presbyterians, and now the Presbyterians of the Restoration troubled the Episcopalians. Jeremy Taylor complained of them as "incendiaries." He said they robbed him of his people's hearts, and "threatened to murder him." The first charge probably was true: in the second we may detect the exercise of his vivid imagination. His hope was in the government of force, and he no longer advocated liberty of prophesying. It is said, that, within three months after his consecration, he deposed thirty-six Presbyterian ministers. Of the period of his life between 1660 and 1667, when he died, interesting and curious particulars may be found in Notes and Queries, Nov. 11, 1865.

Bishop Rust, who succeeded him, caught his rhetorical mantle and exclaimed, in his funeral-sermon for the illustrious divine, "This great prelate had the good-humor of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, the wisdom of a chancellor, the sagacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for a cloister, learning enough for a university, and wit enough for a college of urbos; and, had his parts and endowments been parcelled out among his poor clergy that he left behind him, it would, perhaps, have made one of the best dioceses in the world." JOHN STODGTON.

TAYLOR, John, an English Unitarian, wrote a number of hymns, which appeared mostly in Aspland's Selection, 1810. Some of them possess decided merit, and have been widely used in our churches.

TAYLOR, Nathaniel William, D.D., an eminent Congregationalist preacher, theological teacher, and author; b. at New Milford, Conn., June 23, 1786; d. at New Haven, March 10, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1807; studied theology with President Dwight, and became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1811, which office he resigned in 1822, to take the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the theological department of Yale College, where he continued to teach until his death. As a preacher he was singularly impressive, combining solidity and clearness of thought with a remarkable eloquence. Unusual results followed upon his sermons, especially in connection with "revivals." From early youth deeply interested in the problems of theology, and endowed with metaphysical talents of a very high order, he worked out, on the basis of the previous New-England theology, an elaborate system, which gained numerous adherents, and powerfully affected theological thought and preaching in America beyond the circle of its professed advocates. It was popularly termed "The New-Haven Theology." Sometimes it was called "Taylorism." It was one of the most influential of the types of so-called "New-School Divinity." There were able coadjutors of Dr. Taylor, notably his colleagues, — Rev. Eleazar T. Fitch, D.D. (b. 1791; d. 1871), college preacher at Yale from 1817 to 1852, and professor of homiletics, a man of rare and versatile powers; and Rev. Channcey A. Goodrich, D.D. (b. 1790; d. 1860), also an influential professor in the college and in the divinity school at Yale, and the principal editor of The Christian Spectator, the review in which many of the controversial essays of "the New-Haven Divines," were published. But the peculiarities of "New-Haven Divinity" as it existed in the generation among whom Dr. Taylor was a prominent leader, are mainly and justly associated with his name.

When Dr. Taylor began his investigations, New-England theology asserted, as it had done from the time of Edwards, a doctrine of natural ability as the condition of responsible agency. It rejected the imputation of Adam's sin in every form; but, outside of the Hoppkinsian school, it associated with this denial a vague theory of an hereditary, sinful taint, or a sinful propensity to sin, propagated with the race, — what Dr. Taylor termed "physical depravity;" and it vindicated the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, by affirming that sin is the necessary means of the greatest good, and that the system of things is better with sin than without it.

The aim of Dr. Taylor was to relieve New-England theology of remaining difficulties on the side of human responsibility, and thus accomplish the end which it had always kept in view. The fundamental question was that of liberty and necessity. There must be, on the one hand, a firm foundation for the doctrine of decrees and universal providential government, and for the exercise of resignation, submission, and confidence on the part of men in view of all events; otherwise, the Calvinistic system is given up. There must be, on the other hand, a full power in men to avoid sin, and perform their duty: otherwise, the foundation of accountability is gone, and the commands and entreaties of the Bible are a mockery. The true solution of the problem, in Dr. Taylor's view, is in the union of the doctrine of the previous certainty of every act of the will — a certainty given by its antecedents collectively taken — with the power of a contrary choice. Freedom is exemption from something; it is exemption from the constraining operation of that law of cause and effect which brings events to pass in the material world. If the antecedents of choice produce the consequent according to that law, without qualification, there is no liberty. Yet Dr. Taylor did not hold to the liberty of indifference or of contingency which had been charged upon the Arminians, and had been denied by his New-England predecessors. He held to a connection between choice and its antecedents, of such a character as to give in every case a previous certainty that the former will be what it actually is. The ground or reason of this certainty lies in the constitution of the agent, and the motives under which he acts; that is to say, in the antecedents taken together. The infallible connection of these with the consequent, the Divine Mind perceives, though we may not dogmatize on the exact mode of his perception. The precise nature of the connection between the antecedents and consequent, Dr. Taylor did not profess to explain; but he held that the same antecedents will uniformly be followed by the same consequent. There are causes which do not necessitate their effect, but simply and solely give the certainty of it. Now, all admit that every event is previously certain. It is a true proposition, that what is to occur to-morrow will thus occur. No matter, then, what may be the ground of this certainty, as long as the events in question are not necessitated, there is no interference with moral liberty.

The leading principles of Dr. Taylor's system may now be stated: —

1. All sin is the voluntary action of the sinner, in disobedience to a known law.

2. Sin, however, is a permanent principle, or state of the will, a governing purpose, underlying all subordinate volitions and acts. Stated in theological language, it is the elective preference of the world to God, as the soul's chief good. It may be resolved into selfishness.

3. Though sin belongs to the individual, and consists in sinning, yet the fact that every man sins from the beginning of responsible agency is in consequence of the sin of Adam. It is certain that every man will sin from the moment when he is capable of moral action, and will continue to be sinful until he is regenerated; and this certainty, which is absolute, — though it is no necessity, and co-exists with power to the opposite action, — is somehow due to Adam's sin. In this sense, Adam was placed on trial for the whole human race (Revealed Theology, p. 259).

There is in men, according to Dr. Taylor, a bias or tendency — sometimes called a propensity or disposition — to sin; but this is not itself sinful; it is the cause or occasion of sin. Nor is it to be conceived of as a separate desire of the soul, having respect to sin as an object. Such a propensity as this does not exist in human nature.

It is proper to say that men are sinners by nature, since, in all the appropriate circumstances of their being, they sin from the first. The certainty of their sin as soon as they are capable of sinning is the consequence of two factors, — the constitution and condition of the soul (subjective), and the situation (objective). These together constitute nature in the statement, "We are sinners by nature."

1. Man is the proximate efficient cause of all his voluntary states and actions. No man is necessitated to choose as he does. There is ever a power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

5. Inseparable from the foregoing assertion of a power to the contrary choice, however, is the doctrine of a moral inability on the part of the sinner to repent, and convert himself. He can, but it is certain he will not. "Certainty with power to the contrary" is a condensed statement of the truth on both sides. Thus the sinner is both responsible and dependent — perfectly responsible, yet absolutely dependent.

6. Natural ability being a real power and not an incapable faculty, there must be something in a sinner's mind to which right motives can appeal, some point of attachment for the influences of the law and the gospel. Hence the importance of the distinction between the sensibility and will, or of the threefold classification of mental powers, which Dr. Taylor was among the first to introduce.

What is the particular feeling which may thus be addressed? According to Dr. Taylor, it is the love of happiness, or self-love.

Dr. Taylor believed, with a great company of philosophers (from Aristotle to the present time), that the involuntary love or desire of personal happiness is the subjective, psychological spring of all choices.

Benevolence is the choice of the highest good of the universe in preference to every thing that can come into competition with it. But one's own highest happiness can never thus come into competition with it. Virtuous self-love and virtuous benevolence denote one and the same complex state.

7. The author of regeneration is the Holy Spirit. The change that takes place in the soul is due to his influence so exerted as to effect that change in the sense of rendering it infallibly certain. It is a change of character. It is the production of love to God as the supreme object of choice, in the room of love to the world. Now, a sinner is naturally able to make this revolution in the ruling principle of his life. But there is a moral inability which constitutes practically an insuperable obstacle; and this is overcome only by the agency of the Spirit, who moves upon the powers of the soul, and induces, without coercing, them to comply with the requirements of the gospel.

8. Dr. Taylor's doctrine on the relation of the introduction of sin, and its continuance to the divine administration, accords with the general spirit of his theology. Theologians from Calvin to Bellamy had discussed the question, as if there were only this alternative, — the existence of sin, or the prevention of it by the power of God.

Dr. Taylor held that we are not shut up to the alternative just stated. There is a third way in which sin might have been prevented, and that is by the free act of the beings who commit it. It is not true, then, that sin is in any case better than holiness in its stead would be, or that sin, all things considered, is a good thing. But it may be true that the non-prevention of sin by the act of God is in certain cases better than its forcible prevention by his act.

Dr. Taylor took up the question in answering sceptical objections to the benevolence of the Creator. The ground that he took in reply was this, that it may be impossible for sin to be excluded by the act of God from the best possible system. The system would be better without sin, if this result were secured by the free action of the creatures comprising it, with no other alteration of its characteristics. It might not be so good if the same result were reached by divine intervention. We are too little acquainted with the relations of divine power to free agency to declare confidently to what extent the exertion of such power is beneficial when the universal system is taken into view. It is wiser and more modest to judge of what is best by what we actually see done.

9. Dr. Taylor's conception of election is conformed to his doctrine respecting the divine permission of sin. Regeneration is the act of God. He has determined to exert such a degree of influence upon a certain part of the race who are sinful by their own act, and justly condemned, as will result with infallible certainty in their conversion. He is not bound to give such influence in equal measure to all; rather does he establish a system of influence which his omniscient mind foresees to be most productive of holiness in his kingdom as a whole. It is not the act or merit of individuals that earns or procures this effectual influence, but that large expediency which has respect to the entire kingdom, and the holiness to be produced within it.

He organizes a plan, not in an arbitrary way, but in order to secure the best results that are attainable consistently with the wise and benevolent laws that underlie his whole administration.

TAYLOR, William, D.D., a prominent and venerable minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; b. in the parish of Denme, Scotland, March 18, 1803; d. in Montreal, Can., Sept. 4, 1876. His father was a farmer. After the usual preparation in school and college, he attended the Theological Hall of the Secession Church for five sessions, and was licensed to preach in 1827. In 1831 he was ordained the pastor of a congregation in Peebles. In 1833, along with two other ministers, Messrs. Thornton and Murray, he was sent to Canada, where a mission had been commenced the preceding year. He arrived in Montreal immediately after the city had suffered severely from the scourge of cholera. He was immediately called as the pastor of a congregation just formed, and was installed July, 1833. He retained the same pastoral charge till the close of his life,—forty-three years. Dr. Taylor was a thorough scholar, an able theologian, an earnest preacher, and a wise counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. He was an acknowledged leader in the church courts, and held a high place in the esteem of his brethren in the ministry. He labored for years most indefatigably to secure the union of all the branches of the Presbyterian Church, and had the happiness to see its accomplishment in 1875. He was truly an apostle in the cause of temperance, and an able advocate of every cause of social and moral reform. He was specially interested in the evangelization of the French Canadians. His manners were courtly, yet affable, his devotion to his work zealous and unflinching, his ministry successful and greatly blessed, his influence great and widely extended, his life pure and eminently useful, his death calm and peaceful; and his memory is cherished, not only by the congregation whom he served so long and so faithfully, and by the city where his labors abounded, but by the whole denomination, which long regarded him as one of her pillars. He published many articles and several able discourses on the topics of the day. WILLIAM ORMISTON.

TELEOLOGY (from telos, "an end," and logos, "discourse"), a technical term denoting a line of speculative researches concerning the final ends involved in and revealed by the phenomena of nature. The teleological or physico-theological argument on the existence of God is based on this line of evidence.

TELESPHORUS (Bishop of Rome, 128-139) was a native of Greece. Nothing is known of his reign. The reports of his regulations concerning the Easter fast, and his introduction of the Gloria and the three masses at Christmas, depend upon an interpolated passage in the Chronicle of Eusebius, and a spurious sermon of Ambrose.

Teller, Wilhelm Abraham, b. at Leipzig, Jan. 9, 1731; d. at Koln-ander-Spree, Dec. 9, 1801; one of the shining lights of the rationalism of the eighteenth century. He was educated, and pursued his theological studies, in his native city, and began to lecture at the university there in 1755. In 1761 he was appointed professor of theology at Helmstadt, and in 1764 he published his Lehrbuch des christlichen Glaubens. The book created quite a sensation, though it represents rationalism only in its first stage. Irrespective of the time-honored scheme which ruled with almost absolute authority, he arranged all the materials of doctrinal theology under the two heads, the realm of sin and the realm of grace; and all such doctrines as would not fit in that arrangement he omitted. The doctrine of God he referred to natural religion; the doctrine of the Trinity he did not mention; the expression "hereditary sin" he declared a contradictio in adjecto. It became a little difficult for him to keep his chair; but, just as the situation grew dangerously difficult, he was by the Berlin Government appointed provost of Koln-ander-Spree, and member of the provincial consistory. In 1772 he published his Wörterbuch des Neuen Testaments, representing the second stage of rationalism. In this dictionary he does not pretend to give a linguistic explanation of the words occurring in the New Testament; it is a philosophical explanation he aims at. Convinced that a thorough understanding of the peculiar Græco-Hebraic manner of speech will offer a new key to the understanding of the doctrines of the New Testament, he lays hand on the task, and explains that such an expression as the "kingdom of heaven" (which Christ had come to found) is simply a peculiar Græco-Hebraic idiom, meaning nothing but a "new religion." The same is, of course, the case with such expressions as law and gospel, sacrifice and atonement, etc. The edict of 1788 again brought him into difficulties; and on account of his vote in the trial of Schulze he was sentenced to suspension for three months, and a fine to the insane-asylum. Nevertheless, in 1792 he was able to publish his Die Religion der Vollkommenen, which represents the very perfection of rationalism. Christianity is there explained to have been, from the very day of its birth, in a steady process of development, which will not stop until it has made the Christian religion a religion of morals only. TELLIER, Michael le, b. at Vire, Normandy, Dec. 16, 1648; d. at La Flèche, Sept. 2, 1719. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1661; devoted himself for some time to the study of history, but threw himself finally into theological polemics. By his attacks on the Jansenists he acquired so great a notoriety that he was made a provincial of his order, and appointed confessor to Louis XIV. after the death of Père La Chaise in 1709. He was fanatical, ambitious, unimpressible, a master of diplomatic trickery; and he had the old king completely in his power. The destruction of Port-Royal, the condemnation of Quesnel's writings, the enforcement of the bull Unigenitus, were among his principal exploits. After the death of Louis XIV. he was banished from the court. C. SCHMIDT.

TEMPERANCE. Our English word "temperance" is of Latin derivation. Its etymological meaning may perhaps be best understood by observing that of the verb "temper." Plastic substances, mortar for example, are properly tempered when their ingredients are mingled in correct proportions, with the result of making the article exactly fit for the purposes for which it is designed. A steel tool is tempered to a standard degree of hardness. Temperance as a virtue is the virtue of being properly tempered for the purposes for which a human being is designed. One possesses this virtue in the proportion in which he possesses desirable elements of character desirably balanced.

This is, therefore, a good word by which to translate the Greek ἔγκρατος of the New Testament. The latter term properly denotes mastery over one's self. A self-controlled character is a well-tempered character, at least in some important respects.

But it is not without good reason that the word has come to be prevaillingly restricted to a much narrower meaning. The use of intoxicating drinks is so conspicuously connected with the loss of self-mastery and of proper balance, that we very naturally connect the terms "temperance" and "intemperance" peculiarly and almost exclusively with the drinking-habit.

Intoxicants, in the form of wine and beer at least, have been known from the earliest historical times; and the vice of drunkenness has also been known. This is evident from the familiar biblical instances of Noah, Nabal, and others, from the figures on the early Egyptian monuments, from the Greek myths concerning Bacchus, and from many other sources. But the conditions of the problem of drunkenness have been very materially changed within the last few centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This art has long been known and practised; but it was not until a comparatively recent period that it came to be the powerful means it now is for increasing and cheapening the world's stock of intoxicating beverages.

According to an article by Professor Theodore W. Dwight, LL.D., published in the Independent of April 27, 1882, the earliest recognition of the existence of distilled liquors to be found in English legislation is in the year 1629; and it was not until much later in the seventeenth century, that these came to be recognized as in general use. As might have been expected, their introduction greatly increased the evils of intemperance. Says the Encyclopædia Britannica, in its article on "Gin,"—

"In the early part of the eighteenth century, gin-shops multiplied with great rapidity in London; and the use of the beverage increased to an extent so demoralizing, that retailers actually exhibited placards in their windows, intimating that there people might get drunk for a penny, and that clean straw, in comfortable cellars, would be provided for customers."

Contemporaneously with these changes in the facilities for the practice of drunkenness occurred certain other changes in men's habits of living, which also greatly affected the question of the use of alcoholic drinks. Coffee was known as early as 875 A.D., but it was first brought from Abyssinia into Arabia early in the fifteenth century. Coffee-houses were established in Constantinople about the middle of the sixteenth century, and in London in 1652; and, before the close of the seventeenth century, coffee was a customary beverage in Europe. Chocolate and tea came to be generally used as beverages within a few years of the same time.

In both these directions, throughout Europe and America, and parts of Asia and Africa, the generation of men who were of middle age about the year 1700 witnessed a radical revolution in the conditions of human life. In their childhood, fermented alcoholic drinks were the one resource of men, not only for purposes of intoxication, but for all the purposes for which tea, cocoa, and coffee are now employed. They lived to see the fermented beverages largely superseded, in the one use of them by distilled liquors, and in the other use of them by the hot drinks which have ever since been on our tables. In their childhood, however plenty wine and ale may relatively be said to have been, they were yet scarce enough so that habitual drunkenness was beyond the reach of any except those who had access to the cellars of the rich. Before they died anybody could get drunk, at any time, for a penny.

It should be added to this, that the use of tobacco became general during the seventeenth century. And as having a real, though less direct, connection with the temperance problem, we must count all the marvellous discoveries and inventions which have rendered human life in these later centuries so utterly different from what it ever was before.

These radical changes of condition naturally led to corresponding changes in the convictions of men in regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. To trace the development of these convictions is to sketch the history of the modern temperance reform in America and the Old World.

Until the current century, the general opinion of mankind has certainly not condemned the use of intoxicating drinks, nor even occasional drunkenness, provided the drinker kept himself prudently guarded from further bad results. Philo the Jew, contemporary with Jesus, wrote extensive treatises on Drunkenness and Sobriety, which are largely of the nature of allegorical comment on the passages in the Mosiac writings which mention the use of wine. These include a formal discussion of the question, "Whether the wise man will get drunk?" He replies by citing the expressed opinions of men, as well as evidence of other sorts, on both sides of the question. He says that "the sons of physicians and philosophers of high repute . . . have left behind ten thousand commentaries entitled treatises on drunkenness," and censures these for the narrowness of their treatment of the subject. He insists on the difference between the drinking of "unmixed wine," which will produce intoxication, and that of lighter or diluted wines. He calls unmixed wine a poison and a medicine. He condemns the drinking contests which were common in his day. He exposes in graphic pictures the vileness of drunken orgies and riots, and the deterioration of health and morals which results therefrom. He holds that "the wise man will never of his own accord think fit to enter upon a contest of hard drinking, unless there were great things at stake, such as the safety of his country, or the honor of his parents," etc. But he none the less indorses what he represents to be the current opinion; namely, that a wise man will occasionally get drunk. His helplessness when drunk no more disproves his wisdom than it resulted from a bilious attack, or from sleep, or from death. Philo intimates that the opposite opinion is quite respectfully defended, but proves, to his own complete satisfaction, that it is indefensible. His explanation of the doctrine of the Scriptures in the matter is, that "Moses looks upon an unmixed wine as a symbol, not of one thing only, but of many; namely, of trifling, and of playing the fool, and of all kinds of insensibility and of insatiable greediness, . . . and of a cheerfulness which comprehends many other objects," and the like. Philo's opinion does not seem to be at all that the Scriptures commend drinking but condemn excess, but rather that they either commend or condemn, according to the aspect in which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

Philo's opinions concerning the drinking-habit are certainly those which have been commonly held until our own century. But, as far back as we can trace the matter, we also find a highly reputable line of opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Of this, in the eighteenth century, the distinguished Samuel Johnson is an instance. Somewhat earlier in the century, the author of Gil Blas sarcastically admires "the patriotic forecast of those ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all customers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited, but under the direction of physicians," and the wisdom of those who frequented these resorts, not for "swilling themselves with wine, but . . . for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water" (Adventures of Gil Blas, book ii., chap. 4). This sarcasm must have been aimed at opinions held by respectable contemporaries of Le Sage. In 1743 John Wesley, in his General Rules, mentions as sinful, "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." It is said that in 1733 the trustees of the Colony of Georgia, who were living in London, enacted that "the drink of rum in Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved." In the Colonies and in Great Britain, during that century, there were several instances of similar legislation. Samuel Pepys, in his Diary, 1659-69, figures as an inconsistent total abstainer. Going back with a bound to the times of Philo, we find him asserting (Treatise on Drunkenness, ii.) that "great numbers of persons, who, because they never touch unmixed wine, look upon themselves as sober," yet display the same foolishness, senselessness, lack of self-control, and the like, which are displayed by a drunken person. Still earlier familiar instances are those of the Rechabites and the Nazarites, of Samuel and Samson.

Nearly up to our own times, therefore, the world has been aware of the dangers and evils attendant upon the use of inebriating beverages, has been in possession of the idea of total abstinence from them, and has been compelled to look upon total abstinents with high respect, but has, on the whole, approved the use of such beverages, not merely in what is now sometimes called moderation, but up to the line of occasional and discreet drunkenness.

The revolution of opinion, at least as a great and controlling movement, began in America. A representative incident will indicate its nature. The incident is taken from the Collections of the Cayuga County Historical Society, 1882.

Joseph Tallcot was a member of the Society of Friends, living a few miles south of the town of Auburn, N.Y. In all that vicinity, in 1816, the crops were so short that poor people found it difficult to procure breadstuffs for food. At the same time, Tallcot noticed, the distilleries kept in operation. He says, —

"The circumstances affected me not a little, and induced me to write an address to the sober and influential part of the community, inviting them to a serious consideration of the melancholy situation, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

It occurred to Joseph Tallcot to offer his views for the consideration of the members of the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings held in Geneva. In his narrative he says, —

"I found my way to the house of Henry Axtell, the Presbyterian clergyman of that place. His brethren from the surrounding country soon began to come into the village, and call on him for instruction where they might find entertainment among their friends. The master of the house appeared very hospitable, inviting them to partake of his brandy; which they did, with what would be thought moderation. He turned to me, and pleasantly said he 'supposed it would be useless to invite me to partake, considering my business. I as pleasantly replied, that 'we had been in the same habit, but, seeing the evil of it, we had abandoned it,' and I hoped they would do the same."

Joseph Tallcot read his paper, first before a committee, and afterward before the synod, and went his way. The synod, after duly considering it, published it, with resolutions "fully approving it, and solemnly declaring, that from that time they would abandon the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes; that they would speak against its common use from the pulpit, . . . and use their influence to prevail with others to follow their example."

Similar incidents were transpiring in different parts of the country and among people of various religious persuasions. In 1789 two hundred farmers of Litchfield, Conn., had pledged themselves for that season not to use distilled liquors in their farm-work. In 1791 Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia published his Medical Inquiry, in which he insisted that the use of distilled liquors as a beverage ought to be entirely abandoned. In 1812 the Presbyterian General Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In the same year the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperate Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstinence bodies. In 1818 the Presbyterian Assembly planted itself squarely on the principle that men ought to "abstain from 'even the common use' of ardent spirits." In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his Sermons on the Evils of Intemperance. In 1826 the American Temperance Society was organized. The National Philanthropist was started, and Dr. Lyman Beecher published his Six Sermons on Intemperance. In the same year Rev. Calvin Chapin, in The Connecticut Observer, advocated abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and not from distilled spirits merely. From about 1836 this principle came to be generally accepted by the reformers.

The spread of the movement was very rapid in Great Britain, and marvellously rapid in the United States. Societies, local and general, were organized. Temperance books, pamphlets, and newspapers were published in great numbers. Public meetings were held. The pledge was circulated. Total abstinence came to be counted by millions. Lancashire, Eng., contributed the word "te-total" to characterize the reform. In 1840 six hard drinkers in Baltimore suddenly signed the pledge, and started the "Washingtonian" movement. In a few months, about 1838, the Irish Roman-Catholic priest, Father Mathew, administered the pledge to near a hundred and fifty thousand persons in Cork alone. He was eminently successful in temperance-work in different parts of Great Britain, as well as in the United States, which he visited in 1849.

Fuller accounts of the movement in this country may be found in the article on Temperance Reform, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, and in the article by Professor J. W. Mears, in the Presbyterian Review for 1881, p. 500; while the temperance article in the Library of Universal Knowledge is pretty full in regard to the movement in Great Britain. To these sources the present article is indebted for a few of its facts and dates.

Many seem to suppose that the effort to secure the legal prohibition of the liquor-traffic is a later and more advanced stage of the temperance reform than the efforts for total abstinence; but this is only true in a modified sense. We have already seen, that there was prohibitory legislation for the Colony of Georgia as early as 1733. Most of the other earlier attempts to restrict the use of liquors were accompanied either by demands for the legal restriction of their sale, or else by actual legislation for that purpose. Dr. Beecher's Six Sermons emphatically declared the remedy for intemperance to be "the banishment of ardent spirits from the list of lawful articles of commerce," and invoked the interference of legislation to this end, as well as of public sentiment (edition of 1828, p. 61). As the numbers of the temperance men increased, they became more and more pressing in their demands for legislative remedies. During the decade beginning about 1816, they found it easy to carry the elections in most parts of the United States. Rigid prohibitory laws were very generally enacted, and local option laws in a few instances where general prohibition could not be obtained. It proved easier to enact laws, however, than to execute them. In most cases they have either been pronounced unconstitutional, or repealed, or allowed to become a dead letter.

The passage of these laws may, perhaps, be regarded as the culmination of one great movement of temperance reform. The subject has not since been so prominently before the public. This is doubtless to be accounted for, in part by the fact that it has ceased to be a novelty, in part by the fact that the advocates of temperance have unwisely allowed their attention to be too largely diverted from the great issues at stake to the minor points in which they differ among themselves, and in part to the presence of other public questions of absorbing interest, notably those connected with our civil war. Many imagine that the temperance movement is receding, but there is no sufficient evidence that such is the case. The larger part of the increase of our population for forty years past has been of immigrants and their descendants; that is, of classes of people who did not participate in the great reform movement. During the same time there has been a drifting into the large towns, which have always been centres of temptation. Though our population has trebled, those classes of it among whom the reform achieved its principal successes have not increased in any thing like that ratio. In these circumstances, if the proportion of our total abstainers to our whole population were now half as large as it was forty years ago, that would probably indicate that the reform had held its own. But doubtless the ratio is at least as large now as it was then, instead of being much smaller; and this indicates, on the whole, a decided and steady progress. Among the Irish members of the Roman Church, in particular, the gain is very marked and gratifying; and it seems to be even more so in Great Britain and the different parts of Europe.

In the temperance-work of the past thirty years, the Sons of Temperance, the Good Templars, the Rechabites, and other so-called secret temperance organizations, have been quite prominent. The various red-ribbon and blue-ribbon movements are familiar to all. Organizations of women, as well as of men, have made their influence felt in what have been described as praying "crusades" in the places where liquors were sold, in working with voters for better laws, and doubtless yet more effectively in the establishing of friendly inns, coffee-houses, and the like, and in securing temperance sermons and addresses, circulating temperance literature, forming temperance schools, and introducing temperance instruction into Sunday schools. Possibly the work now done, though less public than formerly, is not less in amount, nor less effective.

For some years renewed attention has been paid to the legislative aspects of the subject. The laws recently enacted in Michigan, which attempt to restrict the traffic by a high special tax, without the form of a license, seem to many the best available kind of legislation; while prohibitory constitutional amendments such as have lately been approved by the popular vote of Kansas and Iowa are advocated by others. Experiments have been tried in what are known as civil damage laws, by which those who sell intoxicating drinks are held responsible for certain of the evils thereby produced. Such laws were passed in Wisconsin as early as 1849, and in some of the other States at a much later date. In regard to all these, temperance-workers need to keep in mind that they cannot afford to cheapen the sanctity of law by the passage of intenable or carelessly framed laws, however just; nor to concede that even a license-law (and much less any other restrictive law) is at all of the nature of a sanction to the traffic; nor in the least to intermit their attempts to save the fallen, or to commit the young to temperance principles and habits, for the sake of giving effort to the securing of legislative changes.

The movement, from the beginning, has been, in the main, earnestly and reverently religious. Here and there, men who dislike the Bible and the churches have contrived to use the new temperance doctrines for venting their dislike; but such instances attract attention principally because they are exceptional. For a generation past, the habitual use of inebriating drinks has been so rare among the members of the distinctively Protestant churches, that the few who use them attract notice to themselves thereby; though this is less the case, perhaps, in the great cities than in the country.

In the earlier stages of the movement, as we have seen, there were several rapid advances, one after the other, in the doctrinal position of temperance men. At first the idea was to secure abstinence from excess in the use of alcoholic beverages, then abstinence from ardent spirits as distinguished from fermented liquors, and finally abstinence from all drinks that would intoxicate. This last stage defines historically the term "total abstinence." This term properly denotes, not abstinence from every thing which contains alcohol, but from every thing which so contains alcohol that it might possibly produce drunkenness; not abstinence from such liquids for all purposes, but abstinence from them as a beverage or common drink. The abstinence is total in that it is from all common drinking, and not merely from getting drunk; and in that it is from all sorts of inebriating drinks, and not from ardent spirits only. The historical total-abstinence position does not place the very light wines and beers on the same footing with those that will intoxicate; though it disapproves of them as a matter of prudence, on account of their relations to the stronger beverages. For similar reasons, it demands that alcohol shall not be recklessly or unnecessarily used for medicinal or other purposes; while it sharply distinguishes these from its use as a beverage.

This doctrine is almost universally held by temperance men in America, and is widely held elsewhere. There are some exceptions. A few men who are doing honorable and effective service against drunkenness advocate the propriety of the so-called moderate drinking of alcoholic beverages, as opposed to teetotalism; but the general opinion is against them. There is almost an equal unanimity in basing the duty of total abstinence upon our obligation to deny ourselves for the benefit of others, as presented in 1 Cor. viii. 13 and elsewhere, and generally acknowledged by casuists of all schools. The advocates of total abstinence everywhere would probably agree in affirming the existence of this obligation, and in regarding it as absolutely sufficient to cover the whole case.

But, except in these two points, they differ so radically as greatly to hinder their work. They flatly contradict one another in their teachings as to the grounds of the duty of total abstinence, its limits, and some of the means by which it is to be urged. It is evident that some of them, at least, are seriously mistaken. The cause has now no more pressing need than that its advocates should carefully and candidly sift the arguments they are accustomed to use, throwing away the bad, and retaining only those that will endure testing.

In the physiological argument, for example, it is sometimes held, on the one side, that alcohol is properly a food, and a genuine stimulant, and, on the other hand, that it is merely an irritant poison. But with alcohol, as with other substances, this may depend on the quantity of the alcohol, the presence of other ingredients, and the condition of the body when the alcohol is taken. Joseph Cook asserted, in his lectures in Boston, in 1882, that the tables of certain insurance companies which insure total abstainers in one class, and moderate drinkers in another, show that there is a distinct and considerable difference of longevity in favor of the former. This and similar facts conclusively prove that alcohol habitually taken in the form of an intoxicating beverage is deleterious, even when it does not lead to drunkenness. Nevertheless, alcohol is commonly believed to have a genuine medicinal use, though it is a dangerous medicine. And while the experience of some generations of total abstainers proves that it is never necessary as a food, the most trustworthy experiments seem to show, that, in minute quantities, it is sometimes harmless, and even salutary. It would not be easy to determine the percentage of alcohol necessary to render a beverage intoxicating. But, from the considerations just mentioned, it seems clear that the using of dilutions in which alcohol is contained in quantities clearly less than that percentage is a very different thing from using intoxicating drinks. Our war, let us remember, is not against alcohol, but against intoxicating alcohol. Doubtless the two are so related as to render it prudent to abstain from even the very light wines, beers, and ciders. But we ought to remember that this obligation, unlike that to refuse the stronger beverages, depends on local and temporary conditions. It would have very little weight, for example, in the state of things which existed in the world prior to about the year 1700.

Again: it is argued, on the one hand, that literature, ancient and modern, recognizes two different meanings of the word "wine;" namely, fermented grape-juice, and unfermented. The common reply to this is a sweeping and contemptuous denial that the word is ever used to denote unfermented juice of any kind. The facts proved are, that preparations of unfermented grape-juice have been well known among many peoples, that they have sometimes been used in beverages, and that the name "wine" has been frequently applied to them, though certainly not in such a way as to establish this as one of the current and natural meanings of the word.

As a rule, both the parties in this discussion sturdily ignore any distinction between the terms "fermented" or "alcoholic," and "intoxicating." But the existence of precisely this distinction is the one fact of real importance which the evidence adduced in the discussion abundantly proves. In the history of the grape a very important part is played by wines — sometimes of cheap and ordinary quality, and sometimes very choice — which contained alcohol in such quantities and combinations as to render the wine agreeable, but absolutely unintoxicating. It is these uninebriating wines, which, with some confusion of thought as to their relations to the grape-jellies, have been mistaken by many for wines without alcohol.

Men who are accustomed to recognize the Bible as an inspired rule of conduct have been compelled to try to reconcile its occasional approval of wine, in the example of Jesus at Cana, for example, with its repeated and sweeping denunciations of wine. Those who hold that the word "wine" may equally well mean either the fermented or the unfermented juice of the grape, think that, when the Bible approves of wine, it must be held to refer to that which is unfermented. Their opponents, denying the distinction, commonly assert that the Bible approves of the drinking of intoxicants, but disapproves of excess. The opinion thus denied is certainly erroneous; but, as certainly, that substituted for it does not follow from the premises. Philo, as we have seen, held the different theory, that the Scriptures approve wine-drinking in certain aspects of it, but not in others. It would be easy to construct other theories as plausible as either of these. The discussion of this question properly belongs, not to this article, but to that on WINE. It is sufficient here to say, that we must look for a better solution of it than has yet been offered. Meanwhile, whatever solution we may adopt, it will still be true that the specific precepts concerning wine, found in the Scriptures, may not apply in the changed conditions of our modern civilization; while the scriptural principles on which our obligation to total abstinence is based are at all times applicable.

LIT. — The various religious publishing boards and societies, the private houses that publish Sunday-school literature, and the National Temperance Society and Publication House, offer each its own list of temperance stories and of other temperance books and tracts. Many of the secret and other temperance organizations publish each its newspaper. At different times, and notably within a few years past, the subject has been discussed in the reviews. To the catalogues and indexes of these publishers and publications the reader is referred. It is impossible particularly to name more than a very few works out of the vast number.

Some of the more celebrated older publications are mentioned in the body of this article. Others are, L. M. SARGENT: Temperance Talks, circ. 1839; Rev. GEORGE B. CHEEVER: Duncan Gillet's Distillery, and Duncan Jones's Brewery, circ. 1835; Permanent Temperance Documents, 1837-12. No more valuable temperance book exists than the Autobiography of John B. Gough, 1869. Among the more noteworthy of the publications of the National Temperance Society are the Centennial Temperance Volume, 1876 (for the history of the temperance movement, and of organizations and men engaged in it); Moderation, vs. Total Abstinence, 1881 (containing Dr. HOWARD CROSBY'S Calm Vicer, and several replies to the same, and thus exhibiting several representative types of opinion); Dr. HARGREAVES: Our Wasted Resources (giving the economical argument); as apparatus for class instruction, JULIA COLEMAN: The Temperance School, the Lesson Book for Schools, and the Juvenile Temperance Manual; Drs. FOSS and MEARS: Temperance Sermons; Dr. CHAFFIN: The Moral Duty of Total Abstinence; WILLIAM E. DODGE: The Church and Temperance; MOODY: Talks on Temperance; J. M. VANBUREN: Gospel Temperance; Canon FAIRBair: Talks on Temperance; Dr. HARGREAVES: Alcohol and Science; and Dr. E. M. HENRI: Alcohol as a Food and Medicine. For other medical views, see the Tribune lecture of Dr. HAMMOND; and, by index, the two volumes on Physiology, by Drs. J. W. DRAPER and J. C. DEANER. For additional literature, including that of prohibition, consult any current number of the organs of the National Temperance Society, — the National Temperance Advocate, or the Youth's Temperance Banner. The theory of unfermented wines, and the view that the churches ought to use unalcoholic grape-juice at the Lord's Table, are advocated in many of the publications of this society, but in none of them more reasonably than in The Bible Rule of Temperance, published by the Rev. GEORGE DEFFIELD in 1831-35, and republished, 1868. These two doctrines are attacked by Dr. DUNLOP MOORE, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1881, and January, 1882. In the same Review, for April, 1882, is an article which advocates the using of the unalcoholic juice of the grape in the communion, and maintains generally the positions taken in the present article. Of temperance Sunday-school stories, which are being produced in considerable numbers, We Three, by Miss KATE W. HAMILTON, is a highly creditable specimen. The stories by MARY DWISSELL CHELTONS are favorites with many. W. J. BEECHER.

TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM. 1. TEMPLE OF SOLOMON. — David, when he was inhabiting his house of cedar, and God had given him rest from all his enemies, meditated the design of building a temple in which the ark of God might be placed, instead of being deposited within curtains (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xvii. 1). In this he was discouraged by the prophet Nathan, on account of his many wars, and the blood which he had shed, but promised at the same time that his son and successor shall build a house unto the Lord. While David was prohibited from building the temple, he nevertheless made preparations for it (1 Kings v.; 1 Chron. xvii.); and, as far as the material and ideal of the building is concerned, David was its author, while Solomon merely executed the design. The workmen and the materials employed in the erection of the temple were chiefly procured by Solomon from Hiram, king of Tyre. The building, which was begun four hundred and eighty years after the exodus from Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, in the third month of the year 1012 B.C., was finished in the twelfth year of his reign, in the eighth month (1 Kings vi. 38).

In its construction the temple was mainly built after the pattern of the tabernacle; since it was only to be an enlarged and fixed dwelling of the Lord, a palace in place of the movable tent. Of course every thing was on an enlarged scale, and of more substantial materials.

The temple itself was sixty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty high. The floor was throughout of cedar, but boarded over with planks of fir

(1 Kings vi. 15). The internal dimension of the "holy" was forty cubits long, twenty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. The holy was separated from the "Holy of holies" (debir) by a partition. It was on the western extremity of the entire building, and its internal dimensions formed a cube of twenty cubits. On the eastern extremity of the building stood the porch. At the entrance of this porch stood the two columns called Joachin and Boaz, which were twenty-three cubits high. The temple was also surrounded by a triple story of chambers, each of which stories was five cubits high. The lowest story of the chambers was five cubits, the middle six, and the third seven cubits wide. The difference of the width arose from the circumstance that the external walls of the temple were so thick that they were made to recede one cubit after an elevation of five feet; so that the scarcement in the wall of the temple gave a firm support to the beams which supported the second story without being inserted into the wall of the sanctuary. The entrance to these stories was from without. The windows, which are mentioned in 1 Kings vi. 4, served chiefly for ventilation; since the light within the temple was obtained from the sacred candlesticks. In the Holy of holies were no windows, because "the Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (1 Kings viii. 12). The temple was wainscoted with cedar-wood, which was covered with gold. The boards within the temple were ornamented by beautiful carvings, representing cherubim, palms, and flowers. From 2 Chron. iii. 5, it appears that the greater house was also coiled with fir. The doors of the oracle were composed of olive-tree; but the doors of the outer temple had posts of olive-tree, and leaves of fir (1 Kings vi. 31 sq.). Both doors, as well that which led into the temple as that which led from the holy to the Holy of holies, had folding leaves; the aperture being closed by a suspended curtain. The lintel and side-posts of the oracle seem to have circumscribed a space which contained one-fifth of the whole area of the partition; and the posts of the door of the temple, one-fourth of the area of the wall in which they were placed (1 Kings vi. 31-35).

Within the Holy of holies stood only the ark of the covenant between two cherubim; but within the holy were ten golden candlesticks, and the altar of incense, and a table for the shew-bread.

The temple was surrounded by a court of priests (2 Chron. iv. 9). This, again, was surrounded by a wall consisting of cedar-beams placed on a stone foundation (1 Kings viii. 36), and contained the altar of burnt offering, the brazen sea, and ten brazen lavens. From the court of the priests, which is called (1 Kings vi. 36) the inner and (Jer. xxxvi. 10) the upper court, a few steps led into the lower court of the people, which is called (Ezek. xl. 17) the outward and (2 Chron. iv. 9) the great court. Both courts were paved. Doors overlaid with brass led into the outer court. On the east was (Ezek. xl. 1) the main gate. According to 2 Kings xv. 35 and 2 Chron. xxvii. 3, Jotham built the "higher gate" of the house of the Lord. A "gate of foundation" is mentioned (2 Chron. xxiii. 5). Near the eastern gate, inside of the court of priests, probably stood the brazen scaffold which Solomon had built for the dedicatory prayer (2 Chron. vi. 13), and which afterwards probably served as the king's stand (2 Kings xi. 11, xiii. 3). There was perhaps an ascent by which the king went up into the temple from his own house (1 Kings x. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 11). The covert for the sabbath (2 Kings xvi. 18) probably served as a kind of protection against the sun and wind.

After the temple was finished, it was consecrated by the king. It remained the centre of public worship for all the Israelites, only till the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsook this sanctuary. But even in the kingdom of Judah it was from time to time desecrated by altars erected to idols (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 13). There was a treasury in the temple, in which much precious metal was collected for the maintenance of public worship. The gold and silver of the temple were, however, frequently applied to political purposes (1 Kings xv. 18 sq.; 2 Kings xii. 18, xvi. 8, xviii. 15). The treasury of the temple was repeatedly plundered by foreign invaders; for instance, by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26), by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 14), by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 13), and, lastly, again by Nebuchadnezzar, who, having removed the valuable contents, caused the temple to be burned down (xxv. 9 sq.) four hundred and sixteen years after its dedication.

The restoration of the temple was prophesied; and, fourteen years after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, Ezekiel saw in a vision a new temple, which he describes in chaps. xl.-xliii.

II. THE SECOND TEMPLE.—In the year 536 B.C. Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to their country, and rebuild the temple, at the same time commanding that the sacred utensils which had been pillaged in the first temple should be restored, and that, for the restoration of the temple, assistance should be granted (Ez. i. vi. 2). The first colony which returned under Zerubbabel and Joshua, having collected the necessary means, and having also obtained the assistance of Phœnician workmen, commenced, in the second year after their return, the rebuilding of the temple. The Sidonians brought rafts of cedar-trees from Lebanon to Joppa. The Jews refused the co-operation of the Samaritans, who, being thereby offended, induced the king, Smerdis, to prohibit the building. It was only in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.) that the building was resumed; and was completed 516 B.C. (Ez. iv.-vi.; Hag. i. 15). According to Ez. vi. 3, it was sixty cubits high and wide, thus larger than the Temple of Solomon; while, according to Hag. ii. 3, it was inferior to the first. The inferiority probably consisted in the absence of the ark and precious metals. Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged and desecrated it through idolatry (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 38; 2 Macc. vi. 2). Judas Maccabæus repaired, furnished, and cleansed it, 165 B.C. (1 Macc. ix. 36; 2 Macc. i. 18, x. 3), whence the Jewish "feast of dedication" (John x. 22). He also fortified the temple mount (1 Macc. iv. 60, vi. 7). Alexander Jannæus (about 106 B.C.) separated the court of the priests from the external court by a wooden railing (Josephus, Ant. XIII. 13, 5). In the year 63 B.C. Pompey attacked the temple from the north side, caused a great massacre in its courts, but abstained from plun-doring the treasury, although he even entered the Holy of holies (Ibid. XIV. 1, 2 sq.). Herod the Great, with the assistance of Roman troops, stormed the temple, 37 B. C., on which occasion some halls were destroyed (Ibid. XIV. 16, 2).

III. THE HERODIAN TEMPLE. — Herod, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, undertook to raise a perfectly new temple. The work was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 or 21 B. C.). Priests and Levites finished the temple in one year and a half, while the courts required eight years. The out-buildings, however, were completed under Agrippa II. and under Albinus the procurator, in the year A. D. 61 (Joseph., Ant. XX. 9, 7). The structure of the temple is described by Josephus (Ant. XV. 11; Jewish War, V. 5), and in the Talmudic treatise Middoth. Already under Archelaus the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt and bloody massacres (Joseph., Ant. XVII. 9, 3; 10, 2). But the most horrid scenes were during the last Jewish revolt (Joseph., War, IV. 5, 1; V. 1, 2, 3). In August of the year 70 the Romans rushed from the Tower of Antonia into the sacred precincts, the halls of which were set on fire by the Jews themselves. It was against the will of Titus that a Roman soldier threw a firebrand into the temple, which caused its conflagration. The Emperor Hadrian (A. D. 136) founded a Roman colony, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, on the ruins of Jerusalem, and dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus. Under the reign of Constantine the Great the Jews were severely punished for having attempted to restore the temple. In the year 363 the Emperor Julian undertook to rebuild the temple, but he was compelled to desist by flames which burst forth from the foundations.

The temple ground, called by the Turks el Haram, is now occupied by a splendid mosque erected by Omar, as Sukkara, south of which stands the mosque el Aksa (formerly a Christian church).

TEMPUS CLAUSUM ("closed time," also feriatum or sacratum) is a canonical term denoting those days on which no noisy festivities are allowed to take place. Regulations of that kind naturally originated from the general conception of how a Christian festival ought to be celebrated; but already among the Israelites it was customary to prepare one's self for the celebration by prayer and abstinence (Exod. xix. 5; 1 Sam. xxi. 1); and, as Paul indorsed the custom (1 Cor. vii. 5), the Church had thus a basis for further development given. The oldest laws relating to the subject date back to the middle of the fourth century. In its can. 51-52 the Council of Laodicea (351) forbade various festivities during the quadragesimal fast; and its ordinances were confirmed by the State. Later on, not only the quadragesima, but also advent and other feast cycles, were put down as tempus clausum: though the observance never became uniform during the middle ages. The Council of Trent (sess. xiv., Nov. 11, 1563) introduced various mitigations of the rules. The evangelical churches generally adopted the ordinances of a tempus clausum, but the observance varied very much in the different countries. The conference of Eisenach (1857) gave much attention to the subject, and its protocols contain an exhaustive survey of the state of affairs in the different churches. In its general principle it recognized the Tempus clausum Quadragesimæ as a wholesome pedagogical institution, and recommended the careful maintenance of such remains of it as might still exist. See KILFOUR: Liturgische Abhandlungen, i. pp. 55 sq.

H. F. JACOBSON.

TEN ARTICLES, The, were brought into Parliament by Bishop Fox, and passed July 11, 1536. Though emanating from the crown, it is probable that Fox and Crammer helped to prepare them. They mark an advance in the work of the Reformation, but retain the doctrines of baptismal regeneration, transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the usefulness (though not the efficacy) of prayers for the dead.

TEN COMMANDMENTS. See DECALOGUE.

TENISON, Thomas, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, in 1636; and studied at Benet College, Cambridge University. In the year of the ejection (1662) he became a fellow, and in 1665 was appointed university preacher. The rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, the living of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, the vicarage of St. Martins-in-the-Fields, London, the archdeaconry of the metropolis, and the bishopric of Lincoln, successively fell to his lot; and in all these preferments he showed administrative power, for which he was more remarkable than for pulpit eloquence. He was an active Churchman, and busy in matters connected with the Revolution of 1688. On the death of Tillotson, he was raised to the primacy, in which he made a considerable figure, both as to temporal and spiritual affairs. When William III. was absent from England in 1695, Tenison filled the post of a lord-justice, being first in the commission appointed by the sovereign for that purpose; but his actual power and political influence in that capacity must have been far below what accrued to some of the English archbishops in the middle ages. It was as president of the Upper House of Convocation that he had the most arduous duties to discharge, and the greatest trouble to endure. The Lower House was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, unfriendly to the Revolution (which Tenison cordially approved), and advocating the independence of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in a way which he condemned. The Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation came into boisterous conflict; and scenes were enacted in the Jerusalem Chamber, the adjoining organ-room, the dean's yard, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, such as were disgraceful to the High-Church clergy, who figured as chief actors in the strife. The archbishop manifested a steadiness of purpose and an invincibility of calm resistance, which won for him the name of the "rock-like" Tenison. He aimed at church reform, and issued circulars to the bishops with that view, but achieved little success. A funeral-sermon he preached for Mary, consort of William III., was warmly censured in a letter attributed to Bishop Ken. He was more a man of words than letters, but he founded a library which bore his name. He attended his royal master on his death-bed, and survived Queen Anne, in whose reign he had fresh convocation troubles. He died in 1715. JOHN STOUTGTON.

TENNENT, a family of ministers illustrious in the history of the American Presbyterian Church. — 1. William Tennent, b. in Ireland, 1673; d. at Neshaminy, Bucks County, twenty miles north of Philadelphia, Penn., May 6, 1745. Originally in the Established Church of Ireland, he arrived in Philadelphia, Penn., Sept. 6, 1718, and entered the Presbyterian synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 17, 1718. In 1720 he settled at Bedford, Westchester County, N.Y., and in 1726 became pastor at Neshaminy, Bucks County, Penn., although he was never formally installed. Impressed by the lack of educational facilities for the young men growing up around him, he erected in 1726 or 1727 a log house, the famous "Log College," wherein he taught three of his four sons and a number of other youth, several of whom afterwards rose to eminence in the church. Log College was the first of the literary and theological institutions of the Presbyterian Church in America, the parent of those in Princeton, N.J., and, indeed, of them all. Mr. Tennent's publications were mostly sermons. Our knowledge of his life and college is in good part derived from Whitefield's journal, which shows his apostolic character. — 2. Gilbert Tennent, eldest son of the preceding, and a distinguished Presbyterian divine; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, April 5, 1703; d. in County Armagh, July 23, 1764. He came to America with his father, 1718; was educated by him; was licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, May,

1726; acted as tutor in Log College for a year; was ordained and installed pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., in the autumn of 1727. Like his father, he was an ardent admirer of Whitefield; and, in imitation of the great evangelist, he made a preaching-tour through West Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and in 1740, at Whitefield's solicitation, through New England, as far as Boston. By his fiery zeal, deep moral earnestness, spirituality, no less than by his logic and argumentative ability, he produced everywhere a profound impression. His popularity was second only to Whitefield's. But he was lacking in tenderness and consideration for those who differed from him. At that time many Presbyterian ministers were conscientiously opposed to the methods adopted by the revival preachers. Tennent had no appreciation of such scruples, but set them down to a lack of vital religion. Moreover, Log College was openly criticised by the synod of Philadelphia, because of the type of piety there fostered, and its educational defects. Tennent naturally resented these attacks, and, under what he deemed sufficient provocation, preached in 1740 his famous "Nottingham sermon," "one of the most severely abusive sermons which was ever penned" (Alexander), in which he lashed his ministerial brethren for their "hypocrisy." Tennent had a large following throughout the country, and able ministers were upon his side. The agitation lasted for many years. The presbytery of New Brunswick seceded from the synod of Philadelphia in 1741 (see art. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, p. 1907). In May, 1743, Tennent was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, then just started, made up of the admirers of Whitefield and the friends of the revival. But, although he remained their pastor till his death, he did not repeat in his second charge the triumphs of his first. He was faithful and highly useful; but his preaching was quieter, and not so many souls came under his influence. His delivery was much less impassioned, due very probably to his use of a manuscript. In 1753 he raised in Great Britain some fifteen hundred pounds for the College of New Jersey, — a sum much beyond his expectations. Although he had contributed so largely to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, he toiled to effect a reconciliation, and saw with great satisfaction the breach healed in 1758. Besides a memoir of his brother John (Boston, 1735), he published a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1713), and occasional sermons and pamphlets. See list in Log College, pp. 65 sq. — 3. William Tennent, brother of the preceding; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, June 3, 1705; d. at Freehold, Monmouth County, N.J., March 8, 1777. He studied under his father in Log College, and theology under his brother Gilbert in New Brunswick; was licensed by the presbytery of New Brunswick; ordained pastor of the church at Freehold, October, 1733, and held the position till death. He is the subject of several highly remarkable stories, of which the two most famous are, (1) that, while preparing for his examination for licensure, he fell sick, and had a trance which lasted three days, during which time he was, as he believed and declared, in heaven, and heard "unutterable things." His friends thought he was dead, and were upon the point of burying him, notwithstanding the protestations of his physician, when he revived. He regained his health in a year, but had lost all his knowledge of reading and writing, much more, all his previous learning. After a time, however, he experienced "a severe shock in his head;" and his knowledge from that moment began rapidly to return, until all was regained. "For three years," he said, "the sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain, when compared to heaven, that, could I have had the world for stooping down for it, I believe I should not have thought of doing it." No autobiographic record of his experiences during his trance is believed to be extant, although his intention to prepare one is known. See Log College, pp. 112-118, 147. (2) The second story is, that "one night, when Mr. Tennent was asleep in his own bed, he was waked up by a sharp pain in the region of the toes of one of his feet; and upon getting a light, and examining the foot, it was discovered that several of his toes had been cut entirely off, as if by some sharp instrument. But, though the wounded part was bleeding, nothing was seen of the excised members, nor any means by which such a dismemberment could have been effected" (Log College, p. 151). Mr. Tennent was a remarkable character, full of resources, indefatigable in Christian labors, wise to win souls and to guide them to heaven. By his earnestness, eloquence, simplicity, and, above all, ardent piety, he made such an impression upon his neighborhood, that he is vividly remembered until this day. — 1. John Tennent, third son of William, sen.; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, Nov. 12, 1707; educated in Log College; licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, and settled at Freehold, N.J., Nov. 19, 1730, but d. April 23, 1732, leaving behind him a pleasant and godly memory. "His labors were attended with three notable qualities, — prudence, diligence, and success." Two of his sermons, and memoir, were published in a volume by Gilbert Tennent, Boston, 1735. — 5. Charles Tennent, fourth son of William, sen.; b. at Colerain, County Down, Ireland, May 3, 1711; was pastor at White-Clay Creek, Del.; d. after 1760, at Buckingham, Md. TERAPHIM (Gen. xxxi. 19, 31; 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16), a word found only in the plural form, derived, probably, from עָרַן, "to be rich," designating a sort of household gods, or pontes, in size and appearance approaching the human, which were regarded as dispensers of good-fortune, and shields against evil (Judg. xviii. 21). They were objects of worship, and consulted as oracles (Ezek. xxi. 26; Zech. x. 2). The Israelites derived their use of them from the Arameans, and they existed in common private use, although forbidden in public worship, and always ascribed by the prophets as idols, even after the Babylonish captivity (Gen. xxxv. 4; 2 Kings xxiii. 24; Zech. x. 2; Hos. iii. 1).

TERMINISM AND THE TERMINISTIC CONTROVERSY. Mediaeval theology, partially supported by Augustine, maintained that the terminus of grace coincided with the terminus of life; so that infants dying without baptism could not possibly escape hell. During the Reformation, this doctrine was modified in various ways. On the one side, the idea of the free, infinite grace of God expanded the terminus beyond life, and gave rise to the doctrine of apokatastasis; on the other side, the conviction that a certain interior, moral-religious state was an absolute condition of grace, narrowed the terminus down almost to a single moment of life, and gave rise to the doctrine of terminism. The Friends are the principal representatives of this doctrine, holding that every person has in his life a moment or period of visitation, but that no second opportunity is granted. The Pietists, with their suspicion against the late repentance, also incline towards this doctrine; and in J. G. Bose, deacon of Sorau, it found a decided and eloquent spokesman. His Terminus peremptorius salutis humanæ (Frankfort, 1698) attracted much attention, and called forth a great number of refutations. The most remarkable among these were J. G. Neumann's Dissertatio de termino salutis humanæ peremptorio (Wittenberg, 1700) and Dissertatio de tempore gratiæ dicendi, etc. (Wittenberg, 1701). As Bose died in 1700, A. Rechenberg, the son-in-law of Spener, took up the defence of his ideas, and a long and bitter controversy ensued with Ittig, professor at Leipzig; but the spreading rationalism finally bettered the question of all interest. TERRITORIALISM denotes a theory of church government which originated with the Reformation, and according to which the ruler of a country has a natural right to rule also over the ecclesiastical affairs of his people. The theory found its principal supporter in Christian Thomasius, and its principal opponent in J. B. Carpov. See the ART. CHURCH AND STATE.

TERSTEEGEN, Gerhard, b. at Meurs in Rhenish Prussia, Nov. 25, 1697; d. at Mulheim in Westphalia, April 3, 1769; a famous mystic and hymnist of the Reformed Church. He was educated in the Latin school of his native city, and in 1713 apprenticed to a merchant in Mulheim, where he soon after made the acquaintance of Wilhelm Hoffmann, the leader of a pietistic revival movement in those regions. As he found that mercantile business interfered with the development of his religious life, he left that profession in 1719, and learned the trade of a ribbon-maker. Settling in a lonesome little hut, he led a secluded and ascetic life, dividing his time between work and prayer, and distributing not only his earnings, but also the inheritance from his mother, among the poor. After 1721, his activity in the service of Christ assumed greater dimensions. He began to preach, and he engaged in literature. Travelling from one place to another, he visited many towns and cities in Holland and Westphalia, held conventicles, and formed minor communities. He translated numerous books of the French mystics, — Labadie, Madame Guyon, Louvigny, and others. Of his own compositions, the principal are, Insuslense Lebensbeschreibungen heilige Seelen (1733-53, 3 vols.), Geistliche Trösterlein (1769-74, 1 vols.), Weg der Wahrheit, Güte, etc., and a number of beautiful hymns. His Gedanken über die Werke des Philosophen von Sans Souci was read by Friedrich II., and is said to have made an impression on him. A collected edition of his works has appeared at Essen, and separate editions are still made. The principal source of his life is his correspondence, of which the German part appeared at Solingen, 1773-75, 2 vols., and the Dutch at Hoorn, 1772. His biography was written by Kerlen (Mülheim, 2d ed., 1853) and Stursberg (1869). See art. HYMNOLGY, p. 1051. W. KRAFFT.

TERTIARIES, TERTIARI (Tertius ordo de penitentia), formed associations whose members, though not obliged to live in monasteries, or take the three monastic vows, nevertheless led a religious life according to certain definite rules. They remained in the world, and were distinguished from other people only by their sombre, unadorned costume, by certain religious restrictions, and certain religious practices. But in the world they represented the interests of the order with which they were connected, and enjoyed, beside the reputation of greater sanctity than was to be found among ordinary laymen, not a few of the privileges of the orders. It is said that such associations were first formed by Norbert, the founder of the order of the Præmonstratenses; but its complete organization and success the institution owes to Francis of Assisi, who, afraid of receiving into the monasteries all the persons who were awakened by his preaching,—because, in that case, whole regions might have been depopulated,—and yet unwilling not to meet the popular craving for penitence, had recourse to this device. The success of the institution was prodigious. The highest persons became members of the order,—the Emperor Charles IV., King Louis of France, King Bela of Hungary, Queen Blanche of Castile, and others. Other monastic orders followed the example of the Franciscans, and formed associations of tertiaries. There were also female tertiaries.

TERTULLIAN (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus), b. at Carthage about 150 or 160; d. there between 220 and 240; the first great writer of Latin Christianity, and one of the grandest and most original characters of the ancient church. Of his life very little is known. His father held a high position (centurio, aide-de-camp) in the Roman garrison in Africa; but the Punic blood of his descent is visibly pulsating in his style, with its archaisms or provincialisms, its glowing imagery, its passionate temper. He received an excellent education. He was a scholar. He wrote books in Greek, of which, however, none has come down to us. But his proper study was jurisprudence, and his method of reasoning shows striking marks of his juridical training. It is not known at what time he was converted to Christianity, nor how the conversion came about. But the event must have been sudden, decisive, transforming at once his whole personality; for afterwards he could not imagine a truly Christian life without such a conscious breach, a radical act of conversion; fiunt, non nascuntur Christiani. In the Church of Carthage he was ordained a presbyter, though he was married,—a fact which is well established by his two books to his wife, though Roman-Catholic writers have tried to deny it. Rome he visited once or twice; and it may be that the laxity and corruption of morals which at that time (see CALIXTUS) he found prevailing in the Church of Rome contributed not a little to drive him into Montanism. At all events, a few years after his conversion (about 202) he became the leader, the passionate and brilliant exponent, of that movement (see MONTANISM),—that is, he became a schismatic; and the story, that before his death he returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church, is very improbable, since his party, the Tertullianists, continued to exist. Nevertheless, in spite of his schism he continued to fight heresy, especially Gnosticism; and by these doctrinal works he is the teacher of Cyprian, the predecessor of Augustine, and the chief founder of Latin theology.

The writings of Tertullian are very numerous, though generally not very large. As they cover the whole theological field of the time,—apologetics against Paganism, polemics against heresies, and polity, discipline, morals, or the whole reorganization of human life on a Christian basis,—they give a picture of the religious life of the time which is of the greatest interest to the church historian. Their general character is stern and practical, but they are full of life and freshness. In his endeavors to make the Latin language a pliant vehicle for his somewhat tumultuous ideas, he now and then becomes strained, queer, and obscure; but as a general rule he is quick, precise, and pointed. And he is always powerful, commanding the attention of the reader, not begging it; always rich, lavish with wit and satire, sometimes, also, with sophism and lawyer's tricks; and always original. Though thoroughly conversant with Greek theology, he was entirely independent of it. Indeed, he forms a direct contrast to Origen, just as Montanism forms the opposite extreme of Gnosticism. While Origen pushes his idealism far in the direction of a Gnostic spiritualism, Tertullian carries his realism to the very verge of materialism. Rejecting the Platonic doctrine of pre-existence, and the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, he adopts the traducianist view of hereditary sin, teaches that soul and body originate at the same moment, and proves, metaphysically and from the Bible, that the soul has corporality. Greek philosophy he despised; Gnosticism he considered a crime; and Neander has exactly hit the centre of his spiritual character by calling his monograph upon him, Antignosticus. But it is just this practical bearing of his ideas, even the most abstract ones, which places him at the head of the theology of the Western Church. The direction he thereby gave to all theological speculation has never since been entirely lost sight of, not even by the schoolmen.

The chronology of Tertullian's writings is very uncertain. The principal question, however,—Which of them belong to the Catholic period of his life, and which to the Montanist?—can in many cases be decided by internal criteria. To the Montanistic period belong Adversus Marcionem, De anima, De carne Christi, De resurrectione carnis, Adversus Præcatu, De civitate incerta, De fuga in persecutio, De monachatu, De jejuniis, De pudicitia, etc.; certainly Catholic are his Apologétique (A.D. 197), De penitentia, De oratione, De baptismo, Ad uxorem, Ad martyres, perhaps also, De præscriptione hæreticorum, etc.; while others, Ad Nationes, De testimonio animæ, De pallio, Adversus Hæresim, etc., are of uncertain date. Among his apologetical writings, his Apologétique, written during the reign of Septimius Severus, and addressed to the Roman magistrates, is the best defence of Christianity and the Christians ever written against the reproaches of the Pagans, and one of the most magnificent monuments of the ancient church, full of enthusiasm, courage, and vigor. It first clearly proclaims the principle of religious liberty as an inalienable right of man. Of his dogmatical works, the most important is his De præscriptione, developing as its fundamental idea, that, in a dispute between the Church and a separating party, the whole burden of the evidence lies with the latter, as the Church, in possession of the unbroken tradition, is by its very existence a guaranty of its truth. His five books Adversus Marcionem, written in 207 or 208, are the most comprehensive and elaborate of his polemical works, and invaluable for the true understanding of Gnosticism. Of his moral and ascetic treatises, the De penitentia and De spectaculis are among the most interesting; the De pudicitia and De virginibus reclusis, among the most characteristic.

LIT. — Collected editions of Tertullian's works are numerous, e.g., BEATUS RHEANUS, Basel, 1521; SEMLER, Halle, 1770-73, 6 vols. The best is by OEHLER, Leipzig, 1853-54, 3 vols. TEST ACT, The, an act passed by the English Parliament in 1663, which enacted that all persons holding public offices, civil or military, should receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was entitled an "Act to prevent dangers from Popish Recusants," and was in the first instance levelled against the Catholics. The Toleration Act of William (1689), and especially the legislation of the present century (the Relief Act of May 9, 1828, and the Roman-catholic Relief Bill of April 13, 1829), have abolished the hardships of the Test Act.

TESTAMENT, The Old and New, is the dominant name in the Occidental Church for the collection of Holy Scripture, and the translation of the Greek designation ἡ παλαιὰ καὶ ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη. The term arose in this way: διαθήκη means disposition; then the special form, a will; then, so far as the execution of this will depends upon certain conditions, an agreement bordering upon a covenant (συνθήκη), yet differing from it, since in a διαθήκη one of the parties takes the initiative, and lays down the terms. It was in obedience to a right instinct that the LXX translated ἡ διαθήκη, instead of by συνθήκη; for thereby they expressed the correct idea, that, in the "covenant" between God and man, God appears, not as one of the parties simply, but as the founder, who holds the other strictly to certain terms. It is upon this idea that the argumentation in Gal. iii. 15 seq. rests. The Itala translates "covenant" also by testamentum ("will"), where Jerome, in the Old Testament, uses fidus. The Scriptures are τὰ βιβλία τῆς διαθήκης ("the books of the will"), which meant at first the Decalogue, then the whole law. For sake of brevity the phrase was replaced by the single word διαθήκη (so 2 Cor. iii. 14). In the Greek Church the expression was used of the whole canon (so Origen; π. ap. c. iv. 1). In old ecclesiastical Latin, besides testamentum, instrumentum was used (so Tertullian: Adv. Præc. c. 20). For the contents of the Old and New Testament, see CANON. OEHLER.

TETRACRAMMATON (four letters), the combination ירמיה (Jehovah), by the use of which name the miracles of Christ were said by the early opponents of Christianity to have been performed.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (also called Suevica or Argentinensis), the Confession which the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, presented to the diet of Augsburg (July 11, 1530), and, properly speaking, the first Confession of the Reformed Church. Landgrave Philipp of Hesse in vain exerted himself to bring about a union between the two branches of the reformatory movement. But the Saxon princes and theologians obstinately excluded the representatives of the cities of Southern Germany suspected of Zwinglian heresy, from all their political and theological conferences. Under such circumstances, it became necessary for them to present a confession of their own. It was drawn up by Bucer and Capito, who arrived at Augsburg a few days after the presentation, by the Saxon theologians, of the Confessio Augustana, and consists of twenty-three articles. The formal principle of the Reformation — the absolute authority of Scripture in matters of faith, which, for technical purposes, the Conf. Aug. passes by silently — is stated with great energy; and the whole instrument is distinguished for clearness and precision, with the exception of the representation of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, which is held in somewhat vague expressions, probably in order not to make a reconciliation with the Lutherans impossible. The Confession was not read before the diet; though its refutation, drawn up by Eck, Faber, and Cochleus, and full of misrepresentations and insults, was. In September, 1531, Bucer published both the confession and the confutation. See NIEMEYER: Collectio confessionum, Leipzig, 1810; SCHAEFF: Credo of Christendom, New York, 1877, vol. i., p. 521 seq.

TETRARCH (ruler of a fourth part of a kingdom, called a "tetrarchy"), according to the later Roman practice, the vassal-governor of portion of a province under the Roman sovereignty, but not necessarily of a fourth. The word "tetrarchy" first appears in connection with Philip of Macedonia's division of Thessaly into four parts (Dionysius: Phil. iii. c. 26; Strabo, 9, p. 130). The term is applied to the ruler of each of the four Celtic tribes which lived in Galatia before the Roman conquest, B.C. 189 (Pliny, 5, 42). In the New Testament the term "tetrarch" is used as synonymous with king (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; compare Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 22). It is applied to three persons, — Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1), Herod Philip (Luke iii. 1), and Lysanias (Luke iii. 1). LEYER.

TETZEL, Johann, b. at Leipzig between 1450 and 1460; d. there in July, 1519. He studied theology and philosophy at the university of his native city, entered the Dominican order in 1489, achieved some success as a preacher, and was in 1502 commissioned by the Pope to preach the jubilee indulgence. He continued in that business for the rest of his life. Though in 1512 he was sentenced to death for having seduced a married woman at Ulm, he had the sentence commuted to imprisonment for life, was then pardoned and released; and in 1517 Leo X. not only made him commissioner of indulgences for all Germany, but also inquisitor. The incredible impudence with which he carried on his business, selling full forgiveness for sins not yet committed, caused great scandal; and when Luther, in the confessional, became aware of the evil effect of the doings of the mountebank, he began to preach openly against him. Tetzel answered by lighting bonfires, suggestive of the stake. But, when Luther nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, it soon became evident to the Church of Rome, that men of another stamp than Tetzel were required for the case. It even became necessary to disavow Tetzel; and, when he discovered that Miltitz was aware of all his frauds and embezzlements, he became so frightened, that he died shortly after. His life has been written by HOFMANN (Leipzig, 1844), GRÖNE (Sorst, 1855), and [KÖRNER (Frankenburg, 1880). THACHER, Peter, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Milton, Mass., March 21, 1752; d. in Savannah, Ga., Dec. 16, 1802. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1769, and ordained minister at Malden, Mass., Sept. 19, 1770; and from January, 1785, till his death, he was pastor of the Brattle-street Church in Boston. He entered heartily into the pre-Revolutionary measures, was a member of the Provincial Congress, a delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of 1780, and often was a chaplain of the State Legislature. He was noted for eloquence, particularly in prayer and conversation. He was called "the silver-tongued" Thacher, and by Whitefield, "the young Elijah." He belonged to many New-England literary and charitable institutions. On March 5, 1776, he distinguished himself at Watertown, Mass., by the annual oration which commemorated the massacre, when he spoke against standing armies. Of his numerous publications, mostly pamphlets, may be mentioned Observations upon the present state of the clergy of New England, with strictures upon the power of dismissing them, usurped by some churches, Boston, 1783, and Memoirs of Dr. Bostington, 1789.

THADDÆUS. See JUDAS.

THAMER, Theobald, a native of Rossheim in Alsace; entered the university of Wittenberg in 1535, and was in 1543 appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church in Marburg. He was an ardent Lutheran, but the experiences he made as a field-preacher gradually led him to the conviction that the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith was a most fertile cause of immorality. By his vehement attacks on that doctrine he caused much disturbance, and was finally deposed. He went to Italy, entered the Roman-Catholic Church in 1557, and died as professor in Freiburg, May 23, 1569. See HOCHMUTH: Dr. Thameri vita et scriptis, Marburg, 1858.

THEATINES (Clerici regulares Theatini, or Cajetani, or Chietini), an order of regular clergy founded in Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century as a kind of counter-Reformation. The Pope and the higher clergy of the Roman-Catholic Church considered for a long time the Reformation a merely external incident, which could be made wholly ineffectual by re-organizing the clergy, and raising it in the estimation of the laity; and for this purpose the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene, Bishop Caraffa of Theater or Chieti (afterwards Paul IV.), and Boniface of Colle. It was confirmed by Paul III., 1540, and by Pius V., 1568. The members renounced all property. They lived neither by labor nor by beggary, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at missionary labor in Tartary, Georgia, and Circassia, but without any result. Two female orders, founded in 1583 and 1610 by Ursula Benincasa, were by Urban VIII. and Clement IX. united with them. See HELYOT: Hist. des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. NEUDECKER.

THEATRE, The, and the Church. Dramatic poetry is of heathen origin. Neither biblical authority nor biblical interdiction of the drama can be found. The Old Testament contains all other kinds of poetry — epic, lyric, didactic, and idyllic — except dramatic poetry, although in Job and the Song of Songs there are dramatic combinations. It is historically certain that the stage was introduced from the Greeks among the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes (176-164 B.C.) was the first to venture to erect a theatre at Jerusalem. Herod the Great followed his example by inviting Greek players to his court, and erecting a theatre at Cæsarea. Both these attempts to domiciliate theatrical spectacles in Judæa were met with glum opposition by the Jews. It was only one of his many characteristic surmises, when Luther called the Book of Judith a tragedy, and the Book of Tobit a comedy. In all his parables and figurative words, Christ never referred, even in the most remote way, to the theatre. The case was different with Paul, who uses in a figurative sense the term "theatre" (theatron, 1 Cor. iv. 9), as does also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and refers to the gladiatorial games. It is no wonder that the early Christians looked with horror and disgust upon the amphitheatres, in which many of their own number were given to the wild beasts, and called them the domiciles of the Devil. To these feelings, Tertullian more especially gave expression in his famous work on spectacular displays (De Spectaculis). The dramatic art he regarded as the offspring of hell, and the stage as a part of the Devil's pomp (pompæ diaboli), which the candidate for baptism must renounce forever. He was not alone in these opinions among the Church Fathers. Chrysostom courageously opposed the theatrical passion of Antioch and Constantinople, and declared the stage the house of Satan and lies, the consummation of unchastity, the Babylonian furnace, which is heated with combustible material of unchaste words and attitudes. [See Migne: Chrysost. Opera, ii. 337, 682; iv. 696, 697; vi. 266, 267; vii. 71, etc.] Augustine, after his conversion, condemned the theatre as severely (De Civ. Dei, i. 32) as he had before patronized it habitually. Cyprian not only forbade a converted actor plying his occupation, but refused to allow him to give instruction in declamation and mimicry to gain his daily bread. [The Council of Carthage in 419 forbade plays on Sundays and other sacred days of the calendar.] The Trullan Council of 692, and other councils, forbade the clergy attending the theatre. Now and then an actor was converted, like Genesius, whose confession of Christ brought him a violent death.

The Catholic Church, however, during the middle ages, adopted and transformed the heathen drama in the miracle-plays. (See RELIGIOUS DRAMAS.) The Reformers took a less favorable view of the theatre, though at first they did not oppose it. Ecolampadius in his youth composed a tragedy, Nemesis Theophrasti. Luther spoke out boldly in his Table-Talk: "Christians should not flee comedies entirely, because now and then they contain gross jokes and mimicry; for the same consideration would prevent us from reading the Bible." Calvin, in the spring of 1546, allowed some of the pious citizens of Geneva to act in a play which showed how true piety increases a people's happiness. But he opposed the frequent repetition of such plays; and Michael Cop, one of his colleagues, sternly denounced them, so that the magistrate issued a permanent edict prohibiting them in Geneva. The synod of Rochelles issued a similar edict in 1571. In 1633 the Puritan Prymme published his celebrated Hæroic-master, the Player's Scourge, against the theatre. The Jansenists, especially Nicole, were opposed to it; and it is said that Racine, who inclined to Jansenism, regretted at one time of his life having written plays. The Pietists of Germany included among the worldly pleasures which are to be shunned theatrical spectacles, although Spener made a distinction between good and bad plays. Pastor Reither of Hamburg in 1681 issued his work against the theatre, Theatromania oder Werke d. Finsterniss in den öffentlichen Schauspielen ("theatre-mania, or works of darkness in the public plays"). At a later age Jean Jacques Rousseau threw himself, with the zeal of a Puritan or Pietist, into the ranks, in opposition to the theatre, and in a tract of 1758 sternly condemned it. In Germany, Lessing opened a new period for the drama, and sought to make it a moral power; but in 1777, in a letter to his brother, he complains that actors look to their support, and care little about their art as such. Schiller and Goethe lent their powerful influence to the stage, and clergymen who would have dared to speak out against it from the pulpit were warned and checked by the civil authorities. In the present century, such writers on ethics as De Wette, Nitzsch, and Rothe, have discussed the moral side of the theatre; and the deeper study of Shakespeare and of Dante has also brought into prominence the question of dramatic representations. Without going into the question, we will content ourselves with quoting from Rothe's Ethics:—

"Our theatre certainly stands in need of a reformation from the base upwards; but the way to reach it is certainly not for Christians to denounce the stage as unchristian, and then to withdraw from it all sympathy and solicitude."

[Among the early writers of English plays in the sixteenth century were Bishops Bale and Still (Gammer Gurton's Needle, acted at Cambridge, 1566). The public interest in the theatre in Elizabeth's reign met with considerable opposition from the clergy. Archbishop Grindal advised Cecil to suppress players. The first public licence granted in England to give theatricals was granted to the servants of the Earl of Leicester in 1571. The Puritans were always opposed to the stage, but on its members of the royal family in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. figured. In 1647 Parliament suppressed the theatres, and forbade actors to exercise their vocation, under penalty of being whipped. After the restoration of the Stuarts, the theatres were again in full blast. The early Methodists shunned the theatre, as do, also, the majority of nonconformists. The most recent public discussions of the claims of the stage to the patronage of the Christian public have been carried on by the Bishop of Manchester, in England, who hopes to elevate it by such patronage, and Dr. Herrick Johnson of Chicago, who looks upon it as a school of immorality beyond the reach of reclamation.]

THEINER, Augustin, b. at Breslau, April 11, 1801; d. in Rome, Aug. 10, 1871. He studied theology, and afterwards canon law, at the university of his native city, and published, together with his brother, Die Einführung der erzwungenen Ehescheidung bei den christlichen Geistlichen (Altenburg, 1828, 2 vols.), which was put on the Index. Afterwards, however, he made his peace with Rome, entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and was in 1855, by Pius IX., appointed conservator at the papal archives. But during the Council of the Vatican he was by the Jesuits accused of procuring documents from the archives for the bishops in opposition, and removed from his position. He was a very industrious writer; published a new edition of the Annals of Baronius, with continuation, and Geschichte des Pontificats Clemens XIV., 1852; Fœdera Monarchia Poloniæ et Lithuaniæ, 1860-61, 3 vols.; Acta generalia Concilii Tridentini, 1871, 2 vols. See GISEGER: Pater Theiner, und die Jesuiten, 1875.

THEISM. Theism in its etymological and widest acceptance is a generic term for all systems of belief in the existence of the Divine. Thus understood, it includes pantheism, polytheism, and monotheism, and excludes only atheism; but this acceptance of the term is rare. Common usage has determined that theism must be identified with monotheism, and consequently opposed to polytheism and pantheism, as well as to atheism. In this sense, the one here adopted, it is the doctrine that the universe owes its existence, and continuance in existence, to the wisdom and will of a supreme, self-existent, omniscient, righteous, and benevolent Being, who is distinct from and independent of what he has created. The articles on DEISM, GOD, and INFINITY, published in previous volumes of this encyclopædia, treat more or less either of theism or of its history. To these the reader is referred, as the writer of this article wishes to avoid repeating what has already been said.

There has been much discussion as to the historical origin of theism. Herbert of Cherbury, Cudworth, Kreuzer, Ebrard, and others have learnedly argued that monotheism was the primeval form of religion. Lubbock, Tylor, and the majority of recent anthropologists, maintain that monotheism can be proved to have been everywhere preceded by polytheism. Schelling and Max Muller have held that the starting-point of religion was henotheism, an imperfect kind of monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, only because others had not yet presented themselves to the mind,—a monotheism of which polytheism was not the contradiction, but the natural development. Pantheism, the belief that all things and beings are but transient phenomena of one divine substance, the only and absolute Reality, has also been frequently represented to be the earliest phase of religion. And, when all that has been adduced in favor of these opinions is examined, there may be seen, perhaps, to be ample room for yet another opinion; namely, that the present state of our knowledge is not sufficient to enable us to determine what the primeval religion was. Science has not yet arrived at certainty as to the primitive condition of men, and until it has done so cannot pronounce with certainty as to the primitive religion of men. The Book of Genesis distinctly informs us of direct manifestations of God to the primitive man, Adam, and therefore that Adam knew God; but it does not appear to inform us how much he knew of God, and whether, for example, his knowledge was monotheistic or henotheistic.

The question as to the psychological origin of theism is, perhaps, more important than that as to its historical origin; but the two questions are scarcely separable. Some trace theism to such external agencies and media as revelation, instruction, and tradition; and these have undoubtedly been the sources of much knowledge, and of most important knowledge, regarding God and divine things; but they all imply the mind to have natural powers of knowing God, and a certain kind of affinity to divine things. A revelation in words or signs, relative to religious objects, made to a purely passive and entirely empty mind, would be meaningless. Instruction implies the exertion of powers which can understand and profit by it. Tradition can only carry what has already been originated, and will not carry far any thing to which the mind is constitutionally indifferent and uncongenial. Others refer theism to internal but entirely non-rational sources. Thus it has been traced to mere feelings,—to fear by Lucretius, to desire by Feuerbach, to the sense of dependence by Schleiermacher, etc. It is obvious, however, that all these feelings presuppose apprehensions and judgments, and are valid only in so far as they have the warrant of intelligence. Max Muller, in his Hibbert Lectures, traces the idea of God to a special faculty of religion,—“a subjective faculty for the apprehension of the infinite,” “a mental faculty, which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the infinite under different names and under varying disguises.” This view will not bear a close scrutiny. The infinite, as an implicit condition of thought, is not more involved in religions than in other thought. We cannot think any thing as finite without implying the infinite. Space cannot be thought of except as extensively, nor time except as protensively, infinite. As a condition of thought, the infinite is involved in religious knowledge, only so far as it is involved in all knowledge. On the other hand, as an explicit object of thought, it is not present in the lower forms of religion at all, which exist only because the thought of infinity is not associated in the religious consciousness with that of Deity, except where reflection is somewhat highly developed; and, even in the highest stages of religion, it is only apprehended as one aspect of Deity. Infinity is not God, but merely an attribute of the attributes of God, and not even an exclusively divine attribute. The hypothesis that the idea of God is gained by intuition or vision is proved to be erroneous by the fact that the idea of God, and the process by which it is reached, are capable of being analyzed, and therefore not simpler; and, likewise, by the variety and discordance of the ideas of God which have been actually formed. The apprehension of God seems to be only possible through a process which involves all that is essential in the human constitution,—will, intelligence, conscience, reason,—and the ideas which they supply,—cause, design, goodness, infinity. These are so connected that they may all be embraced in a single act, and coalesce into one grand issue. The theistic inference, although a complex process, is a thoroughly natural one, similar in character to the inference that there are other human minds than our own. The principles which it involves may be drawn into formal proofs, although this is a secondary operation, not essential to the validity of the inference itself. The theistic proofs constitute an organic whole of argument, each of which establishes its separate element, and thus contributes to the general result, — confirmatory evidence that God is, and complementary evidence as to what God is.

Theism, in order to be adequately understood, requires to be studied in various relationships. Thus, first, it must be viewed with reference to the nature of thought itself. Can the intellect of men attain to a knowledge of God? Is it so constituted that such a being as God is supposed to be can be apprehended either directly or indirectly, either in himself or through media? The theist must meet the agnostic, who always relies on some erroneous theory of knowledge. Further: the elaboration of theism calls for the most careful consideration of how far the chief categories of thought are applicable to God.

Then, secondly, theism must be viewed in connection with the sources of knowledge whence it is derived. These sources are the physical creation, the human mind, history, and the Bible. It is necessary to determine within what limits, and in what way, each is a source of knowledge regarding God, to trace how they are connected, and to show how they shed light on one another. A theism not based on all the sources must be seriously defective. A theism drawn even from the Bible alone must be, in so far as exclusive, both unreasonable and unscriptural; unreasonable, because the special revelation of God in Scripture, while completing and crowning the general revelation of God in nature, mind, and history, throughout implies it, and is without meaning apart from it; and unscriptural, because the Bible explicitly accepts and assimilates the revelation through nature. The God of the Bible is at the commencement of the Scripture records identified with the God of creation, the Author of man, and the Disposer of history. In almost every page the Bible refers its readers to the revelation of God in nature, mind, and society. It is therefore distinctly to disregard its own teaching to attempt to derive a doctrine as to God from it alone, or to the exclusion of any of the sources of knowledge of God.

Thirdly, theism must be compared and contrasted with other forms of religion. The respects in which it differs from animism, polytheism, pantheism, and deism, must be indicated; and it must be shown whether or not the differences are in its favor, whether or not they are necessary to true and worthy conceptions of God and of religion. In opposition to animism, theism claims for the Divine freedom and intelligence; in opposition to polytheism, unity, self-existence, and independence; in opposition to pantheism, transcendence and personality; in opposition to deism, an all-presence and activity, etc. The theist has to show that it, in consequence, responds better to the demands of the intellect, affections, and conscience, than any other phase of religion.

leads to results which seem ultimate to reason, but only to results beyond which the method of the science does not carry us. The view of the constitution of matter with which chemistry must be content to close its inquiries is no more self-explanatory than the one with which it began them. The laws of development reached by biology are as mysterious as were the facts which have been reduced under them. Is reason to affirm that the sciences lead to unreason, or merely that the special methods of each science carry us only so far, and that the conclusions of the sciences are data of philosophy, and also of natural theology?

Fifthly, the relationship of theism to philosophy has to be determined. If there be no philosophy except a phenomenalism or positivism which rests on criticism and agnosticism, there can clearly be no theism, no theology of any kind. The materialism which proclaims itself a monism, and therefore a philosophy, not only transcends science as much as any theological doctrine, but contravenes the findings of science. A philosophy which rises above such materialism must necessarily be, to some extent, a religious philosophy. It will find that there are only two plausible ways of conceiving the first or ultimate principle, — the monotheistic or the pantheistic. The theist has to show that the only satisfaction of philosophical reason is to be found in the personal God of his religious faith. The philosophical view and the religious view of the universe must harmonize, and even coalesce, in a comprehensive theism.

A history of theism embraces (1) A survey of heathen thought regarding God so far as it has approximated to the theistic idea. HEGEL'S Philosophy of Religion, BUNSEN'S God in History, FREEMAN CLARKE'S Ten Great Religions, the ST. GILES Lectures on the Faiths of the World, still more, the series of Sacred Books of the East, and of ancient texts published under the title of Records of the Past, etc., will be found useful to those wishing to make such a survey. (2) A view of the progress of the idea of God from the beginning to the end of the biblical record of revelation. To attain such a view is an entirely biblico-theological task, with which all treatises of biblical theology are more or less occupied. The second volume of EWALD'S Doctrine of the Bible concerning God is entirely devoted to the theme. (3) An account of the development of theistic thought in the Christian world. The best published account is that contained in the last three volumes of R. BOURN'S Storia della Filosofia rispetto alla Conoscenza di Dio da Talete fino ai Giorni Nostri, Lecce, 1873. The literature has been so far indicated in the articles on DEISM, GOD, etc.; and it is so extensive, that a more general view cannot usefully be attempted. THEOCRACY, the "rule of God," in contradistinction to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, etc., was first applied by Josephus to designate the peculiar state organization of the Jews. As the Mosaic law was at once the direct expression of the will of God and the civil law of the people. God was, indeed, the ruler of the Jewish state. The name may, however, justly be applied to any people occupying the same stage of political development; that one, namely, at which no distinction has as yet been reached between religious and civil legislation.

THEODICY (from theos, "God," and dike, "justice") denotes a vindication of God's wisdom and goodness in the creation and government of the world, in spite of seeming imperfections and the actual existence of evil. The Book of Job may be mentioned as an attempt of the kind, though its true philosophical form the theodicy did not obtain until LEIBNITZ'S Essais de Théodicée, Amsterdam, 1747. Later attempts are, TH. BALGUY: Divine Benevolence Vindicated, London, 1782; J. G. K. WERDERMANN: Neuer Versuch zur Theodicy, Leipzig, 1784-93; T. F. BENEDICT: Theodicya, Annaburg, 1822; A. VON SCHADEN: Theodice, Carlsruhe, 1842; H. L. C. MARET: Théodicée chrétienne, Paris, 1857; J. YOUNG: Evil and God, London, 1861, 2d ed.

THEODORA is the name of two Byzantine empresses who have exercised considerable influence on the history of the Greek Church.—I. Theodora, b. 508; d. June 12, 548; the wife of Justinian I., 527-565. She was a native of Cyprus, but came early in life to Constantinople with her parents. Her father was a bear-trainer. She herself became an actress, and that of the worst possible notoriety. She accompanied Heccebolus as his concubine, when he was made prefect of the African Pentapolis; but she was soon after dismissed, and she returned to Constantinople in a state of destitution. She profited, however, by the experience, became studious of decent appearances, and having incidentally become acquainted with Justinian, the heir-apparent to the throne, she completely captivated him by her beauty, her many social charms, and her real mental superiority. After the death of the Empress Euphemia, he married her (525), and after his accession to the throne he made her co-regent. Justinian hated the Monophysites, and considered it one of the great objects of his reign to carry through the ordinances of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Nevertheless, Theodora succeeded in having a Monophysite, Anthimus, appointed Patriarch of Jerusalem in 535; and when Anthimus was deposed in the following year, on account of the denunciations of Agapetus, Bishop of Rome, she succeeded in giving Agapetus himself a Monophysite successor, Vigilius, in 536. As soon, however, as Vigilius had come in possession of the Roman chair by the intrigues of Theodora and the armed aid of Belisarius, he withdrew from the alliance; and his Monophysitism remained a secret, or at least a private affair. Only in the Three-Chapter controversy she compelled him to play an open game, to recognize Maceas as Patriarch of Constantinople, and to promise to preside over a synod to be convened in Constantinople. She died, however, before the council met. See J. P. DE LUDWIG: Vita Justiniani et Theodora, Halle, 1731; PH. INVERNIZZI: De rebus gestibus Justiniani, Rome, 1783; GIBBON: History.—II. Theodora, the wife of Theophilus (829-842). Theophilus was an iconoclast; and the rigorism, not to say cruelty, with which he enforced his various measures against image-worship, produced great excitement in the numerous monasteries, whose monks chiefly lived by the manufacture of images. Before his death, he confided the regency, during the minority of his son, to his wife Theodora, her brother Bardas, the general Manuel, and the chancellor Theoctistus. But Theodora was an ardent image-worshipper. She immediately gave freedom of conscience, which, however, she herself interpreted in a very partial manner, not only calling back those image-worshippers who had been banished by Theophilus, but also expelling all the iconoclasts whom he had appointed. Thus the Patriarch of Constantinople, Johannes Grammaticus, was deposed, and a monk, Methodius, a fanatical image-worshipper, appointed in his stead. In 842 she convened a synod in Constantinople, which restored the images to the churches throughout the realm, and instituted an annual festival, the feast of orthodoxy, in commemoration of the act. At the same time she renewed the persecutions against the Paulicians; but as the latter formed a very powerful party, and, for their defence, entered into alliance with the Saracens, a war ensued, in which several of the fairest provinces of the empire were laid waste. More considerate was her policy with respect to the Bulgarians, whose conversion to Christianity was effected in 862 by Cyrilus and Methodius. In the mean time, her son, Michael III., had grown up in complete ignorance, a prey to his own unbridled passions and corrupt caprices; and a conspiracy between him and Bardas compelled her to lay down the sceptre, and retire into private life. She was suspected, however, by her own son, and shut up in a monastery, where she died shortly after, in 855. See the literature under IMAGE-WORSHIP. KLIPPEL.

THEODORE is the name of two popes.—Theodore I. (642-649) was a Greek by birth. As a decided adversary of the Monothelites, he excommunicated Paulus, the Patriarch of Constantinople in 645, and recognized Pyrrhus, who, deposed himself as a Monothelite, had recanted in Rome. When restored to his see, Pyrrhus returned to Monothelism, and Theodore then also excommunicated him. In 649 he convened a synod in Rome, which condemned the Typus. He wrote an Epistola synodica ad Paulum, and an Exemplar propositionis . . . adversus Pyrrhum. See the art. MONOTHELITES.—Theodore II. (897) was a Roman by birth. He reigned only twenty days.

THEODORE, St., was, according to Gregory of Nyssa (Opera, Paris, 1615, tom. ii. p. 1002) a Syrian or Armenian by birth, and served in the Roman army when the persecution of Maximin and Galerius began. Discovered, and brought before the Pagan court, he refused to recant, was sentenced to death, and burnt. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Feb. 17, by the Roman on Nov. 19.

THEODORE, surnamed Craptus, b. in Jerusalem; educated in the monastery of St. Saba, and ordained a presbyter there; was in 818 sent to Constantinople by the Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, in order to defend the worship of images, and that he did, so regardless of circumstances, that he was thrice scourged and banished, the last time to Apamea in Bithynia, where he died. A Nicephori Disputatio written by him, a letter from Bishop John of Cyzicum, telling us about his sufferings, and a life of him, are found in Comptes Orig. Constantinop. p. 159, together with fragments of a larger work, De jud. orthodoxis contra Iconomachos. GASS.

THEODORE LECTOR, one of the last of the Old Greek Church historians; was lector in the Church of Constantinople in 525. He wrote a Historia Tripartita,—extracts from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; but it has never been published. Of much importance was a second work by him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments of it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Nilus, and Nicephorus Callisti: they have been published in Paris, 1541, and at Canterbury, by G. Reading, 1720. GASS.

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, b. at Antioch about 350; d. at Mopsuestia, in Cilicia secunda, 428 or 429; one of the chief leaders of the Antiochian school of theology. As a preparation for a juridical career, he studied philosophy and rhetoric under the famous Libanius, but at the same time he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom; and the religious enthusiasm of the latter induced him to devote his life to Christian philosophy and asceticism. Soon after, however, he repented of the change, and meditated a return to his former occupation; but the reproaches and admonitions of his friend finally decided him (see Chrysostom: Ad Theod. lapsum). His biblical studies he made under Diodorus the presbyter, afterwards bishop of Tarsus; indeed, his whole character as a theologian was modelled by Diodorus. He was ordained a presbyter in the Church of Antioch, and as a teacher in the school he soon acquired a great reputation. John, afterwards bishop of Antioch, Theodoret, and perhaps, also, Nestorius, were among his pupils. In 392 he was elected bishop of Mopsuestia; and in 391 he was present at a synod in Constantinople, where the emperor, Theodosius I., is said to have been very much impressed by his preaching. Throughout the whole Eastern Church his name had a great weight; even Cyril of Alexandria, to whom he sent his Commentary on Job, felt the greatest esteem for him. Nor did the attitude he assumed in the Pelagian controversy in any way impair his authority. It was not until the outbreak of the Nestorian controversy, and the clash between the christology of the Antiochian school and that of the Alexandrian school, that his name came into bad odor; but he died just as the controversy began.

Theodore was a very prolific writer. A great number of his works were devoted to the interpretation of Scripture. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, Job, the four Gospels, the Acts, and the Pauline Epistles; but, unfortunately, only his Commentary on the Minor Prophets—which, however, is very instructive with respect to his exegetical method—has come down to us in its original Greek text. A Latin Commentary on the minor Pauline Epistles, which Pitra has published under the name of Hilary of Poitiers, is now generally considered as belonging to Theodore; and extracts of his other commentaries have been collected by Wegmann, A. Mai, and Fritzsche, from the catena. Under the influence of the Alexandrian school, the mystico-allegorical interpretation of Scripture prevailed throughout the Greek Church, more especially the christological interpretation of the Old Testament, totally neglecting the organic connection and all historical relations. In opposition to this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus of Tarsus, placed a simple, direct interpretation, based on the given historical conditions; not that he, for instance, denied the idea of prophecy, but he confined its application within very narrow limits, outside of which he ascribed to it only a typical designation. Thus he referred all the messianic Psalms, with the exception of three, to Zerubbabel and Hezekiah, and denied altogether that the Old Testament knew any thing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as forming the Trinity. Equally free was his treatment of the canon. He distinguished between historical, prophetic, and pedagogical books; and the last group (Job, the Solomonian writings) he criticised without reserve. The Canticles he rejected altogether, and spoke of with great contempt.

It took some time before the Pelagian controversy, which originated in the West, reached the East, and at first it made no deep impression there. Nevertheless, there came a moment when Theodore felt compelled to make an open attack on the Augustinian doctrine of hereditary sin; and he wrote his book Against those who say that man falls by nature, and not by sentence. The book itself has perished; but Marius Mercator has preserved some fragments of it in Latin translation; and Photius, who had read it, gives a summary of its contents. It was directed against Augustine, but addressed to Jerome. The latter is very plainly indicated by allusions to his translation of the Bible, his journey to the East, etc.; and the circumstance that he had spread the new heresy in Syria; by writing books in its defence was the very cause of Theodore's interference. Theodore absolutely rejects such propositions as these,—that man, originally created good and immortal, became bad and mortal by Adam's sin; that sin now has its origin in human nature, and not in the will of man; that newly born infants are tainted by sin, and must obtain forgiveness by baptism, and eating the Lord's Supper; that marriage and generation are the evil results of an evil nature, etc. According to Marius Mercator and Photius, he even went so far as to assert that man was created mortal by God, and that the doctrine of death as a punishment of sin is a mere fiction invented for the purpose of sharpening man's hatred of sin. In his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans he expresses himself very cautiously on this point; and, though he does not directly deviate from the Pauline doctrine of the relation between sin and death, he evidently considered the history of the human race so closely connected with the general development of the world, that death became to his eyes a necessary and indispensable transition in human existence. At a later date, Julian of Eclanum, and other Pelagians who were expelled from Italy, found refuge with him. It is therefore a mistake to say, that at a provincial council he took part in the condemnation of Pelagianism.

The exegetical principle of Theodore, as well as the position he took in the Pelagian controversy, gives a preliminary idea of his christological views. While presbyter of Antioch, he wrote fifteen books on the incarnation, and a special work against Eunomius. Thirty years later on, as bishop of Mopsuestia, he wrote a work against Apollinaris. These books have perished, with the exception of a few fragments; but we know that he was the true representative of the speculative theology of the Antiochian school, and that, in contradistinction to the Alexandrian school, he emphasized in his christology the completeness of the human nature of Christ, and its indelible difference from his divine nature. It was, however, not he, but Nestorius, who was destined to carry this view to its last consequences, and fight for it in the world. At the Council of Ephesus (431) no one dared to attack Theodore directly; and, though open attacks were made upon him shortly after by Marius Mercator and Rabulus of Edessa, it took more than a century before the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in weaning the Eastern Church from its great teacher, and branding his name with the stamp of heresy. See NESTORIUS and THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY.

THEODORET, b. at Antioch towards the close of the fourth century; d. at Cyrrus, or Cyrrhus, the capital of the Syrian province of Cyrrhestica, 457. He was educated in the monastery of St. Euprepius, near Antioch; ordained a deacon by Bishop Porphyrius; and elected bishop of Cyrrus in 120 and 123. As a pupil of Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, he joined at the synod of Ephesus (431) the minority which deposed Cyril; but by the robber-synod of Ephesus (449) he was himself deposed, and banished to the monastery of Apamea. By the synod of Chalcedon, however (451), he was again restored to his see. He was a very prolific writer. Exegetical, historical, polemical, and dogmatical works, sermons, and letters by him, still exist. But his principal work is his Church History, comprising the period from 325 to 129, translated into French by Mathee (Poitiers, 1514). The first collected edition of his works was published by Sirmoid (Paris, 1612, 1 vol., fol.), to which was added in 1681 a fifth by Harbouin, containing, among other things, his life by Garnier. There are also editions by Schulze (Halle, 1769-71, 4 vols.) and Migne (Paris, 1859-60, 5 vols.). See ROOS: De Theodoret Clementis et Eusebii compilatore, Halle, 1883, 69 pp.; A. BERTRAM: Theodoretus episcopi Cyrensis, doctrina christologica, Hildesheim, 1885.

THEODOSIUS (I.) THE GREAT, Emperor of the East, Jan. 19, 379-Jan. 17, 395. He was a native of Spain, b. at Cauca in 316. He was educated in the camp; and it was his military exploits which induced Gratian to accept him as co-regent, and leave him the eastern part of the empire. Nevertheless, he exercised as great an influence on the religious as on the political affairs of the realm. He belonged to the orthodox party, and one year after his accession to the throne (Feb. 28, 380) he issued a decree which declared the Nicene Confession the only true and catholic one, and threatened with severe punishment any deviations from it. Immediately after his entrance in Constantinople, he deposed the bishop, Demophilus, one of the leaders of the Arians, and banished him from the city; and, in spite of the riots of the Arian populace, he gave all the churches of the capital to the orthodox, and put a heavy penalty on the celebration, even in private, of Arian service. In spring, 381, he convened a synod in Constantinople, — the second oecumenical council, consisting of a hundred and fifty picked bishops. The thirty-six bishops belonging to the semi-Arian group, and forming the party of Macedonius, were at once brought to silence; and the council confirmed the Nicene Creed, adding the new clause of the procession of the Holy Spirit. The decrees of the council were followed by a number of imperial edicts depriving Christians who relapsed into Paganism of the right of making a will, or inheriting a bequest, confiscating the property of the Manicheans unless they allowed their children to be educated in the Catholic faith, and forbidding the Eunomians and the Arians to build churches, and celebrate service. He also exercised considerable influence on the religious affairs of the West, especially after the overthrow of Maximus in 388, and the establishment of Valentinian II., and still more especially after the crushing of the rebellion of Arbogast in 392, and the establishment of Honorius. He was a friend of Ambrose, and accepted with meekness a very severe rebuke from him. In order to avenge the assassination of Botericius, his governor in Thessalonica, he allowed over seven thousand mostly innocent people to be massacred (April, 390); but, when Ambrose heard of his cruelty, he denied the emperor access to the church until due penance was done. In Alexandria he ordered, and in other places he allowed, the Pagan temples to be destroyed; and certain forms of Pagan worship — sacrifice, investigation of the future, etc. — he absolutely forbade, even under penalty of death. See FLECHIER: Histoire de Th. le Grand, Paris, 1680; P. ERASMUS MÖLLER: Comment. de Theod., Göttingen, 1797-98; SUFFKEN: De Theod., Lyons, 1828; GÜLDENPENNING U. THEODODION. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 281.

THEODULPH, surnamed Aurelianensis, one of those men whom Charlemagne invited from Italy to France for the advancement of science and art in the latter country. He was probably a Goth by descent. He came to Gaul at the latest in 781, and was made abbot of Fleury, and afterwards bishop of Orleans, where he died in 821. His literary character is not unlike that of Alcuin. He was a poet and a theologian. His theological works consist of minor treatises: De ordine baptismi, De spiritu sancto, etc., and capitularia for his priests, which show that he was very anxious for the establishment of schools. His poems were edited by Sirmund, Paris, 1646. His collected works are found in Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. 105. [See H. HAGEN: Theodulfi episcopi Arelatensis de iudiciis versus cogniti, Bern, 1882, 31 pp.]

THEOGNOSTUS is mentioned by Philippus of Sida as being catechist in the school of Alexandria in the second half of the third century. See DODWELL: Dissert. in Iren., Oxford, 1689. According to Photius (c. 106), he belonged to the party of Origen, and wrote a large speculative work on the general scheme of loci. The fragments of his works which have come down to us are found in ROUTH: Reliquiæ Sacr., iii. p. 221.

THEOLOGIA GERMANICA is the name of a little book first discovered and published by Luther. The first edition, of 1516, contains only about one-fourth of the whole work; but the second, of 1518, is complete, and bears the title Eyn Deutsch Theologia, which has ever since continued in use. Wherever the book went, it made friends, except in Rome, where it was put on the Index. No less than seventy editions of it have been required up to the present time. It has been translated into High and Low German, Dutch, English, French, Walloon, and Latin. Up to our day, however, all editions were made from the same manuscript which Luther used; but in the middle of the present century another and more complete manuscript was discovered in Würzburg, and published by F. Pfeiffer, Stuttgart, 1851, 3d ed., Gutersloh, 1855. [The best English translation is that by Susanna Winkworth, London, 1851, new ed. 1871.] It is not known who is the author of this book; but it appears from the book itself that he was a priest, and custos in the Deutschherrn-Hause in Franfort, and a member of the "Friends of God." The character of the book corresponds closely with that of the works of Eckart, Tauler, and Suso, urging the sacrifice of one's own self, with all its deceptions and vanities, in order to better fulfil the will of God. See LISCO: Die Heilslehre der Theologia Deutsch, Stuttgart, 1857, and PFEIFFER (above).

JULIUS HAMBERGER.
THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. Among the ancient Hebrews, from the time of Samuel on, there were schools of the prophets, in which young men were trained for the office of public instruction. (See EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS.) The sons of priests were trained in the temple service for their subsequent duties. At a later date the synagogues were the schools of the Jews. The apostles received their special training, first in the school of John the Baptist, and then in that of Christ. Paul alone had a rabbinical education. The necessity of special training was felt early in the Christian Church, not only for the conduct of worship, but the opposition of error, and, above all, the Pagan religion. The first instruction was given, probably, in the local churches, by their bishops; but, at the close of the second century, there existed at Alexandria a theological seminary, the first of its kind, in which students were drilled in Christian apologetics, and guided in the study of the Scriptures. It is known as the catechetical school of Alexandria. Its primary purpose was to prepare catechumens for baptism; but it answered a wider design, and instructed those already Christians. The first known superintendent of this school is Pantaenus, but the most famous are Clement and Origen. At first the school had only one teacher, then two or more, but without fixed salary or special buildings. The more wealthy pupils paid for tuition, but the offer was often declined. The teachers gave instructions in their dwellings, generally after the style of the ancient philosophers. Origen established a similar school at Caesarea. The discussions in the Alexandrian Church put an end to the school at the close of the fourth century.

Next in point of time and importance comes the school of Antioch, which was founded about 290 by the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucian. In opposition to Alexandrian allegorizing, it developed a severe grammatico-historical exegesis. Its most eminent members are Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius. In Edessa, Ephrem Syrus (d. 378) founded a school, and continued the methods of Antioch. It furnished ministers for Mesopotamia and Persia.

In the West the priests were trained in cloisters and private episcopal schools. The Roman Church has continued to train her clergy in this fashion. Several of the most learned Fathers, such as Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, and Augustine, were educated in heathen schools, and then studied theology, either in ascetic retirement or under some distinguished church-teacher.

In the middle age the cloister schools were the sole centres of learning until the universities arose at Paris, Oxford, Cologne, and elsewhere. In them the theological faculty ranked first, and dominated the others. In England, John Wiclif (d. 1384) had a seminary at Oxford, and later at Lutterworth, in which he trained the "poor priests," who disseminated Lollard doctrine all over the land. The Reformers were university trained men. The ministry of the Protestant churches of most denominations has always been distinguished for its education. On the Continent, theology in all its branches is taught as a department of the university. The theological students are on a par with those of the other faculties. The professors are members of the university corps, but constitute a separate faculty. In the great English universities those who contemplate entering holy orders read with a professor, and are examined by a bishop's chaplain. There is no regular theological faculty, and no theological department, though there are theological professors. Independent of the universities, there are, however, eighteen theological schools connected with the Church of England, under the supervision of bishops. In Scotland the Established Church has regular theological faculties at its four universities,—Glasgow, Edinburgh, St. Andrews, and Aberdeen. The Free Church has three "theological halls," as they are called,—at New College, Edinburgh, with seven professors; at Glasgow, with four; and at Aberdeen, with four. The United Presbyterian Church has its "hall" at Edinburgh, with four professors. The Presbyterians of England have a "theological college" in London; those of Ireland, one in Belfast, and another in Derry. The Wesleyans have in Great Britain seven theological schools, the Congregationalists fourteen, the Baptists nine, and the Roman Catholics twenty-six. All these are supported by voluntary subscriptions.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES. Sketches of (arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order, and chronologically under each). Each sketch is prepared by a professor or secretary of the institution. Some sketches are anticipated in earlier arts.

1. Baptist. (1) HAMILTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated in Hamilton, N.Y., a suburban village of rare beauty and healthfulness, distinguished as an educational centre among Baptists, where in one system of schools are trained one-tenth of all ministerial students of that denomination in the United States. The seminary was founded in 1819 by far-sighted pioneers, who were actuated by a profound conviction, then widely felt, of the necessity of higher education for the ministry. It is the oldest Baptist seminary in the country, has sent out the largest number of students, and, by reason of its pronounced religious and missionary character, has been most intimately identified with the history and growth of American Baptists for the past sixty years. Its impress upon alumni is claimed to show the following characteristics,—a biblical theology, an educative pulpit, a missionary spirit, and remarkable adaptation to the varied phases of real life. The course of study embraces six departments under as many regular professors, with series of lectures by other eminent scholars, and covers a period of three years, with abundant provision for special students. The seminary owns a domain of a hundred and thirty acres, on which are several residences, two large four-story school-buildings, and a site for another finer structure, which is to be speedily erected. Its financial condition is excellent. Productive funds insure the payment of all salaries and current expenses. Numerous scholarships, and generous contributions from the churches, provide for the needs of indigent students. Carefully selected working libraries are accessible, to the extent of 20,000 volumes. The presidents have been, Rev. Drs. D. Hascall, N. Kendrick, J. S. Maginnis, G. W. Eaton, and E. Dodge, the present head. The chairs of instruction have been occupied by such eminent teachers as Barnas Sears, Thomas J. Conant, Asahel C. Kendrick, A. N. Arnold, David Weston, A. M. Beebe, H. Harvey, and W. H. Maynard. H. S. LOYD (Secretary).

(2) NEWTON THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION. See art. by Dr. Hovey, vol. ii. p. 1642.

(3) ROCHESTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—This institution was established at Rochester, N.Y., in 1850. It is supported and controlled by Baptist churches, and is strictly a professional school for the higher education of candidates for the Christian ministry. The seminary has no organic connection with the University of Rochester, either in management or instruction, though both institutions were founded at about the same time, and largely through the same instrumentalities.

The influence and characteristics of the seminary during the first twenty years of its history are due, more than to any other one man, to Ezekiel G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., for many years instructor in both homiletics and systematic theology. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Conant, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus Strong, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Osgood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Pattison, D.D., Rev. Adellbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin O. True.

The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1851. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department.

A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution. They have come from sixty-five colleges, and from forty-two states and countries. Among them are pastors in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, in the Southern States, and on the Pacific coast. Forty have been professors in colleges and theological seminaries, and about the same number have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1868 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1869 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph B. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to about $450,000. The land and buildings are valued at $125,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works.

Subscription to creeds or to formal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

(1) THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was established in 1859 at Greenville, S.C., and removed in 1877 to Louisville, Ky. Its plan of instruction is quite peculiar, all the studies being elective. In 1856 Rev. James P. Boyce, D.D., in a published address entitled Three Changes in our Theological Institutions, urged that provision should be made in the same institution to give the most extensive and thorough theological course to those desiring and prepared for it, and at the same time a good theological course to those who can study only the English Scriptures, and also opportunity for any student to select special studies at will. This was considered necessary to meet the wants of the Baptist ministry, which includes men of all grades of general education.

In order to fulfil these conditions, the whole range of theological study was divided into eight independent schools, some of them having two separate departments: as Old-Testament English and Hebrew, New-Testament English and Greek, Systematic Theology English and Latin. Among these schools and departments, each student selects, under the guidance of the professors, according to his preparation, and the number of years he can give to theological studies. Some remain only one session (of eight months); others, two, three, four, or even five years. A separate diploma is given in each school to those who have pursued its studies, and have passed very thorough written examinations, intermediate and final. Those who have been thus graduated in all the schools receive at last the diploma of "full graduate;" and those graduated in all except the departments of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Theology, receive the diploma of "English graduate." Some of the students thus pursue an unusually extensive course, such as would not be possible where there is the same curriculum for all. It is noticed that all alike elect to attend the "English" classes in the Bible and theology, the most scholarly finding these highly profitable along with their more erudite studies.

Beginning in 1859 with a good endowment (subscribed by Southern planters) and a large attendance, the seminary was suspended, 1862-63, by the war, and began again in 1865 with seven students and no endowment, the private bonds being then valueless. It has lived, through great exertions and sacrifices, with a steadily increasing attendance, till, in 1882-83, there were a hundred and twenty students from twenty different States. The invested endowment has reached over $200,000, besides $50,000 in real estate. Most of this has been contributed at the South, but several friends in New-York City and elsewhere have given very generous assistance.

The professors have been James P. Boyce, D.D. (since 1859), chairman of the faculty, John A. Broadus, D.D. (since 1859), Basil Maury, D.D. (1859-71) and since 1879), Crawford H. Toy, D.D. (1869-79), William H. Whititt, D.D. (since 1872), William Williams, D.D. (1859-77, when he died), Rev. G. W. Riggan, assistant instructor (since 1881). JOHN A. BROADUS, Professor.

(5) THE BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL UNION, located at Chicago, was organized in 1863, its object being to establish and sustain a theological seminary. In 1865 W. W. Cook of Whitehall, N.Y., and Lawrence Barnes and Mial Davis of Burlington, Vt., pledged fifteen hundred dollars per year, for five years, for the support of a professor. Instruction was given, under this encouragement, to about one dozen students, in 1866, by Dr. N. Colver and Rev. J. C. C. Clark, in the building of the Chicago University.

In September, 1866, Rev. G. W. Northrup, D.D., professor of church history in the Rochester Theological Seminary, was invited to the presidency, and professorship of systematic theology; and Rev. J. B. Jackson, D.D., of Albion, N.Y., was chosen to the chair of church history. They accepted the appointments, and entered on their duties in October, 1867, when the seminary was fully organized, and commenced its work with twenty students. In the early years of its history the seminary found most liberal helpers in C. N. Holden and C. B. Goodyear of Chicago, and J. Warren Merrill of Boston. In 1869 the first seminary building was erected in Chicago.

In 1873 a Scandinavian department was organized, under the care of Rev. J. A. Edgren. It began with four students. In 1882-83 the number had increased to twenty-eight.

In 1877 the institution was removed to Morgan Park, a suburb eight miles south of Chicago. Here the seminary has a beautiful site of five acres, and one commodious building. It is proposed eventually to use the present building for dormitories exclusively, and to add three others, — one for the Scandinavian department, one for the library, and one for chapel and lecture-rooms. Beside the teachers already mentioned, the following professors have been members of the faculty, — Rev. A. N. Arnold, D.D., Rev. William Hague, D.D., G. W. Warren, Rev. E. C. Mitchell, D.D., Rev. R. E. Pattison, D.D., Rev. T. J. Morgan, D.D., Rev. J. R. Boise, D.D., L. L. D., W. R. Harper, Ph.D., Rev. E. B. Hulbert, D.D., Rev. J. A. Smith, D.D., Rev. N. P. Jensen.

Dr. G. W. Northrup has been president from the beginning, and conducted the affairs of the seminary with distinguished ability.

Rev. G. S. Bailey, D.D., was financial secretary from 1867 to 1875, and was succeeded by Rev. T. W. Goodspeed, D.D., in 1876.

The growth of the seminary has been rapid from the beginning. The first year there were twenty students; the second year, twenty-five; and, with occasional fluctuation, this rate of increase has continued through sixteen years, the number of students in 1882-83, reaching ninety-four. Being the only Baptist theological seminary in the West, it seems destined to attract increasing numbers of students every year.

The library numbers about 20,000 volumes, and is of great value.

In 1880 the endowment of the seminary was about $50,000. In 1881 E. Nelson Blake of Chicago, long a most liberal friend of the institution, subscribed $30,000, on condition that the amount be increased to $100,000. The effort to do this was successful. In 1883 J. D. Rockefeller of Cleveland subscribed $40,000, on similar conditions. The completion of this subscription gives the seminary a living endowment. T. W. GOODSPEED (see 5).

H. Congregational. (1) ANDOVER. See art. by Professor Park, vol. I, p. 81.

(2) BANGOR THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in February, 1811. It was designed to provide an evangelical ministry for the State, then the District, of Maine. It was originally located at Hampden on the Penobscot River, where it began its work in October, 1816. The founders of the seminary had especially in view the needs of students desirous of entering the ministry without a previous college-training. Accordingly the original course of study occupied four years; the first two chiefly devoted to literary and classical studies, and the last two to the strictly theological branches. In 1849 the institution was removed to Bangor, at the head of navigation on the Penobscot, then a town of twelve hundred inhabitants. In 1820 the first class, numbering six students, was graduated. In the same year the District was separated from Massachusetts, and became the State of Maine. It was in territory larger than the rest of New England, and had a population of three hundred thousand, largely of Puritan descent. In 1827 the classical department was given up, the period of study reduced to three years, and the curriculum made similar to that of other theological institutions in this country.

During the sixty-seven years of its existence, the seminary has numbered among its instructors not a few men eminent for piety, scholarship, and influence. Not to speak of any still living, mention may be made of Jehudi Ashmun, afterwards distinguished by his labors in the service of the American Colonization Society; the scholarly and accomplished Leonard Woods, jun., afterwards president of Bowdoin College; George Shepard, so widely known and eminent as a pulpit-orator; and Enoch Pond, to whom, more than any other man, the success of the institution was due, and who for fifty years was connected with it as professor and president.

The seminary has sent out more than six hundred graduates, and given a partial theological education to nearly two hundred more. These men have made a faithful and useful body of workers. The majority of them are still living, and are at their posts all over the land, or laboring in foreign countries, in pulpits of many denominations and every grade of eminence.

The seminary has been from the first connected with the Congregational denomination, its board of trustees and faculty being members of Congregational churches. Its aim, however, has always been practically Christian, rather than denominational. Its founders favored the type of theology known as "New-England theology," but Bangor has never been identified with any particular school or system. At present the seminary draws its students, not only from Maine and other parts of New England, but also from the Dominion of Canada, especially the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The faculty as now constituted numbers five professors. The number of students in attendance has varied from twenty to fifty.

(4) THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF CONNECTICUT (now usually known as HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), the fourth in age, and second in number of students, among Congregational seminaries in the United States. Established in 1834 at East Windsor Hill, Conn.; the laying of the corner-stone of the building, and the inauguration of Dr. Tyler (see art. BENNET TYLER), taking place May 13. Removed to Hartford in 1865, where a commodious building was erected through the munificence of Mr. James B. Hosmer. The corner-stone of Hosmer Hall was laid in May, 1879, and the building occupied early in 1880. The appointments and arrangements of the edifice are admirably adapted for its purpose. The library-building is connected with the main hall; the chapel, recitation-rooms, dormitories, dining-hall, etc., are under the same roof; the well-equipped gymnasium is a detached building. For an account of the origin of the institute, see art. BENNET TYLER. The Pastoral Union of Connecticut chooses ten trustees annually (since 1870 one-third retire each year); the former body elects its own members, who are required to subscribe its creed, to which the professors give their assent annually. The three professors first chosen were Bennett Tyler, D.D., Jonathan Cogswell, D.D., and William Thompson, D.D. The last-named survives, and continued in active service until 1881, when he became professor emeritus. There are at present (1885) five active professors, an instructor in music and voice-building, and one in gymnastics. A course of lectures on the Carew foundation is given each year.

The number of students in all amounts to 495; at present there are 53 in attendance. Twenty-eight graduates have become foreign missionaries. The theological position of the seminary has from the beginning been Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formularies of New-England Congregationalism. The present faculty recognize, more fully than did the founders of the institute, the exegetical and historical point of view; but the doctrinal result is substantially the same. The views on the doctrine of original sin are probably more Augustinian than those of Dr. Tyler; and the entire range of theological science is now regarded, in its higher unity, as centring in the person and work of Christ.

The methods of instruction are less formal than in many institutions,—fewer lectures and more constant drill, together with a greater demand for individual labor on the part of the students.

The chief benefactor of the seminary has been Mr. James B. Hosmer, who not only gave the present building, and endowed the chair of New-Testament exegesis, but left a considerable sum to the general fund. In the early years of the institute, annual contributions of small sums were made by many persons who were in sympathy with its aims. Recently Mr. Newton Case of Hartford has given largely to increase the library, which now numbers over 35,000 volumes, many of them rare and valuable. It is particularly rich in editions of ancient codices, early printed New Testaments, patristic literature, and works of the sixteenth century. The collection of periodical literature, especially of missionary intelligence, is large and increasing. M. B. RIDGLEY (Professor).

(6) THE CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY dates its existence from the fall of 1851. It was the first of the four denominational seminaries located at Chicago, or in its vicinity, and had its origin in a deep and widespread conviction that the time had come when the churches of the West should more largely provide and educate their own ministers. After several preliminary conferences, it was organized Sept. 26, 1851, by a convention, called for that purpose, of delegates from the Congregational churches of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Missouri. It was made directly responsible to the churches by being placed under the general supervision of triennial conventions, composed of the Congregational ministers, and one delegate from each of the Congregational churches in the States and Territories west of Ohio, and east of the Rocky Mountains. These triennial conventions elect the board of twenty-four directors and the board of twelve visitors, under whose direct control the seminary is placed, and who, by the requirements of its constitution, must be members of some Congregational church within the bounds of its constituency. The members of these boards hold their office for six years, and are eligible for re-election.

The seminary was thus, from the first, under Congregational control; but its privileges were equally open to students from all denominations of Christians. A special and liberal charter, exempting all the property of the seminary from taxation, was secured from the State of Illinois, Feb. 15, 1851.

The institution was formally opened Oct. 6, 1858, with two professors—Professor Joseph Haven, D.D., and Professor Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D.—and twenty-nine students.

Subsequently other chairs were filled; and the present faculty (1883) are:—

- Rev. F. W. FISK, D.D., Wisconsin Professor of Sacred Rhetoric.
 Rev. J. T. HYDE, D.D., Iowa Professor of New-Testament Literature and Interpretation.
 Rev. G. N. BOARDMAN, D.D., Illinois Professor of Systematic Theology.
 Rev. S. IVES CURTISS, D.D., New-England Professor of Old-Testament Literature and Interpretation.
 Rev. G. B. WILLCOX, D.D., Stone Professor of Pastoral Theology and Special Studies.
 Rev. H. McDONALD SCOTT, B.D., Secretary and Michigan Professor of Ecclesiastical History.
 Professor J. R. ANTHONY, Instructor in Education.
 Professor GUSTAV A. ZIMMERMAN, Instructor in German Department.

A special course of study is provided for those, who, though not able to acquire a liberal education, may yet possess both the talents and piety requisite for the Christian ministry. Also a German department is established, giving such instruction and training, additional to the regular studies of the seminary, as will best qualify German students to preach the gospel in their mother-tongue as well as in English.

During the twenty-five years since the opening of the seminary, 136 have been under instruction, and 243 have graduated. The seminary-buildings, Keyes and Carpenter Halls, and Hammond Library, are located fronting Union Park, Chicago, and in addition to lecture-rooms, chapel, and library, furnish study and dormitory rooms for nearly a hundred students.

The library numbers about 7,000 volumes, and with the completion of the new fire-proof library-building, immediate efforts will be made for its enlargement. Seven professorships are established, which are in part or fully endowed; also twenty-five scholarships, yielding an average annual income of a hundred dollars each. From these and other educational funds a hundred and fifty dollars of annual aid is given to the students who need it.

The seminary has had a vigorous growth, and now furnishes to theological students ample privileges and instructions. With its able faculty, its central position, and the large and continually increasing number of churches embraced in its constituency, its future enlargement and usefulness are assured. There is no reason to question, that it will be the peer of the best seminaries in the land. G. S. F. SAVAGE, Secretary and Treasurer.

III. Episcopalian. (1) THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in New York was founded May 27, 1817, by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, to provide a school for the education of its candidates for holy orders, whose plan and situation would meet the wants of the church in all sections of the country. Bishop Bowen of South Carolina, Bishop White of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Hobart of New York, were most active in its behalf. In accordance with a plan drawn up by the two latter bishops, foreshadowing the institution and its several professorships as they exist to-day, it was opened in a room of St. Paul's Chapel, May 1, 1819. The first professors were the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D., and the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D. But notwithstanding the munificent offer by Dr. Clement C. Moore, of the ground on which the buildings now stand, and the efforts of a large committee, subscriptions came in so slowly, that the General Convention, in 1820, removed it to New Haven, where it was thought it might be supported at less expense than in New York. That this was an error soon made itself apparent; and the death of Mr. Jacob Sherrod of New York, who left a noble legacy of $60,000 to a seminary to be established in New York, gave the Convention an opportunity to bring it back in 1822, and thus correct a mistake which would have proved fatal to its continuing a general institution. It was re-opened in a building belonging to Trinity School, on the corner of Canal and Varick Streets, in February, 1822, with twenty-three students and six professors. The constitution laid the foundation of a widely extended system of theological instruction. It provided not only for the seminary in New York, but for branch schools under its control in different parts of the country. In its board of trustees, which is elected in part by the General Convention and in part by certain dioceses, the church in all parts of the United States is represented. The course of study is to be prescribed by the House of Bishops; and each bishop is not only ex officio a trustee, but a visitor of the institution, with all the powers that that involves. Thus the interest, as well as the rights, of every part of the Episcopal Church in its general seminary, is amply secured and protected.

The corner-stone of the first building, now known as the East Building, was laid July 28, 1825, by Bishop White, in the presence of a large assemblage of clergy and citizens, on the ground given by Dr. Clement C. Moore. At that time the site was an apple-orchard on the banks of the Hudson River, which at that time flowed a little east of the present Tenth Avenue.

In 1844, to accommodate the increasing number of students, a second building, now known as the West Building, was erected.

But it was still the day of small things for the Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the city. The large fortunes now so common were then unknown; and, in common with all our other collegiate institutions, it had to struggle to do its work with a very small and insufficient endowment, but always with the unimpeachable record, that not a dollar of its trust-funds has ever been lost. More than once in its history, in consequence of the growth of the city, heavy assessments have been laid upon it, which have absorbed all its available income; and had not the professors, at great personal sacrifice, and some of the leading clergy of the city, voluntarily offered their services to the institution without remuneration, its trustees would have been compelled to close its doors. Thus it has gone on steadily with its work, until its graduates, which number more than a thousand, are to be found among the leading clergy of every diocese of the Episcopal Church; and on the roll-call of its alumni are the names of more than thirty honored bishops, scattered from Shanghai in the Far East to Oregon and Washington Territory in the Far West.

But a brighter day has at length dawned on its history. Renewed interest has been awakened among its old friends, and new ones enlisted. Within three years, the office of dean has been made permanent by a liberal foundation, two additional professorships endowed, provision made by Mr. Tracy R. Edson for instruction in elocution, a fellowship founded by Miss Caroline Talmán in memory of her father, a lectureship, similar to the Bampton Lectureship in England established by Mr. George A. Jarvis, and several handsome additions made to the general endowment. Encouraged by these gifts, and liberal donations for building-purposes, the trustees have recently procured from Mr. C. C. Haight, architect, a plan of a complete series of buildings for the future needs of the institution. They are to be of brownstone and brick, and in design similar to the collegiate buildings of Oxford and Cambridge; so arranged, that separate portions may be erected as memorials; and will, when finished, be an ornament to the city. The corner-stone of the first, which is to be called Sherred Hall, in memory of an early benefactor of the seminary, and which is to provide six ample lecture-rooms, was laid May 10, 1883. And already the fire-proof building which is to contain the valuable library has been promised, on condition that funds shall be provided to erect the dormitory which is to connect it with Sherred Hall. With its financial affairs in the hands of a very able committee, the day is not far distant when the seminary will be amply endowed for all departments of its work.

The students that have been matriculated number nearly fourteen hundred, of whom about a hundred are at present in the institution.

The library, which is particularly rich in some departments of theology, contains 17,500 volumes, and upwards of 10,000 pamphlets. It is open daily, from ten A.M. to five P.M., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures.

The faculty is composed of a dean and six professors, as follows:—

The Rev. EUGENE AUG. HOFFMAN, D.D., Dean.
The Rev. WILLIAM E. EISENPRODT, D.D., "Eugene A. Hoffman" Professor of Pastoral Theology.

The Rev. SAMUEL BUEL, D.D., Professor of Systematic Theology, etc.

The Rev. RANDALL C. HALL, D.D., "Chambers C. Moore" Professor of the Hebrew and Greek Languages.

The Rev. ANDREW OLIVER, D.D., Professor of Biblical Learning, etc.

The Rev. WILLIAM J. SEABURY, D.D., "Charles and Elizabeth Ludlow" Professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Law.

The Rev. THOMAS RICEY, D.D., "St. Mark's Church in the Bazaar" Professor of Ecclesiastical History.
The Rev. FRANCIS T. RUSSELL, Instructor in Elocution.

The following distinguished men have filled its professorial chairs in the past.—Bishops Brownell, Hobart, B. T. Onderdonk, Whittingham, and Seymour; the Rev. Drs. Samuel H. Turner, Samuel F. Jarvis, Bird Wilson, John D. Ogilby, Benjamin I. Haight, Samuel R. Johnson, Milo Mahan, Samuel Seabury, William Walton, John Murray Forbes, and Francis Vinton, with Clement C. Moore, LL.D., and the Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck.

(3) THE BERKELEY DIVINITY SCHOOL, at Middletown, Conn.—This school takes its name from Dr. George Berkeley, who came to this country in his forty-fourth year, in 1728, with the hope of founding an American college, and who resided some two years at Newport, R.I. It was originally a department of Trinity College, Hartford; but in 1851 it was proposed to erect it into an independent institution. An act of incorporation was obtained for it from the Legislature of Connecticut; and with its own board of trustees it was located at Middletown, where it has since remained. The first class which graduated from it dates from 1850, and the number of its alumni now exceeds two hundred and fifty. Its patrons have so far endowed it, that it now maintains five professors, and has a library amounting to 17,000 volumes. Of course its instruction is Episcopal; but it would not deny its privileges to a sincere student of any denomination who desired to listen to the teaching given, and to enjoy its opportunities for reading and meditation. For religious services, its chapel, which is a very commodious and beautiful building, is open twice daily,—at nine A.M. and five P.M. On Sundays the Holy Communion is administered, and sermons are occasionally delivered by the professors. The parish church is hard by, and on Sunday the students frequently go there. There are professorships of doctrinal theology and the prayer-book, of church history, of the literature and interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, of the literature and interpretation of the Christian Scriptures, of the Christian evidences and homiletics, of the Hebrew tongue, and of elocution. The students are expected, at regular intervals, to deliver written and extempore sermons. The period of study comprises between eight and nine months, with short recesses at Christmas and Easter. The school opens the second Thursday in September. Tuition and room-rent free. Aid is extended to those who need it, under terms made known on application to the dean.

T. W. COIT (Professor).

(4) THE DIVINITY SCHOOL OF THE PROTES-

TANT-EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA.—This school is situated on Woodland Avenue and Fiftieth Street, just on the south-west edge of the city, less than three miles from the City Hall and the depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad; which are at Penn Square, in the centre of the city. It is conveniently reached either by the steam-cars, from the Pennsylvania depot, or by horse-cars, from Chestnut Street.

Its present buildings were erected in 1882. They are situated on an elevated plateau, commanding a view of the city and of the country. They occupy a lot of ground with an area of several acres, fronting on the avenue, and having a fine old oak-grove in the rear. They are of three stories, constructed of stone, consisting of a centre building and two wings. They are supplied with gas, and warmed by steam throughout, with grates also in most of the rooms. In one wing is the kitchen department with laundry attached, and a dining-room for the students, also a gymnasium and bowling-alleys. In the other wing there are accommodations for the dean and his family. There are also a reception-room, a reading-room, five or six convenient lecture-rooms, and rooms for forty students. The chapel is not yet built; but funds are already provided for its erection, and in the mean time a large and commodious room is fitted up for a chapel in the present buildings.

An informal training-school for candidates for the ministry had existed for two or three years before 1860, under the direction of the late Bishop Alonzo Potter. Upon the breaking-out of the Rebellion, and the consequent closing of the Episcopal seminary at Alexandria, Va., it was thought desirable to establish in Philadelphia a fully equipped theological seminary or divinity school. Funds were procured, professors were appointed, and in 1862 the school was incorporated.

There are five professors of as many departments, including the instructor in Hebrew; viz., of biblical learning, Rev. Dr. Hare; of systematic divinity, Rev. Dr. Goodwin; of ecclesiastical history, Rev. D. Butler; of homiletics and pastoral care, Rev. Dr. Meier-Smith; and of the Hebrew language, Rev. Mr. Du Bois.

The school has had students from Canada, the West Indies, Liberia, and from almost all parts of the United States, though very few from the Southern States proper, which is quite natural, as of course none came from them during the war, and at its close the Alexandria seminary was reopened. Out of nearly three hundred students matriculated, its graduated alumni number not quite two hundred; of whom two are bishops, and two others have declined the episcopate. The number of its students, however, cannot be expected to be very large, owing to the multiplication of theological seminaries, in the Episcopal Church, in all quarters of the country; and, had the reopening of the Alexandria seminary been anticipated, this school might, perhaps, never have been established.

The institution is well endowed. Three of its professorships have independent foundations, and it has already a very valuable library of some 8,000 volumes.

As to its ecclesiastical position, it is that of moderate Episcopacy and conservative Churchmanship. It is liberal and evangelical in its teaching, adhering to the standards of the church's doctrine, but committed to no particular school or party.

DANIEL R. GOODWIN, Professor.

(5) THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF MASSACHUSETTS, in Cambridge.—This institution was founded in 1867 by the gift of $100,000, by the late B. T. Reed of Boston. It was the result of an often expressed feeling, that there ought to be a seminary of the Episcopal Church in Cambridge, both to exert an influence in behalf of the ministry upon the many young men there, and also to embrace the advantages there offered for study. The school was incorporated at once, with a liberal charter, empowering it to confer degrees, and also prescribing for its government a Board of Trustees and a Board of Clerical and Lay Visitors. A staff of four professors was secured, with the late Rev. J. S. Stone, D.D., as dean; and the institution entered upon a career which has exceeded the hopes of its friends. So far, there are seventy-five alumni, from all parts of the country, and now at work in equally varied localities. The course of study covers three years, and embraces the branches prescribed by the canons of the church, but it is sought to study them in a more advanced manner than has been usual, and to take advantage of all progress in scholarship. In accordance with this, admission is restricted to bachelors of arts, or those who submit to an equivalent examination; and superior scholarship is rewarded by the degree of bachelor of divinity.

There is no organic connection with Harvard University; but the nearness of that institution brings manifest advantages, and the chapel of the school is the usual place of worship of such Episcopalian students as are in Cambridge on Sunday.

The success of the school has led to the reception of munificent gifts; as follows, St. John's Memorial Chapel, from the late R. M. Mason; Lawrence Hall (the dormitory, for forty students), from Anos A. Lawrence; Reed Hall (for library and class-rooms), from the founder; Burnham Hall (the refectory), from J. A. Burnham. Adding to these the original fund and a legacy of R. M. Mason, and also subscriptions for annual expenses, the total value of gifts, hitherto, exceeds $150,000. Besides this, the school has a reversionary interest in the estate of the founder, which will render it one of the most amply endowed seminaries in the land.

G. ZABISKIE GRAY, Professor.

IV. LUTHERAN. (1) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE GENERAL SYNOD OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES, Gettysburg, Penn.—The founding of a theological seminary engaged the attention of the General Synod at its first convention in 1820. The realization of this effort was, however, not attained till a few years later, when Rev. S. S. Schmucker of New Market, Va., urged upon the Synod of Maryland and Virginia the enlargement of his private theological school into a general institution for the church. At the meeting of this body in 1825, he and the Revs. Charles P. Krauth and Benjamin Kurtz were appointed a committee to draft a plan for the immediate establishment of such an institution; and the action of this committee was the same year adopted, with some modifications, by the General Synod convened at Frederick, Md. The General Synod appointed the first board of directors, and elected the first professor, Rev. S. S. Schmucker. The right of electing professors was thenceforth vested exclusively in the board of directors, who are chosen by such synods, in connection with the General Synod, to patronize the seminary, and contribute to its support. An official connection with the General Synod is maintained, and this continues the only theological school sustaining such a relation.

The board at its first meeting selected Gettysburg, Penn., as the location; and Professor Schmucker was inaugurated, and active operations begun, in September, 1826. Although designed for the entire Lutheran Church in the United States, the seminary encountered strong prejudices and open hostility from the Lutherans not connected with the General Synod. It had consequently to struggle for years with formidable difficulties; and, in view of prevailing divisions, it has never commanded the support of the entire Lutheran community. The doctrinal basis recognizes the Augsburg Confession and the Smaller Catechism of Luther as "a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the word of God." The spirit of the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of American Christianity. Over six hundred students are enrolled among its alumni. The second professor, E. L. Hazeltius, D.D., was elected in 1830. Since that time, H. I. Smith, D.D., C. P. Krauth, D.D., C. F. Schaeffer, D.D., J. A. Brown, D.D., L. L. D., and M. Valentine, D.D., have been incumbents of the different chairs. The present faculty consists of C. A. Stork, D.D., C. A. Hay, D.D., E. J. Wolf, D.D., and J. G. Morris, D.D., LL.D. The library numbers 11,000 volumes. The endowment amounts to about $100,000, and the real estate is estimated at $50,000.

The Holman Lecture is a foundation, the income of which is devoted to an annual lecture on one of the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. The Rice Lecture is a foundation providing for an annual lecture on "Methods of Ministerial Work." Special provision has always been made for indigent students, and scholarships covering the expenses of the entire course of three years are at the disposal of the faculty. A full History of this seminary, by Dr. J. G. MORRIS, is contained in vol. vi. of The Quarterly Review of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. E. J. WOLF (Professor).

(2) CONCORDIA SEMINARY of St. Louis, Mo., is one of the institutions of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the largest Lutheran body in America. In it young men who have passed through a gymnasium (college), and are acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, are taught theology according to the Lutheran Confessions (Concordia of 1580). The school was founded toward the end of the year 1839 by a number of Lutheran theologians (among them Rev. C. F. W. Walther), in the midst of a settlement of German Lutherans that had emigrated the same year from Saxony in Germany. At first it comprised a gymnasium and a theological seminary, and in 1849 was removed to St. Louis. In the following year it was granted by the Lutheran congregations of Perry County and St. Louis, that had hitherto supported the same, to the aforesaid synod, which had been organized in 1847. In 1853 it was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Missouri. In 1861 the gymnasium was separated from the theological seminary, and removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., where it still flourishes; and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. In 1875, however, the Practical Seminary was removed to Springfield, Ill. Up to the present time, about four hundred Lutheran ministers have in this institution (Concordia Seminary) received a thorough theological education, not including those of the Practical Seminary. The old building, erected during the years between 1850 and 1857, was taken down in 1882, and a new, large, splendid edifice erected, the dedication of which took place Sept. 9 and 10, 1883, in the presence of fifteen thousand people. Addresses were made in German, English, and Latin. The faculty at present consists of five professors and one assistant. Dr. C. F. W. Walther, the first theological professor since the removal of the institution to St. Louis, is still its venerable president. The languages used in the lectures are the Latin, German, and English. The regular course, requiring three years, embraces logic, metaphysics, encyclopædia and methodology, isagogics, hermeneutics, exegesis and cursory reading of the original text, dogmatics (including ethics and polemics), symbolics, church history (including history of doctrines, patristics, and archaeology), catechetics and homiletics with practical exercises, pastoral theology, reading of select works of the Fathers, of English classical and recent theological writers, debates in Latin and English. Tuition is free. The institution is entirely sustained by synod: the students also, if poor, are liberally supported by the congregations. The present number of students is 103. The library contains about 5,500 volumes, mostly theological works. M. GÜNTHER (Professor).

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH at Philadelphia.—In consequence of resolutions passed by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, at its meeting in Pottstown, Penn., Aug. 25, 1861, and at a special meeting held at Allentown, Penn., July 26 and 27, 1864, this seminary, after the appointment of a board of directors, and the election of the faculty (Rev. Drs. C. F. Schaeffer, W. J. Mann, C. P. Krauth, C. W. Schaeffer, G. F. Krotel), began operations Oct. 5, 1864, which since that time have been regularly continued. In the government of the seminary, other Lutheran synods, uniting with the Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States in the endowment and support of the institution, have a pro rata representation, a right of which the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of the State of New York now avails itself. The seminary has sent out up to this time more than two hundred graduates; whilst a considerable number of students of various denominations gratuitously received instruction without graduating. The character of this seminary is clearly indicated by the official declaration, "that this institution shall be devoted to the interests of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the United States, and that its doctrinal character shall be unreservedly and unalterably based on all the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." Of like tenor is the affirmation demanded of the professors before entering upon their duties. Instruction is imparted through the medium of the English and German languages, the large field of labor providentially intrusted to the care of the Lutheran Church requiring at the present time both those languages in Pennsylvania and in distant parts. Those who apply for admission as students must have graduated at a college, or else have acquired in some literary institution an education of a similar character. The Rev. Dr. J. A. Seiss, pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion at Philadelphia, is president of the board of directors. The faculty consists at present of the Rev. Drs. C. W. Schaeffer (chairman), W. J. Mann, A. Spaeth, and H. E. Jacobs. Dr. Krauth died on Jan. 2, 1883. See the arts. SCHAEFFER, KRAUTH; W. J. MANN (Professor).

V. Methodist. (1) GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.—This institution is a theological seminary, under the supervision and patronage of the Western Conferences of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. It is located at Evanston, Ill., ten miles north of Chicago. It was opened provisionally in 1856, but was regularly organized, under a charter from the Legislature of Illinois, in the year following. By the terms of its charter, its trustees are empowered to accept and hold trust-funds of any kind; and the real property of the institute is forever exempt from taxation. The professors elected in 1856 were the Rev. John Dempster, D.D., the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. They were co-ordinate in rank, the senior in office acting as president of the faculty. Subsequently the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., the Rev. Francis D. Hemenway, D.D., the Rev. William X. Ninde, D.D., and the Rev. Henry B. Ridgway, D.D., were added to the faculty. In 1879 Professor William X. Ninde, D.D., was elected president. The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral; but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. The institute confers the degree of bachelor of divinity upon graduates of colleges who complete its course. Others, who have not enjoyed a collegiate training, are admitted to its classes, and on the completion of the course are granted a diploma. The school is sustained chiefly by income from properties in the city of Chicago, bequeathed as a perpetual foundation by the late Mrs. Eliza Garrett, from whom its name is derived. Their present value is estimated at $300,000, yielding an income in 1883 of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,000, which is more than covered by subscriptions. The corporation own a fine educational building in Evanston, containing a chapel, library, lecture-rooms, and dormitories for the accommodation of one hundred students. Since the organization of the school, it has sent forth more than three hundred graduates, while nearly twelve hundred students have fully or partially shared its advantages. Far the larger part of those now surviving continue preaching the gospel, and are held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution. Not a few have attained prominence in the church as preachers and pastors, foreign missionaries, and presidents and professors of colleges and seminaries. The catalogue for 1883 shows an attendance of a hundred and three, with a graduating-class of twenty-eight. The institute holds a general relation of sympathy with the Methodist colleges of the West, two of which—the North-western University of Evanston, Ill., and Chaddock College of Quincy, Ill.—have formally adopted it as their theological department.

(2) UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (Va.) OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Both Liberty Hall Academy in Lexington, Rockbridge, Va., and Hampden-Sidney College in Prince Edward, Va., were founded by the Presbyterians of that State, mainly for the purpose of rearing an educated ministry. The former still exists as Washington and Lee University, the latter as a well-endowed college. Its president was also teacher of the students of divinity. The seminary at Princeton having been founded in 1811, the synod of Virginia in 1812 reformed its theological school as a department of the college, with the Rev. Moses Hoge, the college-president, as its professor. Between that date and 1820, when he died, about thirty licentiates went from it into the ministry. Dr. Hoge was followed, as president of the college, by a layman (Jonathan P. Cushing, Esq.). The wants of the churches were rapidly increasing; hence the old Hanover presbytery resolved, under the advice of the great John Holt Rice, D.D., to create a seminary distinct from the college. Without buildings or endowments, he commenced his instructions with three students, Jan. 1, 1821. Funds were rapidly raised for endowments; and in 1826 the General Assembly took the seminary under its care, and its trustees took charge of the funds. In the autumn of the same year the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, with the consent of the next assembly, took the place of the Hanover presbytery in governing the seminary; and to commemorate this copartnership its name was changed to Union Seminary. At the premature and regretted death of Dr. Rice, in 1831, it had acquired buildings, a library, three professors, and forty-eight students. Dr. Rice was succeeded as president by Dr. George A. Baxter, from 1832 to 1841. The death of the founder, and the "Old and New School controversy," together with the great industrial depression of the country under oppressive Federal laws, gave a serious check to its prosperity. In 1841 Dr. Samuel B. Wilson succeeded as president of the seminary, and professor of systematic theology. In 1851 the endowment of a fourth chair was completed, and the designed organization of the seminary realized. Since then there have been four professors,—one of systematic, polemic, and pastoral theology; one of Hebrew and other Oriental languages and literature; one of ecclesiastical history and polity; one of biblical literature and New-Testament interpretation. The scheme of the seminary is thoroughly biblical. The Bible is the chief class-book in all departments, and every professor is required to expound some parts of it from the original.

The seminary is now governed jointly by the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, through a board of twenty-four trustees, but under the superior control of the General Assembly, to whom annual reports must be made, and which exercises a veto-potest over the election of professors and over all changes in its constitution and plan. The property of the seminary consists of about forty acres of land, with good buildings for seventy-five students and four professors, a handsome chapel and a superior library-building, and endowments of $250,000 for the support of the institution and twenty-five scholarships. The library, which is unusually select, numbers 12,000 volumes.

The seminary has had, since its separation from Hampden-Sidney College, the following professors:—

In Theology.—Dr. JOHN H. RICE, 1824-31; Dr. GEORGE A. BAXTER, 1831-41; Dr. SAMUEL B. WILSON, 1841-50; Dr. ROBERT L. DABNEY, 1850-83.

In Ecclesiastical History and Polity.—Dr. STEPHEN TAYLOR, 1835-38; Dr. SAMUEL L. GRAHAM, 1838-51; Dr. ROBERT L. DABNEY, 1855-59; Dr. THOMAS E. PECK, 1860-.

In Biblical Literature and New Testament Interpretation.—WILLIAM J. HOWE, D.D., 1856-59; HENRY C. ALEXANDER, D.D., 1860-.

The seminary was also served in this department by the following gentlemen as tutors: Elisha Ballantine, Benjamin M. Smith, Francis S. Sampson, Dabney C. Harrison, and Thomas Wharey. The largest number of students ever collected in the seminary in one session was seventy-four: the number this session (1882-83) is fifty-six. R. L. DABNEY (Professor).

(5) COLUMBIA THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The Presbyterian Theological Seminary whose seat is at Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, was established in the year 1828, under the corporate title "The Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia." When, several years later, the synod thus named was divided into the two synods of South Carolina and of Georgia, an equal share in its management was continued to each. In 1857 the synod of Alabama accepted a joint interest in its control, with the same rights and privileges as belonged to either of the others. These three ecclesiastical bodies were empowered to elect a board of directors, that should meet and act in common, under a written constitution similar to that of the seminary at Princeton: the professors being chosen, in the event of a vacancy, by the synods themselves in rotation. In 1863 the seminary was transferred to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America, which body (its legal title altered in 1865 so as to read the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States) still governs it; the single limitation being, that its locality cannot be changed unless by the consent of the transferring synods.

Including the fund for the endowment of professorships, legacies, scholarships, real estate, and library, the property of this institution at the date of the transfer was valued at the nominal sum of $278,000. The civil war, however, which closed in 1865, left the productive funds in a condition so disabled as to render necessary the inauguration of immediate efforts for their rehabilitation. Meanwhile the deficiency was in a large measure met by extensive and liberal contributions from the churches. At the present time (1883) this method of supply is discontinued, in view of the fact that an efficient re-endowment agency has succeeded in securing an income, which, being in a condition of constant increase, will serve for a competent support and for an enlarged usefulness. Happily, its fine buildings, and its noble library of about 20,000 volumes, escaped the ravages of war. In 1880 the seminary was closed, and its faculty disbanded, partly owing to a lack of funds, and partly to other causes. But in the fall of 1882 it was again opened, with three of its former professors and with the addition of two more; its students numbering about twenty-five. Many distinguished names have in the past graced the list of its instructors, notably that of the illustrious Dr. Thornwell, whose decease (in 1862) gave to the institution its severest blow, and that of the venerable Dr. Howe, who since 1831 continued to occupy the chair of Hebrew literature until his lamented death in 1883. (7) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE NORTH-WEST.—Since the opening for settlement of that vast region drained by the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers and their tributaries, the feeling has existed, that institutions of sacred learning should be established within this territory by which to supply an educated ministry for the evangelization of the rapidly increasing population. In response to this feeling, the New Albany Theological Seminary was founded. It was started first as an adjunct of Hanover College, Indiana, in the year 1830, but in 1840 was removed to New Albany, Ind., and for some years sustained by contiguous synods of the then Old-School branch of the Presbyterian Church. After a time it became apparent that the seminary was crippled by its proximity to similar institutions (though it had accomplished a great work by sending into the ministry of the church many able men); and its friends decided to suspend the enterprise at New Albany, and seek a more favorable location.

At the meeting of the General Assembly at Indianapolis in 1859, the Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick of Chicago offered $100,000, to endow four professorships in a theological seminary to be located at Chicago. The assembly gratefully accepted the offer, and elected Rev. N. L. Rice, D.D., to the Cyrus H. McCormick chair of didactic and polemic theology, Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., to the chair of biblical and ecclesiastical history, Rev. L. J. Halsey, D.D., to the chair of pastoral theology, and Rev. W. M. Scott, D.D., to the chair of biblical literature and exegesis. Opened September, 1859, it has continued with varying fortune, until now (1883) it has an invested endowment-fund of about $210,000, and buildings (including dormitory, chapel, recitation-rooms, and three professors' houses) valued at $70,000. The land belonging to the institution, twenty-five acres, is situated in a portion of the city desirable for fine residences, and in the near future will greatly increase its income. Besides Mr. McCormick's donations, aggregating for all purposes $250,000, the seminary is indebted to many others for valuable services and liberal contributions. The institution received from New Albany a library of between 2,000 and 3,000 volumes, some of them old and rare. An invested library-fund, provided by the late Hanson K. Corning, Esq., of New York, secures an annual addition of valuable works. The library now contains over 10,000 volumes, including several large donations by bequests from deceased friends. There are at present, yielding income, thirteen scholarships wholly or partially endowed. While located at Hanover and New Albany, about a hundred and seventy-five students graduated from the institution; and, since the opening in Chicago, nearly two hundred have enjoyed its advantages. Twenty-seven were in attendance in 1882-83. Such ample pecuniary provision is made, that all the necessary expenses of needy students are fully met.

The professorships as now constituted are as follows:—

Rev. L. J. HALSEY, D.D., LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Church Government and the Sacraments.

Rev. THOMAS H. SKINNER, D.D., Cyrus H. McCormick Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology.

Rev. WILLIS G. CRAIG, D.D., Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History.

Rev. D. C. MARGRIS, D.D., Professor of New-Testament Literature and Exegesis.

Rev. HERBERT JOHNSON, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology.

EDWARD L. CURTIS, A.B., Instructor in Old-Testament Literature and Exegesis.

Located in the heart of a territory unparalleled in fertility, with an ample equipment and liberal endowment, with a large and increasing constituency, with a vast field of labor open to its alumni, and with a learned, energetic, and devoted faculty, the Seminary of the North-west has before it, under God, a future of unexampled usefulness. W. W. HALSEY.

(8) UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, New York, was founded late in the year 1835. It grew out of a desire to provide adequate theological instruction for the rising ministry, in a central position, as free as possible from partisan prejudices, on a sound scriptural basis.

Origin.—For years previous to the great disruption of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, this great body of Christians had been deeply agitated by theological controversies and ecclesiastical strife. The schools of sacred learning were to some extent committed to partisan views of existing conflicts. It was thought that a theological seminary could be established in the city of New York, on an independent basis, not subject to the control of accidental majorities in the General Assembly, committed to no theological school in the church, and to no ecclesiastical party, and occupying ground on which good and faithful men of Presbyterian affinities could meet together, and raise up a sound and thoroughly furnished ministry for the church.

At a meeting of four ministers and five laymen, on the evening of Oct. 10, 1835, at No. 8 Bond Street, New York, it was determined "to attempt to establish a theological seminary in the city of New York." At a subsequent enlarged meeting, Nov. 9, $31,000 were subscribed. Two months later the subscription had been doubled. A constitution was adopted. Jan. 11, 1836, a large and highly responsible board of directors was chosen (whose first meeting was held a week later), and order was taken for an act of incorporation, which, after much delay, was obtained, March 27, 1839, from the Legislature of the State of New York. The government of the institution was vested in a self-perpetuating board of twenty-eight directors, one-half of whom to be laymen. It was provided in the charter, that all the advantages of the institution should be allowed to students of every denomination of Christians.

At the same time provision was made irrevocably, by the constitution, that every director should, on his election to office, solemnly promise to maintain while in office the plan and constitution of the seminary, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Presbyterian form of church government.

Every member of the faculty, it was also provided, should, on entering upon his professorship, and triennially thereafter, or when required by the board, make and subscribe, in the presence of the board, the following declaration:—

"I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice; and I do now, in the presence of God and the Directors of this Seminary, solemnly and sincerely receive and adopt the Westminster Confession of Faith as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures. I do also, in like manner, approve of the Presbyterian Form of Government; and I do solemnly promise that I will not teach or inculcate any thing which shall appear to me to be subversive of the said system of doctrine, or of the principles of said Form of Government, so long as I shall continue to be a Professor in the Seminary."

Location.—The lease of a plot of ground, fronting on University Place, between Sixth and Eighth Streets, and extending through the block to Greene Street, one hundred by two hundred feet, belonging to the estate of The Sailor's Snug Harbor, subject to an annual ground-rent of $800, was purchased for $8,000. Four professors' houses were erected on Greene Street, and a commodious seminary building on University Place. The latter was completed and dedicated Dec. 12, 1838. Owing to the financial embarrassments of the institution, the houses on Greene Street were sold some four years later. Two of them have since been purchased, together with a house and lot adjoining, on the corner of Greene and Eighth Streets, to accommodate the students with dormitories. The seminary building has also been much enlarged, at a considerable expense.

Measures have now been taken for the removal of the seminary to a more eligible site on the west side of Park Avenue, between Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Streets, including the whole front on the avenue, and extending back on each of the streets a hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are now in the process of erection. They will include a fire-proof library edifice, a commodious chapel, and a large structure for lecture-halls, with a dormitory of six stories extending across the rear from street to street. They are to be of brick, with brown-stone trimmings, in the University Gothic style. The cost of the ground and buildings will considerably exceed half a million of dollars. The site is one of the most eligible in the city.

Library.—The nucleus of this unique collection of books was gathered by the Benedictine monks of Paderborn, in Germany, and was the growth of centuries. Large and valuable additions were made to it by the learned Dr. Leander Van Ess, until it numbered more than 13,000 volumes, including rare old copies of folio Bibles, polyglots, lexicons, concordances, commentaries of the early periods of the Reformation, the Latin and Greek Fathers, church histories, decrees of councils and popes, with a most valuable collection of Incunabula and Reformation tracts, all of which were purchased in bulk by the seminary in 1838.

Large and useful additions of the best modern theological publications, many of them from the private collections of the late Drs. Robinson, Sprague, Field, Marsh, Gillett, H. B. Smith, Adams, and others, have been made, together with the unique McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Puritan divines, and the deistic, Trinitarian, and ecclesiastical controversies of the eighteenth century. The library comprises not less than 42,000 volumes, 40,000 pamphlets, and 163 manuscripts.

Funds.—For several years the institution was conducted under great embarrassments. The original subscriptions were soon exhausted in providing buildings and the payment of salaries. The treasury at one time was overdrawn to the amount of not less than $16,000. In 1843, $25,000 were obtained for the endowment of the theological chair, the first permanent fund. A further sum of $30,000 was received some five or six years later, by a bequest of Mr. James Roosevelt. In 1853 a further sum of $100,000 was obtained by a general subscription, a bequest of $20,000 by Mrs. Fassett of Philadelphia in 1854, and a subscription of $25,000 in 1855, to endow the professorship of ecclesiastical history. A further subscription of $100,000 was obtained in 1859, of $150,000 in 1865, and in 1871 of $300,000. In 1873, by the princely gift, by Mr. James Brown, of $300,000, the institution was put upon an admirable foundation, the original corps of professors was increased from three to seven, and the funds of professorships from $25,000 to $80,000 each.

The late Gov. Edwin D. Morgan proved himself a most magnificent patron of the seminary by his gifts of $100,000 for the library, and $100,000 towards the new site, together with a noble bequest of $200,000. Large sums have also been contributed by the late John C. Baldwin, William E. Dodge, Anson G. Phelps, jun., Frederick Marquand, and others still in the land of the living; so that now the general endowment-fund exceeds $1,000,000, in addition to specific funds amounting to $157,900, and the buildings, which, it is expected, will be completed in 1884, without incumbrance.

Faculty.—The corps of instruction now consists of seven full professors in addition to one instructor. Several courses of lectures are also provided by permanent funds. Among the distinguished men who have filled the professorships are to be named, of those who have departed this life, the Rev. Drs. Henry White, Edward Robinson, Henry B. Smith, Thomas H. Skinner, and William Adams, all of precious memory. The present faculty is thus constituted:—

ROSSELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D., President, and Professor of Church History.

WILLIAM G. T. SHEPP, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology.

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Literature.

GEORGE L. PRENTISS, D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology.

FRANCIS BROWN, A.M., Associate Professor of Biblical Philology.

Students.—The seminary has, almost from the start, ranked with the first in the land as to the number under instruction. More than 2,000 students have availed themselves of its privileges, of whom 1,339 have graduated in due course. Not less than 1,750 of the whole number are still serving in the gospel ministry, and 127 are reported as missionaries to the heathen.

Ecclesiastical Control.—The General Assembly, since the re-union in 1870, has an optional veto over the appointment of the professors, and receives from the board an annual exhibit of its condition.

VIII. Reformed (German). (1) REFORMED CHURCH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, at Lancaster, Penn.—Though the need of a theological seminary for the Reformed (German) Church had long been felt, it was not until the year 1817 that definite action to supply the need was taken by the synod, and not until seven years later, that, after several abortive efforts, the institution was actually founded. At that time Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, had been re-seccitated; and, as its friends deemed it advantageous to bring the contemplated seminary into some connection with the college, liberal offers of accommodation and assistance were made by its trustees to the synod of the Reformed Church in 1824. These were accepted; and the seminary was opened March 11, 1825, with Rev. Lewis Mayer as professor of theology, and five students in attendance. After an experience of four years and a half, Carlisle was felt to be an unsuitable place for the seminary; and in the fall of 1829 the institution was removed to York, Penn. In 1837 it found a new home in Mercersburg, Penn., the seat of Marshall College, which had grown out of the classical department organized at York in connection with the seminary. Subsequently Marshall College was united with Franklin College, and in the spring of 1853 transferred to Lancaster, Penn.; and in the fall of 1871, after a separation of eighteen years, the theological seminary followed. During the fifty-eight years of its existence the seminary has had in its service thirteen professors and tutors. The chair of systematic theology has had five incumbents, — Lewis Mayer, D.D., in office thirteen years; John W. Nevin, D.D., eleven; Bernard C. Wolff, D.D., ten; Henry Harbaugh, D.D., four; and E. V. Gerhart, D.D., fifteen. The chair of church history and exegesis, established 1829, has likewise had five incumbents, — Daniel Young, in office one year; Frederick A. Rauch, Ph.D., nine years; Philip Schaff, D.D., twenty-one, inclusive of two years not in actual service; E. E. Higbee, D.D., seven, including two years under appointment by the board of visitors; and Thomas G. Apple, D.D., twelve. In 1857 a theological tutorship was established; and during the twelve years of its actual existence (1861-73), there were three tutors, — William M. Reily, Ph.D., in office three years; Jacob B. Kerschner, A.M., seven; and F. A. Gast, D.D., two. In 1873 the tutorship was abolished, and the chair of Hebrew and Old Testament theology established, which Professor Gast has occupied since May, 1874. The seminary since 1875 has been under the care of three synods, each of which is represented proportionably in a board of trustees, which holds and manages the property, and in a board of visitors, which supervises the instruction, and directs the internal affairs of the institution. The library numbers at the present time about 10,000 volumes, many of which, together with a large amount of money for the endowment-fund, were obtained in Germany in the early history of the institution by Rev. James Reily, who visited that country to solicit aid in behalf of the new seminary. For the external and internal history of the seminary, see the Mercersburg Review for January, 1876, Semi-Centennial Register, 1875, and the Tercenary Monument, 1863. For the theology of the seminary, see art. MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY. F. A. GAST (Professor).

(2) HEIDELBERG THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, a theological school of the Reformed Church in the United States (formerly the German Reformed Church) at Tiffin, O. This church (with 767 ministers and 166,586 communicants) has now four theological schools, founded in the following order: (1) Theological Seminary at Lancaster, Penn., organized in 1825; (2) Heidelberg Theological Seminary at Tiffin, O., organized in 1851; (3) Theological Seminary at Franklin, Sheboygan County, Wis.; and (4) Theological Department of Ursinus College at Collegeville, Penn.

Heidelberg Theological Seminary belongs to the Ohio synod of the Reformed Church, a body of 110 ministers and 18,897 communicant members. Various efforts had been made at an early date to found a theological school west of the Alleghenies to meet the urgent calls for ministers. Thus one was in operation for a year or two (in 1830) in Canton, O., under Dr. J. G. Buttner, a learned German scholar. Another one was in operation for a short time (in 1818) in Columbus, O., under Rev. A. P. Freeze. In 1850 the Ohio synod resolved to found Heidelberg College, at Tiffin, O., and in connection with it to establish a theological seminary. The first professor called was Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart (then of Cincinnati, O.), who formally opened the seminary in May, 1851, with two students. The seminary has been in uninterrupted operation since that time. For ten years (1851-61) it had but one professor to attend to the full course of study; namely, Dr. E. V. Gerhart from 1851 to 1855, and Dr. Moses Kieffer from 1855 to 1861. In 1861 a second professor was called, namely, Dr. Hermann Rust, then of Cincinnati. Since 1861 it has been under the care of two professors. The present incumbents are Rev. Dr. J. H. Good, president, and professor of dogmatical and practical theology (called in 1869), and Rev. Dr. Hermann Rust, professor of exegetical and historical theology (called in 1861). The plan of the institution includes four professorships. Its productive endowment at present is about $30,000. It has no buildings of its own. The recitations and lectures are held in a hall of the college-building. Both the seminary and the college are named Heidelberg, out of respect to the celebrated Heidelberg Catechism, which is the only creed or confession of this branch of the church.

From 1853 to 1883 this institution has graduated 195 theological students, of whom 152 are still living, and laboring in the ministry. About one-half of these officiate in both the English and German language. They are somewhat widely distributed, as will be seen from the following: in Ohio, 77; in Pennsylvania, 27; in Indiana, 16; in Illinois, 5; in Iowa, 7; in Wisconsin, 4; in New Jersey, 1; in Michigan, 4; in New York, 1; in Kansas, 4; in Nebraska, 2; in Minnesota, 2; in Colorado, 1; and 1 missionary in Japan.

The number of students in attendance each year varies from twelve to twenty. The field of the seminary is somewhat circumscribed. For fuller account of its history, see Sermon before Alumni Association in 1860, by Rev. J. H. REITER, Dayton, O., 1860. J. H. GOOD (President).

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF UR-
SINUS COLLEGE is an integral part of the institution. It was organized simultaneously with the founding and opening of the college in 1869-70, and is located in the same place (Freeland, Collegeville P.O., Montgomery County, Penn.), thirty miles by railroad north-west from Philadelphia. In its organization it corresponds with that of the theological department of Yale College and similar schools. Ecclesiastically and theologically it is based upon the principles, faith, and polity of the Reformed Church, as symbolically represented by the Heidelberg Catechism and cognate Confessions; indeed, firm adherence to these in their historical sense, and progressive development in true harmony therewith, is a distinctive characteristic of the school. Although under no formal synodical control, it is as amenable in all essential respects to the jurisdiction of the "Reformed Church in the United States" as any other institution of the church, and acknowledges such amenability.

In 1872 it was officially recognized by the General Synod of the church, convened in Cincinnati; and several years later the Eastern District Synod at Easton gave it a vote of recommendation.

The department is under the immediate charge of three professors, and the course of study prescribed conforms to the requirements of the constitution of the church with which it stands connected.

Since the opening of the department, about sixty young men have pursued their studies in it, of whom forty-four took a full course, and forty-five are engaged in the work of the ministry. At the present time (October, 1883) there are seventeen young men pursuing their studies in the institution, with the ministry in view; and a special effort is being made to improve the financial condition of the college. It is under the control of a board of directors, of whom three-fourths must be members of the Reformed Church, and eight of whom are ministers of said church. J. H. A. BOMBERGER (President).

(2) MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL is situated in Meadville, Penn., on a hill east of the city, commanding a fine view of the surrounding country, and distinguished for its healthiness. Its origin dates from October, 1814, under the auspices of Professor Frederic Huidekoper, author of Judaism at Rome and other learned works, and his father, Hermann John Huidekoper, in a building purchased by the latter. It was chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1816, and has a board of trustees and a board of instruction. Its only doctrinal test for admission is a belief in the divine origin of Christianity. The Unitarians and Christian Connection co-operated in its establishment. The former denomination furnished the principal part of its funds. Students of various sects have graduated from the institution. Rev. Rufus P. Stebbins, D.D. (1811-56), Rev. Oliver Stearns, D.D. (1856-63), and Rev. Abiel A. Livermore, A.M. (1863-83), have been its presidents. Its endowment at the present date (1883) — aside from its real estate, valued at $30,000, and its library, worth $8,000 — is about $160,000, besides which the trustees hold a special trust of $23,000, founded by the late Joshua Brookes of New York, the income of which supplies libraries to settled ministers in the West. Its library numbers between 15,000 and 16,000 volumes and many hundreds of unbound pamphlets. The present Divinity Hall was erected in 1854, principally from the contributions of the Unitarian churches of New York and Brooklyn. There are four acres around it, given by Professor Huidekoper, who, with his family, has contributed largely, in money and services, to the school during its whole existence. A separate building, fire-proof, is about to be erected for the library. The institution is open to persons of whatever color, sex, or nationality; and beneficiary aid is extended to worthy students in need. Its curriculum of studies does not differ materially from that of other theological seminaries. Two resident professors and one instructor devote their entire time, and three non-resident professors a portion of their time, to teaching. The pupils vary in number from year to year, but there were twenty in attendance in 1882-83. The regular course of instruction occupies three years, but students can pursue a partial course of shorter duration. Between three and four hundred persons have received the benefits of the institution, and pulpits in the principal cities and towns of the Union are filled by its students. A. A. LIVERMORE (President).

X. Universalist. TUFTS COLLEGE DIVINITY SCHOOL is a department of Tufts College. It was organized and opened for students in 1869. The late Silvanus Packard, the largest benefactor of Tufts College thus far, directed in his will that the trustees should establish a professorship of theology. The Rev. Thomas J. Sawyer, D.D., was chosen Packard professor. The trustees also decided to associate with him one other professor, and open a divinity school. The Rev. Charles H. Leonard, D.D., was chosen as his associate. At first the number of students was small; but it rapidly increased, rendering another teacher necessary. William G. Tousey, A.M., was appointed as an assistant, and very soon promoted to a professorship. The course of study as originally laid out embraced three years. The work of the school was carried on by the three professors above named until 1875. At that time it was decided to make the course of study four years for all who are not college graduates. On account of the additional work involved in this change, an instructorship was created, and the Rev. George T. Knight was chosen to fill it. Recently the instructorship has been changed to a professorship; and the Rev. George M. Harmon has also been appointed an assistant professor, making now five permanent teachers in the school. The course pursued is substantially the same as in other divinity schools of like grade, except that some literary training is given to non-graduates. The degree of bachelor of divinity is given to all students who satisfactorily complete the course. There is no charge for either tuition or room-rent. Students who are in needy circumstances receive aid from the Universalist General Convention, by way of loans, amounting to $180 per year. There are now nearly sixty graduates from the school, nearly all of whom are actively engaged in the clerical profession, and some of them occupying prominent and influential positions in the Universalist Church. E. H. CAPEN (President).

THEOLOGUS, or THEOLOGICAL, an officer of the Roman-Catholic Church. In its Canon 18 the Third Council of the Lateran (1179) ordered that a proper person should be appointed at each metropolitan church to give free instruction in theology to the clergy. For his service he was to be paid by the revenue of some benefice; but he was not a canon himself, and could at any time be dismissed if he did not give satisfaction. The Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215) confirmed the decree, extended it to the cathedral churches, and gave in its Canons 10 and 11 some further regulations. THEOLOGY (from θεός und λόγος). I. In the widest sense, the science of religion, or, more definitely, the science of the Christian religion as taught in the Bible, and carried on in the history of the church. It is usually divided into: (1) Exegetical theology, or biblical learning; (2) Historical theology, or church history; (3) Systematic or speculative theology; (4) Practical theology. See special arts. on those topics.

II. In the narrower sense, systematic theology, or, more particularly, dogmatics. This is again divided into: (1) Theology proper ("the doctrine of God"), in which are treated theistic and anti-theistic theories, the knowledge, nature, and attributes of God, the Trinity, the divine decrees, providence, and miracles; (2) Anthropology ("the doctrine of man"), in which division are treated the different questions relating to man, his origin, nature, original condition, the fall, and especially the doctrines of sin and free agency; (3) Christology ("the doctrine of the person and work of Christ as the God-man"); (4) Pneumatology ("the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, and his work"); (5) Soteriology ("the doctrine of salvation"), under which head are treated the plan of salvation, and the way in which his salvation is brought to man, vocation, regeneration, faith, justification, sanctification — some include under this head also the doctrine of the person of Christ and of the atonement; (6) Ecclesiology ("the doctrine of the church, the sacraments, and the means of grace"); (7) Eschatology ("the doctrine of the last things"), which includes the doctrines of the condition of the soul after death, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the final judgment. See the separate arts. DOGMATICS, ELECTION, ESCHATOLOGY, JUSTIFICATION, CHRISTOLOGY, SOTERIOLOGY, etc.

THEOLOGY, New-England. See NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

THEOLOGY, Speculative, denotes a certain method of treatment, not a particular part of the system. Its direct opposite is empiricism. The empirical theologian starts from the well-ascertained experiences of conscience and religious life in general, and reaches his general ideas by way of induction, never transgressing the boundaries of fully established facts. All empiricism is rationalistic. The speculative theologian starts from an intuition, and approaches reality by way of deduction, explaining the occurring facts by the theory assumed. All speculation is mystical.

Rationalism, however, is not always empirical; nor is mysticism always speculative. In the domain of mysticism, speculative theology has a problem of its own. As Christianity will not content itself by being one of the many religions existing, even not by being the most perfect one of them, but claims to be the absolute religion, the last and complete revelation of God, or as Christianity will not content itself with ruling the will of man, but also demands to rule his intellect, to the exclusion of any foreign or hostile principle, it cannot help coming into conflict with science, which proceeds, and must proceed, on another principle than that of authority. The problem of speculative theology, then, becomes to reconcile knowledge and faith, science and religion, natural civilization and Christianity; and it solves this problem by stripping the fact, scientific or religious, of its crude positivity, uncovering and seizing upon its informing idea, and demonstrating the ideal harmony which results from the discrepancies of reality.

The school of Alexandria presents the first striking instance of a speculative theology. In Alexandria, Christianity met with the Greek philosophy, the ripe fruit of Greek science; and it was as impossible for the one as for the other to avoid conflict. But the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation, or, rather, an amalgamation. They taught that besides faith (πίστις), the simple confidence in the facts of revelation, there is a deeper insight in the mysteries of revelation (γινωσκ), which unfolds the latent working of the λογος in the history of mankind during the incarnation in Christ, and unites Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity into one grand scheme of Divine Providence. None of those theologians — Clement, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa — has given a complete speculative system; but speculative views of peculiar grandeur and depth are scattered all through their writings; and by concentrating the interest on such doctrines as the origin of the world, the origin of evil, the Trinity, the personality of Christ, they gave the whole theology of the Eastern Church a decidedly speculative character. At first the Western Church proved hostile to this tendency. Irenæus and Tertullian considered the philosophers the true heresiarchs, and philosophy the fountain-head of all spiritual errors. Augustine, however, was a genius of rare speculative force. He combated the Manichæans with Platonic and Neo-Platonic ideas; Pelagianism, with profound expositions of the experimental doctrines of sin and grace; and he finally crushed Arianism by a speculative development of the doctrine of the Trinity. From him, and directly from the influence of the Greek Church, through the Arianopagite and Scotus Erigena, a stream of speculation passed into the mediæval theology of the Western Church, which, though sometimes feeble enough, never disappeared altogether. Having mastered the logic of Aristotle, scholasticism was almost wholly occupied with the logical demonstration of the doctrines of the church; and, as a general rule, it was rather averse to speculation. Only the powerful protection of Charles the Bald saved Scotus Erigena from actual persecution, and several of his views were formally condemned by the synods of Valence (855) and Langres (859). Nevertheless, some of the greatest and most orthodox schoolmen felt the need of speculation. In his Monologium, Proslologium, and Cur Deus Homo, Anselm goes behind the authority of the doctrines to establish them on an a priori deduction. And in the writings, not only of the direct pupils of Scotus Erigena, Anselm of Bena, David of Dinanto, but also of the mystics, from the Victorines to Meister Eckart and Tauler, speculative ideas are met with as subtle as profound.

The Reformation had to be practical, or to fail; and consequently it had very little use for speculation. Nevertheless, Zwingli was a scholar and humanist before he became a Reformer; he had a philosophy before religion became his passion, and he felt the need of bringing these two sides of his spiritual character into perfect harmony. His De Providentia shows many traces of a genuine speculative power (see Sigwart: Ulrich Zwingli und Pless von Maradula, 1855). Luther's combativeness also compelled him now and then to borrow from the schoolmen some speculative substruction for his ideas. Thus the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is based on the nominalism of Occam (see Reithberg: Occam und Luther, in Studien und Kritiken, i., 1839; and Schultz: Luther's Ansicht, etc., in Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, iv., 1880). Even Melancthon, who in the beginning of his career was very hostile to scholasticism and philosophy in general, gave, later on, a profound speculative construction of the doctrine of the Trinity (see Herrlinger: Die Theologie Melancthon's, 1879). Some gleams of speculation are also found in the works of Oslander, Schwenkfeld, Brenz, and Keckermann: but the successive periods of orthodoxy, pietism, and rationalism, were very unfavorable to speculative theology; and it died out almost completely, until re-awakened in the beginning of the present century by the startling development of philosophy under Kant and Hegel. Schleiermacher, though he based religion on feeling, — that is, on immediate consciousness as a primal fact of human nature, and thereby hoped to give religion a foundation of its own, independent of philosophy, — was, nevertheless, too much of a philosopher himself to carry out with rigid consistency an empirical principle; and at the same time the right wing of the Hegelian school — Daub, Marheineke, Goeschel, Rosenkranz, Erdmann, Schaller, and others — firmly asserted, that, in the formulas of the Hegelian metaphysics, they had found the key of the mysteries of Christianity, and were able to effect a thorough and final reconciliation between the doctrines of the Christian Church and the spirit of modern civilization. They did not succeed. After the first enthusiasm had gone, the world felt disappointed. But the impulse which speculative theology had received was, nevertheless, by no means spent. In Rother, Martensen, Dörner, Biedermann, and others, it is still working, more cautiously perhaps, but also, it would seem, with a more intense force; and it has become pretty generally recognized, that speculation has become an almost indispensable element of systematic theology. "A theology," says Dörner, "whose last guaranty is the authority of the Church or of Scripture, must always feel embarrassed and anxious when that authority is assailed, even though the points attacked are of slight importance." All authority needs, in order to become truly authoritative to man, to be made part and parcel of his innermost consciousness; and to do that is the proper task of speculative theology.

THEONAS, or THEON, Bishop of Marmarica, in the Egyptian province of Cyrenaica, is mentioned in the synodal letter of Bishop Alexander (see ATHANASIUS: Opera, edit. Montfaucou, i. p. 398) as an adherent of Arius. Indeed, he and his neighbor-bishop, Secundus of Ptolemais, were the only two Egyptian bishops who sided with Arius; and it is probable that their line of conduct was regulated by political rather than by theological reasons. At all events, they absolutely refused at the Council of Nicea (325) to condemn Arius, and were consequently deposed and banished. All notices concerning Theonas are found collected in FILLMONT: Mémoires, vi.

THEOPASCHITES (from theos, "God," and pascho, "I suffer") is a by-name applied to such as accepted the formula, that, in the passion of Christ, "God had suffered and been crucified." The first traces of it are found in the letters of

THEOPHANES OF BYZANTIUM, the confessor; b. about 758; d. 816; not to be confounded with the historian of the same name who lived in the sixth century, and wrote the history of the Persian war (567-573). He was educated at the court of Constantine Copronymus, and held various high offices under Leo IV., but retired during the reign of Irene, and became monk in the monastery of Polychronium, near Sigrion, in Mysia Minor. Afterwards he built a monastery, Ager, in the vicinity of which he became abbot himself. He was an ardent image-worshipper, for which reason he was dragged in chains to Constantinople by Leo the Armenian (813), and banished to the Island of Samothrace. His Chronographia is a chronicle, not very interesting, nor very reliable, of the events, secular as well as ecclesiastical, from Diocletian to Leo the Armenian. The best edition of it is that by CLASSEN, Bonn, 1839, 2 vols. GASS.

THEOPHANES, surnamed Cerameus, flourished in the first half of the eleventh century, and was bishop of Tauramenium, situated between Syracuse and Messina. Sixty-two homilies by him — written in Greek, which was still spoken at that time in his diocese, as in other parts of Sicily — were published by Scorsus, Paris, 1644.

THEOPHANY. After the analogy of the Greeks, especially the Platonists, who understood by theopania the appearance of one or more gods, theologians apply the term to the revelations of God in the Old Testament, and to the incarnation of Christ as the revelation of God in the flesh, and especially at his birth, his baptism, and his second coming. The biblical conception of theophany may be thus stated. (1) By it is never to be understood an immediate revelation of the supermundane Deity himself (John i. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 16); for God reveals himself only in Christ (Matt. xi. 27), and therefore every theophany is really a christophany. (2) The theophany, as christophany, has three great stages of development, (a) The form of Old-Testament manifestation, (b) The incarnation of Christ, (c) Christ's second coming, which will be the completion of the theophany, the revelation of his "glory" (Tit. ii. 13). (3) The theophany or the christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures is the epiphany of the future Christ. It was made in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7, etc.), or of the presence (Exod. xxxiii. 14), or the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The pillar of cloud and of fire was the symbol of his presence; the appearance of the "glory" of God, which in rabbinical terminology was called the Shechinah, was his attribute. (4) The manifestation of God in his christological theophany begins with the miracle of hearing, or the voice of God, which is identical with the voice from heaven, but to be distinguished from the Bath Kol, and ends in the miracle of seeing. (5) The theophany as the objective form of revelation is always accompanied by a vision, and is thus distinguished from an ordinary historical event (2 Kings vi. 17; John xx. 12; Acts ix. 7, cf. xxii. 9, xii. 11). On the other hand, no vision is without a theophanic element, and is thus distinguished from purely subjective hallucination

(Isa. vi. 1; Dan.; Zech.; Acts x. 3). (6) The different forms of divine manifestation can be distinguished only by comparing the predominantly objective theophanic facts with those facts of the vision which are predominantly subjective. (7) The theophanic christophany in a marvellous manner embodies itself in the elements of nature and the life of the soul; is now revealed by the angels, and now by symbols (Gen. iii. 21; Exod. iv. 16; Ps. xviii. 10, civ. 1; Isa. lxi. 3; Mal. ii. 7), but particularly through the Firm and Thummin of the high priest. (8) In the life of Christ all the pre-Christian modes of theophany find a higher unity. In his personal life God himself was revealed. The whole universe was for him a theophanic environment by which his divine nature was attested; because his whole inner life was spent in a constant subjective vision, in which the contrast between ecstasy and the usual consciousness of worldly things did not exist. THEOPHILANTHROPISTS. In September, 1796, during the reign of the Directory, a small pamphlet appeared in Paris, under the title Manuel des Theophilanthropes, by Chemin. The divine worship described in that book had originated as a kind of family worship. During the period when all religious service was positively prohibited, five house-fathers used to gather together their families for common prayer, singing of hymns in honor of God, and listening to moral and patriotic speeches. The basis of the whole organization was pure deism, the last trace left of true religion among the aberrations of atheism. As soon, however, as the pamphlet appeared, several men and women of unblemished character asked for admission to the assemblies. The first public meeting took place on Jan. 5, 1797, in a house in Rue St. Denis; and the persons present agreed upon assembling every Sunday, not because they considered that day in any particular respect sacred, but because it was the most convenient day of the week for the purpose. God, virtue, and the immortality of the soul, formed the three articles of the Theophilanthropist creed; and any one who agreed on those three points could become a member of the association, even though he belonged to some special sect with respect to the further details of his creed.

The movement met at first with great success. One of the members of the Directory, Reveillère-Lepaux, belonged to the association; and the Directory granted it the use of ten churches in Paris. The service it instituted was very simple. The walls of the churches were ornamented with some few moral maxims; the altar was a plain table covered with flowers or fruit; the ministering officer was any one who felt disposed; and the ceremonies were reduced to a minimum of forms. The Christian baptism became a mere presentation and naming of the child; the Christian wedding, a mere announcement of the civil marriage contracted, accompanied with congratulations and admonitions. New members were admitted after a short catechism upon the three articles above mentioned. Over their dead they placed a tombstone with the inscription, "Death is the beginning of eternity." As the Theophilanthropists considered their religion the only true universal religion, because the only true natural religion, they were averse to all kinds of propaganda; for "it is unnecessary to make people Theophilanthropists, since they really are so by nature." But they took much care of the education of their children, and their instruction in good morals.

During the first and second years of their existence the Theophilanthropists formed associations in the provinces. It was easy to predict, however, that a religion which had no roots in the history of the people, and could give no satisfaction to the deepest cravings of human nature, would not prosper for a long time; and indeed, by degrees, as the Christian feeling became re-awakened in the French people, the Theophilanthropist movement died away. "What shall I do to restore my church?" exclaimed Reveillère-Lepaux. "Well, just hang yourself, and rise again the third day," Talleyrand replied. There is a difference between a "religion of rhetoric" and a "religion of facts," which, to his own detriment, he had overlooked. In 1802 the First Consul, Bonaparte, took their churches from the Theophilanthropists, and restored them to the Roman Catholics.

LIT.—The literary monuments of Theophilanthropism have been printed in a collected edition at Basel, 1797-99. See GREGOIRE: Histoire des sectes religieuses, Paris, 1810, 2 vols. [Thomas Paine belonged to the society; and a discourse he delivered before it is published in his Theological Works, ed. Blanchard, Chicago, 1882, pp. 290-297.] HAGENBACH.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Alexandria (385-412), is known from his participation in the Origenistic controversy. Three letters by him, condemnatory of Origen, are still extant in a Latin translation by Jerome. GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., vii.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch (176-186), was educated in Paganism, but was converted to Christianity by the study of the Bible. He was a very able and prolific writer. His principal work, and the only one extant, is his Apology of Christianity, written in 180-181, and addressed to a Pagan friend, Autolytus. The best edition of it is that by Otto, Jena, 1861. His Commentary on the Gospels has probably been enlarged by a later hand. See THEODOR ZAHN: Der Evangeliencommentar des Theophilus von Antiochen, Erlangen, 1883 (in favor of the genuineness); and AD. HAKSACK, in Texte und Untersuchungen, i. Heft. 4, pp. 97-175 (against Zahn). See SCHAFÉ: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., New York, 1883, vol. ii. pp. 732 sqq.

THEOPHYLACT, a celebrated Greek exegete who flourished in the eleventh century, during the reign of Johannes Ducas, — not to be confounded with Theophylactus Simocatti, an Egyptian who flourished about 629, and wrote the history of the Emperor Mauritius. The exegete was a native of Euphras, in the Island of Emboia; lived for some time in Constantinople as tutor to the imperial prince Constantinus Porphyrogenetus; was appointed archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, 1078; and died after 1107. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, which, though generally keeping very close to the track of the elder Fathers, are still worth examining, and far surpass any thing of the kind produced at the same period in the Latin Church. A collected edition of his works appeared in Venice (1751-58), in three volumes. GASS.

THEOPNEUSTY. See INSPIRATION.

THEOSOPHY (from theos, "God," and sophia, "wisdom") is distinguished from mysticism, speculative theology, and other forms of philosophy and theology, to which it bears a certain resemblance, by its claims of direct divine inspiration, immediate divine revelation, and its want, more or less conspicuous, of dialectical exposition. It is found among all nations. — Hindus, Persians, Arabs, Greeks (the later Neo-Platonism), and Jews (Cabala), — and presents itself variously under the form of magic (Agrippa of Nettesheim, Paracelsus), or vision (Swedenborg, Saint Martin), or rapt contemplation (Jacob Boehme, Oettinger). See THILOCK: Säufnisse, Berlin, 1821; FIRST: Die Jüdische Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters, Leipzig, 1845; ROCHOLL: Beiträge zu einer Geschichte deutscher Theosophie, Berlin, 1856.

THEOTOKOS (Θεοτοκος, "God-bearing"), a term definitive of the expression that Christ was one person in two natures. It was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) against Nestorianism. It declared that Mary was the mother of God in the sense that the human nature which he derived from her was most intimately united with deity, so that the person she bore was really divine. The word is now a favorite designation in the Greek Church for the Virgin Mary. See CHRISTOLOGY, p. 455.

THERAPEUTÆ (Θεραπευται, "worshippers"), the name of a sect of ascetics allied to the Essenes, the Buddhists, and early Christian monks described in περὶ βίου θεωρητικῆς ("On a Contemplative Life." See Yonge's translation of Philo, Bohm's edition, vol. iv. 1-20). The treatise was formerly attributed to Philo; but it is now adjudged to be a Christian forgery of an ascetic origin, and the Therapeutæ to be creatures of the imagination. The grounds for this decision are solid. (1) The style of the treatise is not that of Philo. (2) If the book is his, why was the sect not mentioned in Quod omnis probus liber ("On the Virtuous being also Free"), where the Essenes are spoken of? (3) Why is the Greek philosophy despised, the Old Testament apparently neglected, and the word, "the law," so frequent in Philo, displaced by "the priestly law," peculiarities unlike Philo? If the sect ever existed, how comes it that neither Josephus, nor Pliny, nor any one else of antiquity, ever heard of them? This imaginary sect is described minutely. Its members were of both sexes; lived in separate cells, and only united in sabbath worship; had no support save what the charitable gave them; ate only one meal a day, and that exclusively bread and water. Unlike the Essenes, they revered the temple at Jerusalem and the priesthood. The location of the sect was near Alexandria, on the shores of the Marcotic Lake. See LUCIUS: Die Therapeuten und ihre Stellung in der Geschichte der Askese, Strassburg, 1879; and cf. art. "Therapeutes," by E. THEREMIN, Ludwig Friedrich Franz, b. at Gramzow in Brandenburg, March 19, 1780; d. in Berlin, Sept. 26, 1816. He descended from a French family which had sought refuge in Prussia after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; studied theology at Halle and Geneva; was elected pastor of the French-Reformed congregation of Berlin in 1810; and appointed preacher to the court in 1811, and professor of homiletics at the university in 1839. He has a place in the history of homiletics, though he formed no school, and published Die Tugendstunde eine Tugend, Berlin, 1811, 2d ed., 1837 (Eloquence a Virtue, translated by Professor W. G. T. Shedd, Andover, 1850, 3d ed., 1861), and Demosthenes und Massillon, 1845. He was also much appreciated as a preacher, and published ten volumes of sermons, besides several other books of devotion: Abendstunden, 1833-39, 3 vols., 6th ed., 1869.

THERESA, Ste., b. at Avila in Old Castile, March 28, 1515; d. at Alba de Liste, Oct. 15, 1582. She entered the monastery of the Carmelites at her native place in 1531, and began in 1561 on her great task of reforming the Carmelite order. For that purpose she founded at Avila a convent for the Barefooted Carmelites, also called the Theresians, and before she died she had founded seventeen such convents for nuns, and fifteen for monks. The first collected edition of her works, mystical and enthusiastic in their devotion, appeared at Salamanca, 1587; the last in Paris, 1847. There is a complete French translation, edited by Migne, Paris, 1840-46, 4 vols. Her life was written by RIBERA, Salamanca, 1590; BOUCHER, Paris, 1810, 2 vols.; PÖSTL, Ratisbon, 1847; BOUÏX, Paris, 1865; and in English, by MANNING, London, 1865; FRESCHE, 1875. THESSALONIANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.
THESSALONICA, a city of Macedonia, at the north-east corner of the Thermaic Gulf. Its original name was Therna, or Thermé (Θέρμη), i.e., hot bath, so called from the hot salt-springs found about four miles from the present city. Its later name was probably given to it by Cassander, who rebuilt it in B.C. 315, and called it after his wife. It is now called Saloniki. Being well situated for commerce, it was a town of importance from very early times. It was taken from the Macedonians, and occupied by Athenians, about 432; restored soon after; repopled by Cassander, king of Macedonia, 315; became the great Macedonian naval station; surrendered to the Romans after the battle of Pydna, 168, and was made the capital of the second of the four divisions of Macedonia, or Macedonia Secunda, between the Strymon and the Axius; and when the four were reduced to one province, under the jurisdiction of a procurator, it was the virtual metropolis, and there the Cicero lived from April till November, 58, during his exile; and there the party of Pompey and the Senate had their headquarters during the first civil war, 49. It took the side of Octavius (Augustus) against Sextus Pompeius (42-39), and in reward was made a free city. At the opening of the Christian era it was the capital of the whole country between the Adriatic and the Black Sea, and "the chief station on the great Roman road, called the Via Egnatia, which connected Rome with the whole region to the north of the Ægean Sea." Before Constantinople was built, it was virtually the capital of Greece and Illyricum, as well as of Macedonia, and shared the trade of the Ægean with Ephesus and Corinth. In the middle of the third Christian century it was made a Roman "colony;" i.e., soldiers were permanently settled there in order to increase its strength as a bulwark against the Gothic hordes. In 390, in a sedition there, the prefect Boticus was murdered; in dreadful revenge, nearly seven thousand persons were massacred by Theodosius (see art.). From the fourth to the eighth century Thessalonica withstood many attacks from Goths and Slavs. On July 30, 904, it was taken by the Saracens; on Aug. 15, 1185, by the Normans of Sicily, and by the Turks in 1390; ceded to the Greek emperor Manuel, 1403; sold to the Venetians by Andronicus, and finally taken by the Turks from the Venetians, 150. The modern city has a population of eighty thousand, of whom thirty thousand are Jews, and ten thousand Greeks. Its commerce is extensive, and it retains its ancient importance.

The apostle Paul introduced Christianity into Thessalonica upon his second missionary journey, 51. He came with Silas and Timothy, preached for three Sundays in the synagogue there, and, as the result of the work, a church was gathered, principally composed, however, of Gentiles. Among the converts were Caius, Aristarchus, Secundus, and perhaps Jason (Acts xvii. 1-13, xx. 1, xxvii. 2; cf. Phil. iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 10). Paul wrote the Thessalonian Church two epistles from Corinth (close of year 52, or beginning of 53), which are the earliest of his preserved writings, "perhaps the earliest written records of Christianity" (Bishop Lightfoot). In striking proof of the minute accuracy of Luke, upon the arch of the Vardar, so called because it leads to the Vardar, or Axios, there occurs the word πολιτάρχων (politarchas) as the designation of the seven magistrates of the city, a word unmentioned in ancient literature, yet the very word Luke employs to designate them (Acts xvii. 8, πολιτάρχαι).

From Thessalonica the gospel spread quickly all around (1 Thess. i. 8). "During several centuries this city was the bulwark, not simply of the later Greek Empire, but of Oriental Christendom, and was largely instrumental in the conversion of the Slavonians and Bulgarians. Thus it received the designation of the 'Orthodox City'" (Howson). Its bishop baptized the Emperor Theodosius. Its see had well-nigh the dignity of a patriarchate; and it was because Leo III. (Isaurus) severed the trans-Adriatic provinces, which had been under its immediate jurisdiction, from the Roman see, that the division between the Latin and Greek was in great measure caused. Eustathius, metropolitan of Thessalonica (1175-91), was not only a man of great learning, as his invaluable commentary upon Homer proves, but also a true Christian and an able theologian. From 1205 to 1118 there were Latin archbishops in Thessalonica. At the present day it is the seat of a Greek metropolitan, and contains numerous churches and schools of different denominations. Many of the mosques were formerly churches.

THEU'DAS, a popular leader mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 36). He was not the Theudas mentioned by Josephus (Judic. XX. 5, 1); because that Theudas rebelled under Cuspius Fadus, in A.D. 44, some ten years after Gamaliel's speech. Nor was he some obscure person, otherwise unknown; since it is unlikely that Gamaliel would, under the circumstances, allude to such a one. But in all likelihood he was the man called Matthias by Josephus (Judic. XVII. 6, 2, and War. I. 33, 2); because Marnias is the transliteration of Μάρνης, whose Greek translation is Ουδίας, i.e., Ουδης, i.e., Ουδης. This Matthias was a eloquent teacher, who headed a band in the days of Herod, and destroyed the Roman eagle set up by the king over the great gate of the temple.

THEURGY (from θεον theos, "God's work"), a kind of magical science or art which enabled man to influence the will of the gods by means of purification and other sacramental acts. It developed in Alexandria, among the Neo-Platonists, and finally superseded there all philosophical and theological speculation, sinking down into the grossest superstition.

THIETMAR, b. July 25, 976; d. Dec. 1, 1018; a Saxon of noble descent, related to the imperial house; was educated in the cloistral school of Magdeburg, and made bishop of Merseburg in 1009. He wrote a chronicle, of which especially the last four books, comprising the reign of Henry II. (1002-18), are of the greatest importance for the history of Germany. It was edited by Lappenberg, in Mon. Germ. Hist., vol. iii., and translated into German by Laurent, 1849.

THILO, Johann Karl, b. at Langensalza in Thuringia, Nov. 28, 1791; d. at Halle, May 17, 1853. He was educated at Schulpforte, studied at Leipzig, began to lecture at Halle in 1819, and was in 1822 appointed professor of theology there. His Contra Apocryphus A. T. remained incomplete. The first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared 1832, and was followed by Acta apostolorum Petri et Pauli in 1838, and Acta et Matthei in 1846. His Bibliotheca patrum Græcorum dogmatica also remained incomplete. Only one volume, containing the dogmatical works of Athanasius, appeared 1853.

THIRLWALL, Connop, a scholarly English bishop; was b. at Stepney, Middlesex, Feb. 11, 1797; d. at Bath, July 27, 1875. He displayed such remarkable precocity, that in 1809 he published, under his father's direction, a volume of essays and poems entitled Primæ. He was educated at the Charter House and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as senior chancellor's medalist, 1818, and became fellow and tutor; studied law, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1825. He took orders in 1828; became rector at Kirby-under Dede, Yorkshire, and bishop of St. David's, 1840. He resigned his see in 1871. He was an active member of the Old-Testament Company on Bible Revision. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, at the side of those of Grote. Bishop Thirlwall was an intimate friend of Julius Hare, and jointly with him translated two volumes of Niebuhr's History of Rome, 1828-31. He also published a translation of A Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, by Dr. F. Schleiermacher, with an original Introduction (1825). His principal literary work was a History of Greece, published at first in LARDNER'S Cabinet Cyclopædia, 1835-40, and separately (revised edition, London, 1845-52, 8 vols.), and again, 1855, 8 vols. Grote (Preface to his History of Greece, 1846) says he would probably never have conceived of writing a history of Greece if Thirlwall's work had appeared a few years earlier. Thirlwall's letters, charges, etc., are collected under the title of Literary and Theological Remains, edited by Dean PEROWNE, London, 1875-76, 3 vols. See his Letters, 1881, 2 vols., and new edition of his Letters to a Friend, edited by Dean STANLEY, 1882.

THIRTY YEARS' WAR, The (1618-48), one of the fiercest and most protracted of wars, was so far forth a religious war, as at that time religion formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

The war began in Bohemia. In 1517 Ferdinand of Styria, a brother of the Emperor Matthias, a pupil of the Jesuits, and a fanatical enemy of Protestantism, was crowned king of Bohemia; and persecutions were immediately instituted against the Protestants. But the Protestants, under the leadership of Count Thurn, penetrated into the castle of Prague, threw the imperial commissioners out of the window (May 23, 1618), organized a general rising throughout the country, entered into alliance with Bethlen Gabor, prince of Transylvania, and the Evangelical Union in Germany; and as Matthias died on March 20, 1619, and Ferdinand shortly after succeeded him as emperor, they declared the Bohemian throne vacant, and offered it to the young elector-palatine, Friedrich V., a son-in-law of James I. of England. He accepted the offer, but was very unfortunate. The Protestant army was completely routed in the battle at the White Mountain, just outside the walls of Prague, Nov. 8, 1620, by Tilly, the commander of the imperial army, which chiefly consisted of the contingent of the Holy League; and Bohemia was speedily reduced to order; that is, more than thirty thousand families belonging to the Lutheran or the Reformed denomination were driven out of the country, and their property, valued at more than forty million crowns, was confiscated. Next year the Palatinate was invaded by a Spanish army under Spinola; and at the diet of Regensburg, March 6, 1623, Friedrich V. was put under the ban of the empire, and the Palatinate was given to Maximilian of Bavaria, James I. looking on in idleness. In 1625 the Protestant princes of Germany again rallied under the head of Christian IV., king of Denmark, a mediocrity of considerable dimensions, but of a rather coarse description; but he was utterly defeated in the battle at Lutter-am-Barenberge, Aug. 27, 1626, by Tilly. The Danish peninsula was flooded with imperial troops; and the peace of Lubeck, May 22, 1629, made an end of the direct participation of Denmark in the war.

In the latter part of June, 1630, Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, landed in the Island of Usedom; and in a very short time he conquered Pomerania and Mecklenburg. Gustavus Adolphus was a Christian hero, a great general, and a great statesman. The hope of conquest, of making the Baltic a Swedish sea, was, no doubt, one of his motives in taking up the cause of the Protestants in Germany; but his conviction of the justice of that cause was as surely another, and perhaps the stronger one. His army was a model of an army, infinitely superior in moral character to the armies of Tilly and Wallenstein. The Swedish soldiers of Gustavus Adolphus resembled the Ironsides of Cromwell. Tilly was defeated at Breitenfeld, Sept. 17, 1631, and on the Lech, April 15, 1632. In the latter battle he was killed; and his army, composed of mercenary rabble, disappeared like vapor in the air. But Ferdinand charged Wallenstein with the formation of a new army, and Wallenstein was generally considered the equal of Gustavus Adolphus as a general. They met at Lützen, Nov. 16, 1632. Wallenstein was defeated; but Gustavus Adolphus fell, and the emperor found breathing-room again. Though Wallenstein remained inactive in Bohemia, where he finally was assassinated at Eger, Feb. 25, 1634, the standard of the Swedish army rapidly sunk after the death of Gustavus Adolphus; and the Protestant army suffered a severe defeat at Nordlingen, Sept. 6, 1634, after which the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony deserted the Protestant cause, made peace with the emperor, and turned against the Swedes.

Nevertheless, the position of the emperor continued to be very critical, and his prospects of final success were very small. Richelieu, whose whole foreign policy turned upon the humiliation of the house of Austria as its true pivot, and who for that very reason had subsidized the Swedes from the very beginning, now took the army of Duke Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar into French service; and the war against Austria and her allies was carried on with a fierceness and cruelty hitherto unheard of. In 1616 no less than a hundred villages were burnt down in Bavaria, and the inhabitants driven away. And at the same time the Swedish general Torstensson developed an activity which seemed to threaten the very existence of the Hapsburg dynasty. He defeated one Austrian army under Piccolomini at Breitenfeld, Nov. 2, 1642, and another, under Blatzfeld, at Jankow, March 6, 1645; and he actually approached Vienna in order to form a connection with Prince Rakoczy of Transylvania, and lay siege to the city. The immediate danger drifted away by the somewhat peculiar proceedings of Rakoczy. But Austria was completely exhausted; and the peace of Westphalia (which art. see), Oct. 24, 1648, was as necessary to her as it was welcome to Germany, which lay prostrate, and cruelly devastated from one end to the other. THOLUCK, Friedrich August, D.D., an eminent German divine and pulpit orator; b. in Breslau, March 30, 1799; d. in Halle, June 10, 1877. Descended from very humble parentage, he first learned a trade, but by the assistance of friends attended the gymnasium of his native city, and the university of Berlin. When he left college, he delivered an address on The Superiority of the Oriental World over the Christian, which was chiefly an eulogy on Mohammedanism. But during his university course he was thoroughly converted from his pantheism and scepticism, under the influence of the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and more especially by personal intercourse with Baron Ernst von Kottwitz, a member of the Moravian brotherhood, who combined high social standing and culture with a lovely type of piety. His character is finely described in the unnamed "patriarch" in Tholuck's Wilde des Zweiflers. (See Jacobi, Erinnerungen an B. v. K., Halle, 1882.) In 1821 he was graduated as licentiate of theology, and began to deliver lectures as privat-docent. In 1821 he was appointed extraordinary professor of Oriental literature, in the place of Dr. DeWette. In 1825 he made a literary journey to Holland and England, at the expense of the Prussian Government, and in 1826 was called to the university of Halle as ordinary professor of theology, in the place of Dr. Knapp, which he occupied to the time of his death, with the exception of a brief period (1827-28), which he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian embassy on Capitol Hill, in intimate intercourse with Bunsen. In Halle he had at first to suffer a good deal of opposition and reproach from the prevailing rationalism of his colleagues (Gesenius and Weischeder), but succeeded in effecting a radical change; and the whole theological faculty of Halle has since become decidedly evangelical. In Dec. 2, 1870, his friends prepared a surprise for him by the celebration of the semi-centennial jubilee of his professorship. The university and magistrature of Halle, delegates of several universities and of all schools of theology, took part in it; and his pupils in Europe and America founded a seminary adjoining his own home, for beneficiary students of theology, as a perpetual memorial of his devotion to students. He was always in delicate health, but by strict temperance and great regularity of habits he managed to do an unusual amount of work till within the last years of his life. He was incessant in his lectures, preached regularly as university chaplain, and found time to write many books.

His principal works are as follows: Sin and Redemption, or the True Consolation of the Sceptic (Berlin, 1825, many times reprinted; translated into English by Ryland, with an Introduction by John Pye Smith; republished in Boston, 1851, under the title, Guido and Julius, or Sin and the Propagator), in opposition to DeWette's Theology, or the Consolation of the Sceptic, 1825; Blüthen-sammlung aus der morgenländischen Mystik, 1825 (a collection of translations from the mystic poets of the East); Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (11th ed., 1812; twice translated into English, last by R. Menzies, Edinburgh, 1818, 2 vols.), the first exegetical fruit of the new evangelical theology; Commentary on the Gospel of John, 1826 (7th ed., 1857, translated into English by Kaufmann, 1836, and by Dr. C. P. Krauth, Philadelphia, 1839), less thorough and permanent, but more popular, and better adapted for students, than his other commentaries; Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, 1833 (3d ed., 1811; translated into English by R. L. Brown, Edinburgh, 1860; new ed., 1869), his most learned, elaborate, and valuable exegetical production; Commentary on the Hebrews, 1836 (3d ed., 1850; translated by James Hamilton, Edinburgh, 1852); Commentary on the Psalms, 1813 (translated by Dr. Mombert, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1839); The Credibility of the Gospel History, 1837 (2d ed., 1838), a vindication of the Gospels against the mythical theory of Strauss; and Hours of Christian Devotion, 1810, 2 vols. (well translated by Rob. Menzies, Edinburgh and New York, 1875), containing several original hymns. In this book he pours out his fervent evangelical piety with all the charm of fresh enthusiasm. He was one of the most eloquent German preachers in his day, and published a series of university sermons (collected in 5 vols., 3d ed., Gotha, 1863-64, one volume being translated, Light from the Cross, Sermons on the Passion of our Lord, Philadelphia, 1858). He issued also two very interesting volumes of Miscellaneous Essays, 1839. His last works were contributions to German church history since the Reformation, derived in part from manuscript sources; namely, Lutherische Theologie Wittenbergs im 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852), Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852, 1851, in 2 vols.), and Geschichte des Rationalismus (part i, Berlin, 1865, never finished). A complete edition of his works appeared 1863-72, in 11 vols. He also republished the Commentaries of Calvin on the Gospels and Epistles, and his Institutio Christiana Religiosa, and made that great divine better known in Germany, although he himself was of Lutheran descent and predisposition. He conducted for several years a literary periodical, and contributed largely to the first edition of the Encyclopædia of Herzog, whom he recommended as editor to the publisher, having first himself declined the position.

Tholuck was one of the most fruitful and influential German theologians and authors during the second and third quarters of the nineteenth century, and better known in England and America than any other. He was original, fresh, brilliant, suggestive, eloquent, and full of poetry, wit, and humor. He cannot be classified with any school. He was influenced by Pietism, Moravianism, Schleiermacher, Neander, and even Hegel. His elastic mind was ever open to new light. But his heart was always right, and never shaken in faith and love to Christ. He had an extraordinary talent for languages, and could speak English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and several other tongues, ancient and modern, almost like a native. In that line he was scarcely surpassed by Cardinal Mezzofanti, whom he met in Rome. His learning was extensive rather than thorough and exhaustive. He gathered honey from the literature of all ages, from the old Orient down to Goethe, but made it tributary to faith. He is one of the regenerators of German theology, leading it from the barren heath of rationalism to the green pastures of the Scriptures and the literature of the Reformation. His Commentaries broke a new path. His personal influence was as great and good as that exerted by his works, and yields only to that of Neander among his contemporaries. He was gifted with personal magnetism, and brilliant powers of conversation. Having no children, he devoted all his paternal affections to his students, and was nobly assisted by his second wife (a most lovely and refined Christian lady). He loved, as he said, candidates more than ministers, and students more than candidates, because he was more interested in the process of growth than in the result of growth. His life was a life with the young, fruitful in blessings. He was in the habit of taking long walks with two or three students every day from eleven to twelve, and from four to five: he invited them freely to his house and table, tried experiments on their minds, proposed perplexing questions, set them disputing on high problems, inspired and stimulated them in the pursuit of knowledge, virtue, and piety. He had great regard for individuality, aimed to arouse in every one the sense of his peculiar calling rather than to create a school. Like John the Baptist, he sent all away from him to a higher Master. His chief aim was to lead them to a humble faith in the Saviour, and to infuse into them that love which was the ruling passion of his heart. He adopted, as he says, Zinzendorf's motto, "I have but one passion, and that is He, and He alone." His lecture-room was truly a school of Christ. And herein lies his chief significance and merit. Thousands of students from different lands owe to him their spiritual life. To Americans he was especially attached, and a most useful guide in the labyrinth of German theology. He was very intimate with Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. Charles Hodge (who studied at Halle in 1827, and was daily in his company), Dr. Henry B. Smith, Dr. Prentiss (who studied there in 1840), and Dr. Park of Andover. He called them "his American pets." I once met him promenading with a pious Canadian Methodist, and an American sceptic who never went to church, but worshipped God, as he said, in his own temple, under the blue skies, and basking in the light of the sun. "But," asked Tholuck smilingly, "what do you do when it rains?" He told me afterwards that this agnostic was seeking religion, and we must aid him. He often tried the wits of American students by curious questions; e.g., "Why did God make so many Chinese, and so few Yankees?" or, "How is Mr. Echoboeper?" (Probably, the philanthropist?). He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and promised to the writer to come (with the humorous remark, "I am afraid of your American mobs, your hot cakes for breakfast, and especially of your kindness"). But his feeble health prevented him; and he sent one of his favorite pupils as his representative, with a modest sketch of his labors and the condition of theology in Germany. It is the last public document from his pen except some letters, and gives a faithful idea of this lover of youth for Christ's sake.

LIT.—The biography of Tholuck was originally intrusted to his colleague, Professor Martin Kähler, but was written by Professor LEOPOLD WITTE, Das Leben D. Friedrich August Gottlieb Tholuck's, Bielefeld, 1884-86, 2 vols. Cf. WITTE, in the Proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance Conference of 1873, New York, 1871, pp. 85-89; an account of the semi-centennial jubilee of Tholuck, by Professor KÄHLER, in German, Halle, 1871, and in English by SCHAFF, with two letters from Tholuck, in the American Presbyterian Review for 1871, pp. 295-301. THOMAS THE APOSTLE was also known by the Greek equivalent Didymus, meaning twain. In the Gospels he is associated with Matthew (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15); in the Acts, with Philip (Acts i. 13). He was probably a Galilean, as the mention of his name with the other Galilean fishermen among the apostles (John xxi. 2) seems to indicate. According to the oldest tradition, he was born in Syrian Antioch, preached the gospel to the Parthians, and was buried at Edessa (Euseb., III. 1; Socrat., I. 19, etc.). According to later statements, he preached to the Medes and Persians, baptized the three kings [the wise men from the East]; and Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 25) speaks of his laboring in India, where a later tradition makes him suffer a martyr's death by being pierced to death by lances at the king's command. The Thomas Christians show his grave at Meliapur, India. His relics, according to the tradition of the Catholic Church, were removed to Edessa, and thence to Ortona, Italy. The Greek Church commemorates his memory June 3; the Latin Church, Dec. 21. The name "Thomas Christians," by which the old Christians of India were known, seems to confirm the tradition that Thomas labored in India; but this conclusion is denied by Philo and others. [See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, and NESTORIANS.]

Two apocryphal works are associated with the name of Thomas. The Gospel according to Thomas [Evang. sec. Thomæ, edited by Tischendorf, who gives two Greek texts and a Latin translation, and by Dr. W. Wright in Syriac], and The Acts of Thomas (Acta Thomæ), edited by Philo, Leipzig, 1823. Our authority for a characterization of Thomas is three passages in John's Gospel (xi. 16, xiv. 5, xx. 21). They present him as one whom a deep earnestness of spirit inclined to melancholy, and a desire of knowledge made a doubter. He is the representative, among the apostles, of the critical spirit. By the way of honest doubt and questioning, he arrived at an imperturbable and joyous conviction and faith. [See BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, for the legendary additions to his life. For a translation of the Gospel of Thomas, see B. HARRIS COWPER: The Apocryphal Gospels, London, 1867, pp. 118-170. At the appearance of Thilo's and Tischendorf's editions of the Greek Acts of Thomas, only five of the twelve divisions extant in Latin and Syriac versions existed in Greek. But in 1883 Max Bonnet published an edition of the twelve complete, from a Greek manuscript he discovered in the National Library in Paris (Acta Thoma, Leipzig). The most exhaustive treatise upon the subject is LUNDS: Die Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten u. Apostellegenden, Braunschweig, 1883, vol. i. pp. 225-317.] J. P. LANGE.

THOMAS OF AQUINO (or Aquinas), the profoundest and keenest defender of the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in 1225 or 1227, in the castle of Rocca Sicca, near Aquino, a city not far from Naples; d. March 6, 1271, in the Cistercian convent of Fossa Nuova, near Terracina. 1. Life.—Thomas, who was of noble birth, was placed in his fifth year under the monks of Monte Casino. In his tenth year he went to Naples; and in his sixteenth year, in spite of the opposition of his family, which was finally overcome by the intervention of Pope Innocent IV., he entered the Dominican order. In 1215 he was sent to Cologne to enjoy the instruction of Albertus Magnus, who directed his attention to Aristotle's philosophy and the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. In 1218 he was made baccalaureate of theology in Paris, and the same year began to lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, at Cologne. Returning to Paris, he taught there a large throng of students. Urban IV. repeatedly offered him high ecclesiastical preferment, which he in his humility declined. Under the pontificate of Clement IV. and till 1268, he taught in Rome, Bologna, and Paris. In 1272, in obedience to his order and the wish of King Charles, he made Naples the seat of his activity. The last years of his life were principally occupied with the completion of his great work, Summa theologica. He died on his way to the church council at Lyons. In 1323 he was canonized by John XXII. If any one is entitled to this dignity by his life and works, Aquinas was. His piety, though monkish, was unfeigned; and he prepared himself for his writings, lectures, etc., by prayer. Louis IX. several times consulted him on matters of state. His industry, as his writings show, was intense. [Aquinas was declared a doctor of the church by Pius V. in 1567, and has a place with Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose, among the most authoritative teachers of the church. Leo XIII., in an encyclical dated Aug. 1, 1879, recommended his works to the Catholic seminaries and theological faculties throughout the world, as a proper foundation of their religious and philosophical teaching, and particularly emphasized his political doctrines as conservative for society. The special title of this great theologian is the "Angelic Doctor," Doctor Angelicus.]

II. Theology.—In certain respects, Thomas of Aquino marks the culminating point of scholasticism. He sought to establish for the science of theology a position of superior dignity and importance over the science of philosophy, and, on the other hand, the harmony of the two sciences, by distinguishing in revelation the religious truths which can be exegocitated by the use of reason from those which are only known by revelation. The doctrinal creed of the church, Thomas treats as absolute truth; but it is a remarkable fact, that he uses the arguments of the church-teachers only as of probable authority (Summa theol., i. qu. 1, art. 8). He refers more frequently to biblical texts than the other scholastics; but this practice does not purify his theology, but helps to confirm the church-doctrines. His exegetical principles were good; and he expressly commended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, omnes sensus scripture fundantur super unum sensum liberalem ex quo solo potest trahi argumentum, etc. (Summa, i. qu. 1, art. 10), but could not free himself from ecclesiastical authority. Thomas did not grant the ontological argument of Anselm for the existence of God. He gives several forms of the cosmological and teleological arguments, but says, that, while reason can prove that God exists, it cannot discover what his nature is. His fundamental conception of God is that of spiritual and active being. God is intelligence and will (intellectus et voluntas), the first cause. Thinking and willing are inseparable from his being. He is consequently forever returning to the idea of the absolute identity and simplicity of God. He employs all his speculative talent to explain the doctrine of the Trinity; and yet he declares that it is beyond the sphere of reason to discover the distinction of persons in the Godhead, and affirms that he who tries to prove the doctrine of the Trinity by the unaided reason derogates from faith; qui probare nititur Trinitatem personarum naturali ratione, fidei derogat (Summa, i. qu. 32, art. 1). Although Thomas did not, like his teacher Albertus Magnus, regard the world as an emanation from God, he refers its origin to God's active will, which is nothing more than his active intelligence, which, in turn, is only the essence of God working as the first cause. He is again and again forced to regard the world as a necessary product of the Divine Being, and inclines to the thesis of its eternal existence; so that he contents himself with saying, "It is credible that the world had a beginning, but neither demonstrable nor knowable; mundum incepisse credibile est, sed non demonstrabile et scibile" (Summa, i. qu. 46, art. 2). The doctrines of election and reprobation he considers in connection with the doctrine of providence. Every thing occurs under the Divine Providence, and serves a single and final end. Both reprobation and election are matters of divine decree; and the exact number of the reprobate, as well as of the elect, is determined in advance. Reprobation, however, consists not in a positive action on God's part, but in a letting-alone. God is not the cause of sin. He simply withholds his grace, and man falls by his own will. In opposition to the Arabic philosophers, Thomas insists upon the efficiency of second causes (Summa, i. qn. 105, art. 5), through which God works. He lays emphasis on the ability of the will to choose between two tendencies in the interest of the doctrines of guilt and merit.

Passing over to the creatures of God, Thomas dwells at length upon the subject of the angels, which he discusses with minute care and speculative skill. He teaches, with Augustine, that the original righteousness of Adam was a superadded gift. He spent special pains upon the elaboration of the doctrine of Christ's person and work. He affirms the meeting in Christ of the two absolutely opposite principles of human ignorance and imperfection, and divine omniscience and perfection. He departs in some details from the Anselmic doctrine of Christ's work, as when he denies the absolute necessity of the incarnation, and affirms that God might have redeemed man in some other way than by his Son. A human judge cannot release from punishment without expiation of guilt; but God, as the Supreme Being, can forgive without expiation, if he so chooses (Summa, iii. qn. 46, arts. 1, 2). The satisfaction of Christ removes all original guilt; and, by the application of his merit, the sinner secures freedom from and forgiveness of sin. Man's nature is corrupt, and grace alone enables him to reach eternal life. Thomas passes directly from the consideration of the work of Christ to the sacraments. The number of the sacraments had already been fixed at seven, but his treatment had a shaping influence upon the discussion of the subject in after-time. He proved the necessity of seven sacraments, and the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His treatment of the Eucharist, penance, and ordination, is characteristic. He held to the change of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, justified the withholding of the cup from the laity with casuistical arguments, and spoke of the sacrifice of the mass, now as a "symbolical picture of the passion" (imago representationis passionis), now as a real sacrifice. It is noticeable, that, in his doctrine of the mass, he does not emphasize, as do his successors, the idea of sacrifice to the detriment of the sacramental idea. The subject of indulgences, Thomas handled at length; teaching that the efficacy of an indulgence does not depend upon the faith of the recipient, but upon the will and authority of the church, and extends to the dead as well as to the living (Summa, iii. qn. 71, art. 10). The discussion of eschatology follows the discussion of the sacraments. Thomas teaches the doctrines of purgatory and the intercession of saints. He treats the doctrines of the resurrection and future blessedness at length, and teaches that the body of the resurrection will in form be identical with the present body, even to the hair and the nails.

Thomas was not less great as a teacher of ethics than as a theologian. Neander has said, that, next to that of Aristotle, his is the most important name in the history of ethics (Wissenschaft. Abhandlungen, ed. Jacobi, p. 16). But both as a moralist and a theologian he was a true son of the church. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. In the spirit of the day he discussed many idle and useless questions with casuistical minuteness and far-fetched argumentation. But he was in this respect more moderate than his contemporaries. On the other hand, he discussed many important subjects with a depth and clearness of insight which make his views permanently interesting and valuable.

After the death of Aquinas, a conflict went on over his theology; Duns Scotus being the leader of the other school. The Dominicans were ranged on the side of Aquinas, whose followers were called Thomists; and the Franciscans on the side of Duns Scotus, whose followers were known as Scotists. The difference between the teachers was not in the doctrines they taught, but in their treatment of these doctrines. With Scotus, theology was a practical science; with Aquinas, a speculative science. The controversy lasted down to the eighteenth century; and the Franciscan De Rada mentions in his work, Controversia inter Thomam et Scotum (Cologne, 1620), no less than eighty-six points of difference between the two schools. The most important points of controversy were the cognoscibility of God, the distinction between the divine attributes, original sin, the merits of Christ, etc. On the subject of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, the two teachers held divergent views; Thomas denying it, Scotus asserting it. The Jesuits opposed Thomism, as Bellarmine's example proves; but it prevailed at the Spanish universities of Salamanca, Coimbra, and Alcala. The Roman-Catholic Church cannot forget the most profound and penetrating defender of its doctrines until it renounces them; and the Protestant Church will not fail to share in the admiration of Thomas Aquinas so long as it continues to admire literary greatness.

LIT.—The principal works of Thomas on theology are his Commentary on Peter the Lombard's Sentences, a work of his earlier years, in which his own system is worked out; the Compendium theologicum (incomplete); the Summa de veritate fidei catholicae, or Adversus Gentiles, whose purpose was apologetic, to defend the creed of the church; and Summa totius theologiae, the work of his ripe thought, which, however, breaks off at the doctrine of penance, and was completed in the fifteenth century, from the Commentary on the Lombard's Sentences. His exegetical works include some commentaries on the Old Testament, a commentary on the Pauline Epistles, and a valuable one on the Gospels (Aurea catena in Evangelia), containing excerpts from eighty church writers. Complete editions of the works of Aquinas have appeared at Rome, 1572, 17 vols. [1882 sqq., ed. Zigliara]; Antwerp, 1612; Paris, 1660, 23 vols.; Venice, 1787, 28 vols.; Parma, 1852-71, 25 vols. [Migne has published an edition of the Summa theologiae, Paris, 1841 sqq., in 4 vols. There is another edition by Nicolai, Sylvius, Billuart, and Drioux, Regensburg, 1876, 8 vols. An English translation of the Catena aurea appeared at Oxford, 1845 (7 parts); a French translation of the Summa theologiae, by Drioux, Paris, 1850-51, 8 vols. THOMAS OF CELANO, a native of Celano in Abruzzo Ulteriore; was appointed custos of the Minorite monasteries of Cologne, Mayence, Worms, and Spire, by Caesarius of Spire, the first provincial of the Franciscan order in Germany, about 1221. Nothing more is known about him; but the authorship of the oldest biography of St. Francis of Assisi, and of the celebrated hymn, Dies ica, dies illa, is generally ascribed to him. With respect to the biography, there is nothing which positively contradicts his claims; though it is singular that Mark of Lisbon, in enumerating the twenty-five first and most noted pupils of St. Francis, does not mention Thomas, while the biography evidently is written by one who lived familiarly with the saint from an early date. With respect to the hymn, Bartholomew Albizzi of Pisa is the first who mentions him as the author, in Liber confortatorum (1385); and most of the other claimants or pretenders are absolutely impossible. PALMER.

THOMAS OF VILLANOVA, b. at Fuenlana, in the diocese of Leon, 1187; d. at Valencia, Nov. 8, 1555. He studied at Alcalá; entered the order of the Augustinian hermits in 1517; became the provincial of his order for Andalusia and Castile; confessor to Charles V., and in 1541 bishop of Valencia. In 1668 he was canonized by Alexander VII., Act. Sanct., Sept. 5. He published some sermons and a Commentary on the Canticles; published at Alcalá 1581, Brescia 1613, Cologne 1614, and Augsburg 1757. His life was written by Quevedo, and translated into French by Maimbourg, Paris, 1666.

THOMASIN OF ZIRKLARIA, in Tyrol, flourished in the beginning of the thirteenth century, and wrote in 1215 Der deutsche Gast, a didactic poem, which inaugurated that long series of poems so interesting for the moral and religious history of the middle ages. Though it does not mention the Virgin, and says some sharp truths concerning the church, it is not polemical against the pope and the priests. It was first printed at Leipzig, 1852, ed. by H. Ruckert. See L. Diestel, in Kieler Allgem. Monatsschrift, August, 1852.

THOMASIVS, Gottfried, b. at Egenhausen, Franconia, 1802; d. at Erlangen, Jan. 21, 1875.

He studied theology at Erlangen, Halle, and Bonn, and was appointed preacher at Nuremberg in 1829, and professor of systematic theology at Erlangen in 1842. His studies were principally occupied with the history of doctrines, and in that line he published Origines, Nuremberg, 1837, and Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 1874-76, 2 vols.

THOMASSIN, Louis, b. at Aix, Aug. 28, 1649; d. in Paris, Dec. 21, 1697. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1682, taught for some time philosophy at Lyons, afterwards theology at Saumur and in the seminary of St. Magloire in Paris, until he in 1668 retired in order to devote his whole time to study. His first work was his Dissertationes in concilia generalia et particularia, 1672; but his principal work is his Invenio et novelle discipline de l'église touchant les benéfices et les bénéfices, 1678-79, 3 vols. fol., which he translated into Latin, and which is said to have made a very deep impression on Innocent XI.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, Aug. 7, 1819; was graduated at Yale, 1838; ordained October, 1840; pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York from 1845 till 1871, when, on account of ill health, he resigned, and went to Germany, and d. in Berlin, Sept. 20, 1879.

In 1843 he became associated with five other gentlemen in establishing and conducting The New-England. In 1848, in connection with Drs. Leonard Bacon, Joshua Leavitt, and Richard S. Storrs, he established The Independent, a weekly newspaper which at once became a leader of public thought on all matters affecting the welfare of the nation and the kingdom of Christ. For fourteen years a large measure of editorial responsibility for the paper devolved upon Dr. Thompson. Apart from this editorial work, he was a prolific writer of books, addresses, occasional pamphlets, and reviews. The list of his separate publications includes more than ninety titles; among them are, The Theology of Christ in his own Words (1870), The United States as a Nation (1877), and Church and State in the United States (1873), a work which was printed in German, French, Italian, and English.

During thirty-one years of pastoral work he recognized the paramount claims of the pulpit upon his best energies; and though he had unusual gifts as a platform speaker, and peculiar facility in adapting himself to his surroundings, he rarely ventured to appear in the pulpit without an elaborate written sermon. This conscientious fidelity in official work was rewarded with large success, and his congregation came to be one of the largest and most intellectual in the metropolis. At the same time he bore a conspicuous part in the missionary work of his denomination and in its local councils, as well as in movements to promote general philanthropy and reform.

No sketch of this period of his life would be complete which did not hold up to view the immense influence which he exerted by pen and voice in the pulpit, on the platform, and in every appropriate way, in the discussions which preceded the overthrow of slavery. At a time when slavery found apologists in Northern pulpits, when anti-slavery sentiments were unpopular to the last degree, when criticism of the fugitive-slave law exposed one to obloquy, when an appeal to a higher law was denounced even by the religious press, he had the nerve to do what many shrink from doing, and the pluck to carry out his convictions in speech and act. In all this he was untrammelled by ecclesiastical or political ties; and it is believed that few men of this generation have exerted a larger influence over thoughtful minds in the elucidation of principles and the application of those principles to the life of the nation. During the whole period of the civil war he labored with assiduity for the maintenance of national unity on principles of universal freedom. Unfortunately, these arduous labors, in connection with personal exposure while on a visit to the Union army as an officer of the Sanitary Commission, resulted in such physical prostration, that in 1871 he was compelled to resign his pastoral office, and seek repose abroad.

A visit to Egypt as long ago as 1853 had led him to take a deep interest in Egyptology, and to make extensive preparations for writing an elaborate work on the Life and Times of Moses. It was his hope that a residence in Berlin would enable him to carry out this design. He did not readily abandon it; but his temperament was such that he could never be indifferent to the living questions of the hour; and finding in Germany a state of things which seemed to call for a defence of American institutions, and an exposition of American ideas, he took up that line of work, and became, as Professor Dornier fitly said, "a living link" between the United States and Germany. Though a private citizen, without emolument or rank, his residence in Berlin brought him into intimate relations with statesmen and scholars. Year after year he was called on to make the annual "Thanksgiving" address in the American chapel. In 1873, in the dead of winter, he went to Thorn, on the confines of Germany, to represent the American Geographical Society at the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Copernicus. In Berlin he made addresses commemorating Agassiz, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He regularly attended the meetings of the Association for the reform and codification of the Law of Nations, and contributed papers which were held in high esteem by jurists. Three years in succession he spoke on the Papacy and Protestantism in Glasgow, where the papers styled him "that fiery American from Berlin." Many of his addresses and papers were designed to show that difficulties which threatened the peace of Europe were to be overcome by following the American plan of separating Church and State. During the "centennial" year he vindicated his native land against European prejudices by a course of six philosophical lectures on American political history, which he delivered in Berlin, Florence, Dresden, Paris, and London. His personal influence secured the insertion, in the Berlin Treaty of 1878, of a clause favoring religious liberty. Among his last works was the preparation, for the Evangelical Alliance at Basle (1879), of a memorial in behalf of religious liberty in Austria. The paper was adopted; and the Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one, — the sole representative from the United States, — to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this result, he said, looking at his helpless arm, "This old hand has struck one more blow for liberty." Before the deputation could fulfil its mission, he died in Berlin, and was buried in the cemetery of the Jerusalem Church. EDWARD W. GILMAN.

THOMSON, Andrew, D.D., Scotch Presbyterian; b. at Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, July 11, 1779; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 9, 1831. He was graduated at the university of Edinburgh, and at his death was pastor of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. He made a memorable attack upon the British and Foreign Bible Society for circulating the Apocrypha. He "opposed the abuses of lay-patronage in the Church of Scotland, effectually denounced British colonial slavery and other evils, and did much to promote education, morality, and evangelical religion in Scotland" (Allibone). He published several volumes of sermons and lectures: for list, see ALLIBONE'S Dictionary, s.v. The memorial volume of Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations (Edinburgh, 1831, Boston, 1832) contains his memoir.

THOMSON, Edward, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Portsea, Eng., Oct. 12, 1810; d. at Wheeling, W. Va., March 22, 1870. He with his father came to America in 1818, and settled in Wooster, O., 1820. He was graduated in medicine at the university of Pennsylvania in 1829. Brought up a Baptist, he joined the Methodist Church, December, 1831, and was admitted to the Annual Conference in 1831. From 1838 to 1843 he had charge of the Norwalk Seminary, Ohio: from 1844 to 1846 he was editor of the Ladies' Repository; from 1846 to 1860, president of the Ohio Wesleyan University; and from 1860 to 1864, editor of the New-York Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected bishop, and in that capacity made an extensive tour through Europe and the East. Among his publications may be mentioned Educational Essays, new ed., Cincinnati, 1856; Moral and Religious Essays, 1856; Evidences of Revealed Religion; Our Oriental Missions, — India, China, and Bulgaria, 2 vols.

THOMSON, James, b. at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, Sept. 11, 1700; d. at Kew Lane, near Richmond, Aug. 27, 1748; studied at Edinburgh, and went to London 1724; held government posts, and was patronized by the Prince of Wales; wrote The Seasons, 1726-30; Liberty, 1735-36; The Castle of Indulgence, 1748; several tragedies, etc. Memorable here for A Hymn on the Seasons and A Paraphrase on the Latter Part of the Sixth Chapter of St. Matthew. F. M. BIRD.

THORAH (the law). 1. The Feast of the Law. — On the evening of the eighth day, which concludes the feast of tabernacles, commences what is called the "Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law," — which fitly celebrates the termination of the year, — by reading of the law and the beginning of another cycle. Two of the richest men of the synagogue are chosen to perform the ceremonies connected with the festival. The first, called the "Bridegroom of the Law," after the singing by the cantor of a long Hebrew formula of address, reads Deut. xxxiii. 27-xxxiv. 12, the closing verses of the Pentateuch; the other, called the "Bridegroom of Genesis," after a similar introduction, reads Gen. i.-ii. 3. The two "bridegrooms" distribute alms and presents. The festival is of Babylonish origin.

2. The Writing of the Law-scrolls, being an honorable and important work, can only be intrusted to a grown-up and experienced man. The scrolls are made of parchment prepared expressly for the purpose by a Jew from the hide of a clean animal slaughtered by a Jew. It must not be so porous or thin as to allow the writing to show through. The leaves should be joined by gut-string from a clean animal; but silk may, if necessary, be used. If a thread breaks, it can be once joined; if it breaks again, it must be thrown aside. The leaves thus fastened together are rolled upon a wooden rod with wooden or silver handles. Each leaf has an upper margin not less than three fingers broad, and a lower not less than four, and a space between every two columns two fingers broad. No column must be wider than half the height of the leaf, nor have less than forty-eight, or more than sixty lines. No line must be longer than three four-syllable words, or leave space for more than thirty letters. The leaf is lined before the writing begins. The ink is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and pounded charcoal, with honey; and the mass is then thoroughly dried. The ink is prepared for use by being moistened with water colored by gall-nuts. The writing-instrument is a stylus. The sample to be copied must be fully correct. No word may be divided. The square character is the only one used. They must be placed equidistantly. The letters א, ב, ג, ד, ה, ו, ז, ח, ט, י, ק, ל, מ, נ, ס, ע, פ, צ, ר, ש, ת, must have each three little strokes; נ, little points on the head; פ, should have in it a double broken line, as if two "p's" were written one within the other. Where the sign ש stands, there must be a space left of three, where פ, of nine, letters; for these signs marked off the sections. At the close of the book there must be left a space of four lines. With particular care the sacred name "Jehovah" (יהוה) is to be written. Before beginning, the pen must be wiped, then dipped carefully in the ink, so that it may not blot. No word must the scribe speak while writing it and the next three words, not even if the king spoke to him. If in the copy a mistake is made, it must be corrected within thirty days: otherwise the copy cannot be used. If there are more than four mistakes on a leaf, it must be discarded. Every Jew must either write a roll, or have one written. If he inherits one, he cannot sell it, except for money to support himself during his studies, or to pay his wedding-expenses, or to buy his freedom. A thoroughly correct law-roll is the object of especial respect. So long as it is open, no one may spit, move out his foot, or turn his back. When it is carried by, all must stand. The bearer must assume the attitude of the profoundest reverence. It is delinquent to touch the text with the naked finger: therefore a hand holding a silver stylus is used to trace the words with in the public reading. To pack up the rolls, and carry them upon beasts of burden, is forbidden: they must be carried by riders, and close to their hearts.

THORN, The Conference of (Colloquium caritativum), took place in 1645. In Poland the attempt at reconciling the various Christian denominations was not altogether fruitless. The Bohemian Brethren and the Reformed entered into community with each other in 1555. A consensus was established between those two parties on the one side, and the Lutherans on the other, in 1570; and in 1573 the Pax Dissidentium, a kind of toleration act, became part of the Polish constitution. Nevertheless, the arrogance and intrigues of the Jesuits every now and then produced great irritation, and utterances of jealousy and rancor were by no means wanting. As now, the overwhelming majority of the population of Poland proper was Roman Catholic, while in the two greatest fiefs of the Polish crown (Courland and Prussia) the majority of the population was evangelical, it became to the king of Poland a problem of the greatest political moment to prevent an open and general outburst of discord. For this purpose, Ladislaus IV. invited twenty-eight representatives of each of the three Christian denominations found in his realm to meet at Thorn, and by a congress of three months' duration to try to come to some general agreement. The most prominent among the Roman-Catholic representatives were Bishop Georg Tyszkiewicz of Samogitia; the Jesuit, Gregory Schonhof; the Carmelite, Hieronymus Cyrus a St. Hyacintho; and the former Protestant, Bartholomew Nigrinus, preacher in Dantzic; among the Reformed, Johann Bergius, court-preacher to the elector of Brandenburg; Fr. Reichel from Francfort-on-the-Oder; Amos Comenius, bishop of the Moravian Brethren; Johann Bythner, superintendent of Great Poland; and Zbigniew Gorayski, castellan of Culm; among the Lutherans, Hulsemann from Wittenberg; Calovius and Botsack from Dantzic; Georg Calixtus from Helmstadt; Mich. Behm from Königsberg; and Sig. Guldenstern, starost of Sturin. The conference opened Aug. 18, 1645, under the presidency of Prince Georg Ossolinski, chancellor of the Polish crown, and closed Nov. 21, same year. No result was arrived at. The Lutherans showed the same unmitigated hatred to the Reformed as to the Roman Catholics. They began with foul intriguing among themselves, in order to exclude Calixtus, whom they knew to be in favor of a union, from any active participation in the debate. They went on disturbing the business of the assembly with ridiculous questions of etiquette (who should sit on the front seats, — the Lutherans, or the Reformed; who should make the opening prayer, — a Lutheran, or a Reformed, etc.); but they were finally debarred from participating in the debate, as the other representatives chose to speak Polish, which the Lutheran theologians did not understand. The principal points of controversy between the Reformed and the Roman Catholics were the demand of the former to style themselves catholic, and the refusal of the latter to incorporate with the official acts of the conference the Confession which the Reformed had presented to the assembly, and which had been read in a general session, — the so-called Declaratio Thorunensis. The Roman Catholics were, as Schonhof happened to intimate, afraid that their own flock, by reading the Reformed Confession in the report, should find it too sensible, and lose something of their fanaticism. The assembly separated, however, with many courteous compliments: whence it has been called caritativum.

LIT. — The official Acta Concilii Thorunensis (Warsaw, 1646) are very defective. A better report is given in CALOVUS, Historia syncretistica, though it is full of printing errors. The publication of the acts gave, of course, rise to some bitter controversies. There appeared a Calvinische Relation, of which Hulsemann wrote a Widerlegung; also Calixtus wrote a Widerlegung against Weller, Helmstadt, 1651. See HERING: Bekämpf. der Geschichte der reformirten Kirche in Preussen, Berlin, 1787. KRASINSKI: History of the Reformation in Poland, Lond., 1842. HENKE.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, is supposed to have been born in 1598, but no satisfactory proof of this date can be found; nor is it known where he was first educated, it being certain, however, that he became a pensioner at Cambridge in 1613, and a Trinity-College scholar the following year. He was made canon of Lincoln in 1636; vicar of Claybrooke, Leicestershire, in 1639; rector of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1642; master of Sidney College in 1643. Being a staunch Churchman of the Anglo-Catholic type, he was ejected from his preferments during the civil wars, but restored to them at the Restoration. He, however, resigned them on being appointed a stall at Westminster Abbey in 1661. He published a Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic lexicon in 1655, assisted Walton in the preparation of his Polyglot during the Commonwealth, and designed an edition of Origen, which he did not execute. He also entered into plans for preserving and restoring episcopal institutions in those unsettled times. He assisted at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and had a share in the revision of the Prayer-Book the same year, being then a member of convocation. He resumed his residence at Cambridge, in broken health, in 1662, and afterwards divided his time between the university and the abbey. The plague drove him from Cambridge in 1666; after which he vacated his fellowship, and died at Chiswick in 1672. He is best known by his writings, and must be regarded as the most learned, the most systematic, and the most powerful advocate of Anglo-Catholic theology and High-Church principles in the seventeenth century. His theological works, which include a number of treatises, have been collected in the Oxford edition of six volumes, 1811-57. This edition presents a model of editorship; being enriched with explanatory notes, which form a guide to the study of controversial theology in general, and not only as it appeared in Thorndike's day. The book which most succinctly unfolds his scheme is entitled An Epilogue to the Tragedy of the Church of England (1659), in which he treats of the principles of Christian truth, the covenant of grace, and the laws of the church. The covenant of grace is his central idea. He dwells upon the condition of the covenant as being baptism, the necessity of the covenant as arising out of original sin, the mediator of the covenant as the divine Christ, and the method of the covenant as an economy of grace. In the treatment of this branch, he brings out the Anglican doctrines of salvation as distinguished from those of Puritanism. His trains of thought are prolix and excursive, and his style is crabbed and unreadable. His works could never be popular, but they demand the attention of all who would be accomplished theological scholars [see STOUTON: Religion in England, 1881, 6 vols. (Index)]. JOHN STOUTON.

THORNTON, Robert H., D.D., an early, earnest, and laborious minister of the Canadian Presbyterian Church; b. in the parish of West Calder, Scotland, April, 1806; d. in Oshawa, Can., Feb. 11, 1875. He was descended from a godly ancestry. His father was an elder in the church, and his mother was a woman of singular piety. At the early age of fourteen he became the assistant of his elder brother, Patrick, as a teacher of a school in Falkirk, where, with great diligence and self-denial, he prosecuted his classical studies. He entered the university of Edinburgh well prepared, and took a high place in his classes. He obtained the warm commendation of the professors, specially of Professor Wilson, who characterizes him in a certificate as "a most able student." Attracted by the fame of Dr. Thomas Chalmers, he attended a session at St. Andrews. In 1829 he entered the Divinity Hall of the Secession Church in Glasgow, and for four years attended the lectures of Dr. Dick and Dr. Mitchell, nomina nobilissima. In 1833 he was licensed and ordained as a missionary to Canada. He began his labors in that province in July, 1833, along the north shore of Lake Ontario, a territory at that time wild, and sparsely settled. He was installed as pastor of a congregation in the township of Whitty, which formed the centre of his widely extended evangelistic and missionary circuit. His labors extended for fifty miles along the lake-shore, and as far northward as settlers were to be found. His labors were arduous and most abundant. He organized many stations which are now large and prosperous congregations. He was among the foremost in every good work, a fearless and vigorous advocate of temperance at a time when a man needed the courage of his convictions to withstand the reproaches of his friends and the assaults of the vine. His efforts in the cause of general education were second to few; and every movement for the social, intellectual, and civil improvement of society, found in him a ready and eloquent supporter. He lectured frequently and gratuitously in all sections of the country, and was for a time the able and efficient agent of the Bible Society. He held a prominent place in the esteem of the community, and was fully appreciated by the church, and his brethren in the ministry. He was for many years clerk of his presbytery, and occupied the moderator's chair of the synod. In 1859 the College of Princeton, N.J., conferred on him the honorary title of D.D.,—an honor well bestowed.

After a most active and widely extended ministry of forty-two years, and a life of varied and valuable services as a citizen, patriot, and philanthropist, Dr. Thornton died of pneumonia, after a few days' illness. Thoroughly devoted to his life-work, happy in his family, revered by his congregation, honored by his brethren, he has left a stainless memory as a legacy to his children and to the church. His congregation erected a monument to his memory. The motto of his life, however, was "Prodesse quam conspici." WILLIAM ORMISTON.

THORNWELL, James Henley, D.D., LL.D., one of the most eminent of the divines, educators, and polemics which the South has produced; b. in Marlborough District, S.C., Dec. 9, 1812; d. at Charlotte, N.C., Aug. 1, 1862. To his mother, a woman of great intelligence, piety, and strength of character, he acknowledged his indebtedness, when in the zenith of his fame he spoke of her in a public address as one "who had taught him from his cradle the eternal principles of grace" as they were contained in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church.

Notwithstanding the hindrances of early poverty, he obtained the elements of a good education under the training of an excellent teacher, and soon displayed such original genius and capacity for acquisition as to attract the attention, and secure the patronage, of two noble men, whose honor it was to furnish him with every facility for the prosecution of his studies, and whose reward was in the distinction to which he attained as a scholar, professor, pastor, and theologian. While a student of South-Carolina College, Columbia, before his seventeenth birthday, his dialectic talent, his passionate love for the classics, and his devotion to metaphysical studies, united with an extraordinary power of abstraction and mental concentration, together with a capacity for long-continued application without rest or sleep, gave presage of the distinction he was afterwards to win on every arena to which duty summoned him.

It is a remarkable circumstance in his history, that with the knowledge of the fact fully before him that his generous patrons had destined him to the study of the law, neither of them at the time professors of religion, and not yet being a professor himself, he came to the unalterable decision, that, inasmuch as it was the duty of every one to devote his life to the glory of God and the good of man, he could best fulfil the end of his being by becoming a minister of the gospel. Three years after this he became a member of the church; and then, after spending about two years in the business of teaching, in the prosecution of his great design he went first to the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., but, without matriculating there, he repaired to Cambridge, where, in the divinity school of Harvard University, he commenced the study of Hebrew and biblical literature. But, finding the climate too cold for his constitution, after a few months' stay he returned to South Carolina.

He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Harmony in 1841. His first pastorate was in Lancaster, in the presbytery of Bethel.

In 1837 he was elected to a professorship in Columbia College, South Carolina. In 1839 he resigned his chair in that institution to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Columbia, but was recalled to the college in 1841, and remained connected with it as professor or president, with a few intervals of service elsewhere, for fifteen years.

At the close of 1855 he was transferred from the college to the theological seminary; and the beginning of 1858 found him, in what was perhaps the noblest sphere of his life, in the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and also editor of the Southern Quarterly Review.

Twice during his life Dr. Thornwell visited Europe. Ten times he represented his presbytery in the General Assembly; and he was moderator of the assembly [Old-School Branch] which met in Richmond, Va., in 1847.

It was at the assembly held in Rochester, N.Y. [1860], that the great debate between himself and the Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., took place, on the subject of church boards.

Dr. Thornwell took a leading part in the organization of the Southern General Assembly in 1861. On the 1st of August, 1862, he died in Charlotte, N.C., where he had gone to meet his wounded son, then a soldier in the Confederate army. He was taken away in the meridian of his fame and usefulness, not yet having completed his fiftieth year, his last words being those of wonder and praise.

The collected writings of Dr. Thornwell, edited by Rev. James B. Adger, D.D., Richmond, 1871-73, are contained in four volumes, the first of which is entitled Theological; the second, Theological and Ethical; the third, Theological and Controversial; and the fourth, Ecclesiastical. See his Life and Letters, by B. M. PALMER, Richmond, 1875.

MOSES D. HOGUE.

THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY, The, was intimately connected with the Monophysite Controversy. Theodorus Ascidas, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, a devoted Origenist, represented to the Emperor Justinian that many of the Monophysites might be won for the church if some action were taken against the chief representatives of the Antiochian (Nestorian) theology. The emperor issued an edict in 511 condemning the so-called "Three Chapters" which Theodore proposed, (1) the person and writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, (2) the writings of Theodoret in defence of Nestorius, and (3) the letter which Ibas was said to have written to the Persian Maris. Theodore had died at peace with the church, and Theodoret and Ibas had been expressly recognized as orthodox by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Thus the support of the "Three Chapters" implied a partial condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon. The Greek bishops yielded assent after a public resistance. Pope Vigilius wavered, but in 518 condemned the Three Chapters in the Judicatum, but at the same time insisted on the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. The Latin Church, however, tenaciously resisted the condemnation, and a synod of Carthage excluded Vigilius from church communion. Vigilius subsequently withdrew the Judicatum, refused to be present at the second Council of Constantinople (529), in which the Three Chapter Controversy was considered, and in a decree of May 14, 553 (Constitutum de tribus capitulis), expressly protested against the condemnation of the "Three Chapters." The Council of Constantinople, however, followed the wishes of the emperor. The Greek churches accepted the decision confirming the condemnation of the articles. The Roman Church fell in, and in 559 the North African Church gave its assent. But the recognition of the authority of this council by Vigilius and Pelagius was the occasion of the separation of the churches of Northern Italy, with Aquileja and Milan at their head, from the Roman Church. The schism continued till the pontificate of Gregory the Great. The Latin Church takes very little notice of the fifth Œcumenical Council (Second Council of Constantinople).

THUGS (Hindi, Thugna, "to deceive"), an organized body of secret assassins and thieves, who for many years had been the terror of India. They were worshippers of the bloody goddess Kali, who presided over impure love and death. Roaming about through the country, they usually strangled their victims by a skilful use of the handkerchief. They devoted one-third of their plunder to their tutelary divinity. The administration of Lord William Bentinck (1828-35) succeeded in putting an end to their dreaded deeds. See Capt. SLEEMAN: Ramaseena, or a Vocabulary of the Peculiar Language used by the Thugs, 1836; MEADOWS TAYLOR: The Confessions of a Thug, London, 1858.

THUMMIM. See URIM and THUMMIM.

THURIBLE, THURIBULUM, or THYMIATE-RIUM, a vessel for burning incense, a censer, generally made of precious metal, in the form of a vase, with a pierced cover, and suspended in three chains for swinging. In this form, however, the thurible is not found until the twelfth century. The thuribles which Constantine presented to the churches of Rome, or Chosroes to the churches of Constantinople, must, by reason of their weight, have been stationary.

THURIFICATI. See LAPSED.

THYATIRA, a city of Asia Minor, on the northern border of Lydia, near the road from Pergamum to Sardis, which was about twenty-seven miles distant. The Lycus flows near it. Its early names were Pelopia, Semiranis, and Euhippia. Lydia, the seller of purple stuffs, who received Paul so kindly, came from Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14). Dyeing was apparently an extensive industry there, and the scarlet cloth now produced there is very famous. Lydia very likely belonged to the dyers' guild. She was probably helpful in the establishment of the church of Thyatira, if not the founder. This church was honored with one of the Epistles of Revelation (ii. 18-29). Some commentators explain "the woman Jezebel" as the sibil Samlatha, whose fane stood outside the walls. The modern city is called Ak-Hissar ("white castle"), and numbers some twenty thousand.

TIARA, a head-dress worn by the Pope on solemn occasions, consisting of a high cap of gold-cloth, encircled with three crowns, and provided, like the mitre, with two flaps hanging down the neck. The original tiara had only a golden circle along the nether brim. John XIII. (965) added the first crown; Boniface VIII. (1295), the second; and Benedict XIII. (1335), the third.

TIBERIAS, the modern Tuberieh, stands on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, at a point where the cliffs, generally surrounding the lake, retreat from the waters, and form an open plain. It was built by Herod Antipas, and named after the Roman Emperor Tiberius; and it was the capital of Galilee from that time till the reign of Herod Agrippa II., who removed the seat of government back to its old place at Sepphoris. As Herod Antipas was educated in Rome, the city he built was, with its palaces, theatres, gymnasiums, etc., more Roman than Jewish, and the strict orthodox Jews felt a kind of aversion to it. This may explain why Christ, who spent most of his time in Galilee, never visited the city, though perhaps, also, the fate of John the Baptist may have been the reason. The city is mentioned three times in the New Testament.—John vi. 1, 23, xxi. 1. During the war with Rome, it played, on account of its fortifications, quite an important part; and when, in the middle of the second century, it was the seat of the Sanhedrin, removed thither from Jamnia, it became one of the four holy cities of the Jews. At present it has some four thousand inhabitants, of whom about one-quarter are Jews, the rest Mohammedans and Christians. It stands at the northern end of the plain; but the ruins extend far away to the southern end, where are the famous warm baths which are mentioned by Pliny.

TIGLATH-PILESER (Heb., תִּגְלַת פִּלְזֶסֶר, also תִּגְלַת פִּלְזֶסֶר, תִּגְלַת פִּלְזֶסֶר, Author-ized Version, "Tiglath-Pileser"), LXX., Θαλαφ-φίλλασαρ, Θαλαφφίλλασαρ, Θαλαφίλλασαρ, Θαλαφ-φίλλασαρ, Θαλαφ φάλλασαρ, etc.; Assy., Tuklat-apal-šarra, "(My) trust (is) the son of the house of favor," or "house of assembling;" apal-šarra is probably a title of the god Adar, the second Assyrian king of that name, who reigned B.C. 745-727, and is identical with Pul (Heb., פּוּל; LXX., φοῦλ, φάλως, φάλλω, φοῦλ),—see below,—is mentioned under one or other of these names in six passages of the Bible (2 Kings xv. 19, 29, xvi. 7-10; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26; 2 Chron. xxviii. 20), and as "Tuklat-apal-šarra" in various Assyrian inscriptions.

The identity of Tiglath-pileser and Pul appears from the following grounds. (1) The Bible and the inscriptions agree in making Azariah of Judah and Menahem of Israel contemporaries. As the Assyrian king contemporary with both, the Bible names Pul; the inscriptions, Tiglath-pileser. (2) The inscriptions leave no room for Pul as a king distinct from Tiglath-pileser. The Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the successive years, and includes the kings, does not allude to him; and the hypothesis of a break in the list, resulting in the omission of his name, is groundless. Nor does Tiglath-pileser, whose inscriptions are numerous and full, ever allude to such a person as a rival or rebel. (3) Berosus, the Babylonian priest and historian (third century B.C.), says that Pul the Chaldean reigned before Sennacherib, and invaded Judea. No mention is made of the name Tiglath-pileser. See Alex. Polyhistor in Euseb. Armen. Chron., l. 4. (4) Pöros (Πόρος), according to Ptolemy's Canon, became king of Babylon in 731. Pöros can easily be the same with Pul, as Persian inscriptions give Bâbiru for Bâbîlu, Babylon, etc. The Assyrian inscriptions tell us that Tiglath-pileser, who called himself "King of Shumêr and Akkad" (i.e., Southern and Northern Babylonia), reduced the Babylonian princes to subjection in 731. (5) Ptolemy's Canon gives the name of another Babylonian ruler, Chinzîros (Χιζήρος), for the same year, 731, and puts it before that of Pöros. The inscriptions tell us that among the Babylonian princes who did homage to Tiglath-pileser in 731 was Ukinšêr. (6) The inscriptions tell us that Tiglath-pileser's successor ascended the Assyrian throne B.C. 727. Ptolemy's Canon gives 726 as the first year of Pôros' successor in Babylonia. These considerations make the identity of Pul with Tiglath-pileser a matter of the strongest historical probability. The name Pul was not unknown in Assyria, and was probably the private name of this king, who seems not to have been the son of his predecessor. The name Tiglath-pileser would then have been assumed on his ascending the throne.

The Bible makes the following statements about this king: (1) That he threatened the northern kingdom (Israel), and that Menahem the king gave him a thousand talents of silver to secure his favor and support (2 Kings xv. 19); (2) That in the days of Pekah, a usurper, the second successor of Menahem, he took Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, "all the land of Naphtali," "and carried them captive to Assyria" (2 Kings xv. 29; cf. 1 Chron. v. 6, 26); (3) That Ahaz, king of Judah, induced him by homage and presents to come to his aid against Syria and Israel; that he captured Damascus, carried the inhabitants away captive, and slew Rezin the king; and that Ahaz went to Damascus to meet him (2 Kings xvi. 7-10; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, which, however, says, "Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came unto him [Ahaz], and distressed him, but strengthened him not"). These statements are partly explained, partly supplemented, by the inscriptions, from which we are enabled to give, with approximate accuracy, a sketch of Tiglath-pileser's reign. In B.C. 745, his first regnal year, he made a successful expedition to Babylonia. In 744 he was occupied in the countries east of Assyria. In 743 his forces were engaged, partly in Armenia, partly before the city of Arpad, in the land Chatti, west of the Euphrates, receiving tribute from the kings of Karkemish, Tyre, etc. The years 742-740 were occupied in the siege of Arpad. In 740 Hamath was punished for revolting to "Azariah of Judah," who was himself not molested. This agrees with what the Bible tells us of Azariah's formidable power. In 739 there was an expedition to the land of Ulluba and the city Birtu (on the Euphrates?). The conquered Hamathites were transported to Ulluba. In 738, besides other conquests, the king received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Israel (cf. 2 Kings xv. 19), Hiram of Tyre, and various rulers of Asia Minor, Phœnicia, and Arabia. The years 737-735 were spent in the East; but in 731 the king marched to Philistia (Philistia), taking in Phœnicia, Israel, Judah, Edom, Moab, and Ammon. Before this expedition, or in its early stages, must be placed the homage, gifts, and entreaties of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8). Tiglath-pileser speaks, in one inscription, of receiving tribute from "Ja-u-chu-zi (Ahaz, 738) of Judah." His account of the campaign of 731 (cf. 2 Kings xv. 29) supplements the biblical statement; for he tells us that he plundered the kingdom of Israel ("the land of the house of Omri"), and, killing Pekah the king, set Hoshea on the throne. This shows us what power was at work behind the conspiracy and usurpation of Hoshea (mentioned 2 Kings xv. 30). After this the Assyrian king turned toward Damascus, and besieged it for two years, finally capturing it, and putting Rezin to death (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 9). It must have been at this time that Ahaz visited him at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 10). In 731 occurred the second expedition to Babylon, with the subjugation of Merodach-baladan (see art.) and Ukinzer (see above). 730-725 were spent in Assyria, where the king's death probably occurred in 727.

The only difficulty occasioned by the comparison of the biblical with the Assyrian accounts of this king is a chronological one. He reigned, according to the Eponym Canon (which is fixed by its mention of the solar eclipse of B.C. 763, and by its correspondence with Ptolemy's Canon), B.C. 745-727. But the received biblical chronology puts the death of his contemporary, Azariah, in B.C. 758, and that of Menahem B.C. 761. It also gives 739, and not 731, as the date of Pekah's death, putting the invasions of Judah by Pekah and Rezin in 742-741. The discrepancies are in part due to the same causes which we find operating in the previous century, in the times of Ahab, Jehu, and Shalmaneser II. (see SHALMANESER), but are connected in part with some special inaccuracies in the present text of that section of Kings with which we are here concerned. A solution of the difficulty cannot be attempted here; but it must be sought in the restoration of correct numbers in the Hebrew text, and not in a modification of the Assyrian dates, which are here self-consistent and well-attested.

FRANCIS BROWN.

TILLEMONT, Louis Sébastien, Le Nain de, a Roman-Catholic historian; b. in Paris, Nov. 30, 1637; d. there Jan. 10, 1698. He was educated in Port-Royal, shared the views and fortunes of the Jansenists, and was consecrated priest in 1676. [He took his name from the town of Tillemont, near Paris, where he was rector.] He devoted much time to historical studies, and, after furnishing biographies for editions of several of the Fathers, published the first volume of his larger work, Histoire des Empereurs et des autres princes qui ont régné durant les six premiers siècles de l'Eglise, des persécutions qu'ils ont faites aux chrétiens, etc., 1690. He published three more volumes of this work during his life. Two posthumous volumes were added. His principal work was the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1691. Thirteen others followed [till 1712] after the author's death, bringing the history down to 513. This was the first church history based upon conscientious researches published in France up to that time. It consists for the most part of quotations from the Fathers, arranged in chronological order. The author's own remarks are included in brackets, or consigned to the foot of the page as notes. Tillemont's labors do not satisfy the present generation of scholarship, but were valuable for their minuteness and care. C. SCHMIDT.

TILLOTSON, John, b. at Sowerby in Yorkshire, October, 1630; son of a clothier, who was a zealous Puritan; studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where Puritan principles were inculcated, and where he shared the same room with Francis Holcroft, one of the subsequently ejected clergy. But Tillotson did not imbibe Puritan doctrines; he rather leaned in what was called the "Latitudinarian" direction. The Cambridge school of divines, including Cudworth, More, Smith, Wilkins, and others, manifested a bias of that kind; and they probably exerted an influence over the future archbishop. Chillingworth, through his writings, is also said to have moulded Tillotson's opinions. Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly. How, when, or where, he was ordained is a mystery; but he was a preacher in 1661, and was offered the church of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1662, when Edmund Calamy was deprived of it. After submitting to the Act of Uniformity, he was appointed to the rectory of Kedlington, Suffolk, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He began as an author in 1664, by publishing a sermon on The Wisdom of being Religious, and another in 1666, on The Rule of Faith. It was as a preacher, and the author of sermons, that he became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned quotations, artificial arrangement, and endless subdivisions, making him popular with the middle classes, whilst his good sense and cultured mind made him acceptable, also, with the learned. Dryden even was under literary obligations to Tillotson; and high praise has been bestowed on him by Taine, the French critic. He was a thorough Protestant, and at home in the Popish controversy, and appealed to reason as well as revelation in support of his opinions. He showed a strong Erastian tincture in a book entitled The Protestant Religion vindicated from the Charge of Singularity and Novelty, in which production he curiously said that "no man is at liberty to affront the established religion of a nation, though it be false." This brought him into trouble with many of his friends, and he soon retreated from such a strange position. He was a Whig in politics, opposed to the despotism of the Stuarts, and an advocate of ecclesiastical comprehension. He attended Lord William Russell on the scaffold, and hailed with joy the Revolution of 1688; after this he took part in the ecclesiastical commission for revising the Prayer-Book. Not without high pretension before, for he was dean successively of Canterbury and St. Paul's, he rose to the primacy of all England in 1691, where he endured many insults from the Nonjurors. Stricken with palsy, he died Nov. 22, 1694.

JOHN STOUTIGTON.

TIMOTHY, the friend and co-laborer of Paul, was the son of a heathen father and a Jewish mother named Eunice (Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5). His home seems to have been at Lystra, where he enjoyed the pious instructions of his mother and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. i. 5), and was probably converted at Paul's visit on his first missionary journey. Paul frequently calls him his child (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2, etc.). At the time of his conversion he must have been very young; for Paul exhorts him, years afterwards, to let no man despise his youth (1 Tim. iv. 12), and to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. ii. 22).

When the apostle visited Lystra on his second missionary journey, he heard the best reports of Timothy, and determined to take him with him as a companion. He was probably ordained at that time (1 Tim. iv. 11; 2 Tim. i. 6), and circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). Timothy accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey to Macedonia, as it would seem from Acts xvi. 1-3, and as far as Berea (Acts xvii. 11, 15), where, with Silas, he remained behind for a time, while Paul went on to Athens. He afterwards met Paul at Athens, whence he was despatched on a mission to the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 2). Having accomplished his mission, he met Paul again at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1, 6), and took part with him in the proclamation of the gospel there (2 Cor. i. 19). We meet Timothy again on Paul's third missionary journey at Ephesus (Acts xix.). He was despatched thence on an important mission to Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 17), and was in Corinth, or thought to be there, when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11). He was sent by the apostle, in company with Erastus, to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22), was with him when the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written (2 Cor. i. 1), and accompanied him back to Asia from Corinth (Acts xx. 6).

We have no other notices of Timothy till Paul's first imprisonment, when we find him with the apostle at Rome (Col. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; Philem. 1). The remaining facts of his life are drawn from the pastoral epistles and Heb. xiii. 23. After Paul's first Roman imprisonment, Timothy seems to have moved from Philippi (Phil. ii. 19-23) to Ephesus. In his first letter to Timothy, Paul urges him to oppose false theological and ascetic tendencies in the Ephesian Church (1 Tim. i. 3 sqq.). Timothy himself seems to have given way to the false theology and asceticism (1 Tim. iv. 7, 8, v. 23, etc.). Paul expresses in this epistle the hope that he might visit Timothy at Ephesus. He seems not to have realized his expectations; and from his second imprisonment at Rome, and in the near prospect of death, he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy, who was still at Ephesus (2 Tim. i. 18, iv. 12, 13). The earnest admonitions of this document (2 Tim. i. 8, 13, ii. 3, iv. 1, 2, 5, etc.) seem to indicate that Timothy had departed somewhat from his early faith; but the cordial invitation for him to come to Rome attests Paul's unchanged affection. If Hebrews was written after Paul's death, and by Luke, which seems probable, then Timothy complied with the apostle's wish, and shared with him a part of the second Roman imprisonment (Heb. xiii. 23).

According to tradition (EUSEB. iii. 1; Const. Apost. vii. 46; NIERENBURG; Hist. Eccl. iii. 11), Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus, and suffered a martyr's death under Domitian. For his life, see the commentaries on 1 and 2 Timothy.

TIMOTHY, Epistles to. See PAUL.

TINDAL, Matthew, a distinguished English deist; was b. at Beer Ferrers, Devonshire, about 1657; d. in London, Aug. 16, 1733. He studied at Lincoln and Exeter colleges, Oxford, took his degree in 1676, and was made fellow of All-Souls. Under James II. he joined the Roman-Catholic Church, but returned to the Church of England soon after. His principal work, — Christianity as Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republication of the Law of Nature,—which appeared in 1730, when the author was seventy years old, marks the culminating point of the deist controversy. The second volume of this work was withheld by Bishop Gibson, to whom the author had intrusted the manuscript. "It has not the force of style or the weight of thought which could secure a permanent place in literature," says Leslie Stephen (History of English Thought, i. 135). It asserts that none of the real truths of Christianity required a revelation. The law of God is unalterable and perfect, and was communicated to the first members of the human family. He attacked the religion of the Old Testament, ridiculed the command of circumcision and sacrifices as implying a low and unworthy conception of God, and laid great stress upon the inconsistencies of the patriarchs, the wars of extermination, etc. Conybeare, James Foster, Leland, and others attacked Tindal's work; and it was to it, more than to any other, that Bishop Butler's Analogy was meant to be a reply. Tindal's other works are, The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted, an attack upon High-Church assumptions (1706), and some pamphlets. See LECHLER: Deismus; FAIRBANKS: Critical History of Free Thought, London and New York, 1863 (lect. iv.); LESLIE STEPHEN: History of English Thought, 2d ed., New York, 1881, 2 vols. (i. pp. 131-163).

TISCHENDORF, Lobegott (Ænotheus) Friedrich Constantin, b. Jan. 18, 1815, at Lengenfeld in Saxony; d. Dec. 7, 1871, at Leipzig. Tischendorf was the ninth child of his father, who, by birth a Thuringian, served as village physician and apothecary at Lengenfeld in the Saxon Vogtland. Leaving the village school in 1829, he entered the gymnasium at Plauen, and in 1831, at Easter, aged nineteen, he was matriculated at the university of Leipzig. At school he had been remarkable for his diligence and for his poetical gifts, and the evidences of both have been seen by the writer in the school-records. He was known among his fellow-pupils as somewhat reserved, and as by no means unconscious of his own merits. The influence of Gottfried Hermann and of Georg Benedict Winer¹ inspired classical and sacred research at that time in the university of Leipzig, and found in Tischendorf a ready disciple. In the autumn of 1836 he took a prize medal for an essay upon the Doctrine of the Apostle Paul as to the Value of Christ's Death as a Satisfaction, and this essay was published in 1837. This, his first scientific publication, was followed at Christmas by a collection of poems which showed no little evidence of a fine imaginative faculty; but his lyric talents were put into the shade by his work upon texts, and he rarely did more in later years than write an occasional verse at a birthday or other family festival. Easter, 1838, brought him a second prize medal for an essay upon Christ the Bread of Life; and he became a doctor of philosophy. Teaching at a school near Leipzig, for his future father-in-law, Pastor Zelme of Gross-Stadeln, he made a brief journey through Southern Germany and Switzerland, visiting also Strassburg, and then, returning to Leipzig, he began to prepare an edition of the Greek New Testament. It should be distinctly observed, that Tischendorf appears to have made Lachmann his guide for the line of his work, not merely in so far as he followed, to a certain extent, Lachmann's example in discarding the so-called textus receptus, but even in particular points. We need only refer to the first striking success of Tischendorf,—the publication of the Parisian palimpsest, the Codex Ephraemi, and then to his edition of the Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, the publication of both of which Lachmann had called for in 1830, declaring that Parisian scholars could win immortal honors by it. The young German did what Paris failed to do. Lachmann, however, spoke most slightly of Tischendorf's first New Testament; and Tischendorf seems, only a short time before his death, to have recovered that impartial balance of mind necessary to do full justice to his great predecessor.

Reaching the opening of his academical career with his habilitation as privatdocent, in October, 1840, and issuing his first Greek New Testament with the date 1841, he left in the same month for Paris, where he remained until January, 1843, save a visit to Holland in the autumn of 1841, and to England at the close of the summer of 1842. At Paris, not to mention a Protestant and a Catholic edition of the Greek New Testament, or his collations of Philo and of the sixtieth book of the Basilicas, his chief work was the deciphering of the above-mentioned Codex Ephraemi, a biblical manuscript which had been erased, and re-written with the works of Ephraem Syrus. Tischendorf did not spoil the manuscript with chemicals; that was done by the librarians while he was a school-boy at Plauen. From Paris he sped to Rome, only delaying at Basel to collate P²; and he remained in Italy about a year, working diligently at the uncial manuscripts of the Bible. But the best one, the Codex Vaticanus, was denied to him, because Mai had an edition under way; and it was only after the personal intervention of the Pope that he received permission to use it for three hours each, on two days, and to make a passimile. He looked, however, with eagerness towards the East, and was so fortunate as to succeed in his plans for a journey thither.

On March 12, 1844, he sailed from Livorno for Alexandria, whence he proceeded to Cairo; and after examining the manuscripts in the Cairo monastery of Mount Sinai, and visiting the Coptic monasteries of the Libyan Desert, he started for Sinai on May 12, and reached it by the 21th, remaining until June 1. Here he discovered the forty-three leaves of the Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, now at Leipzig, which are a part of the famous Codex Sinaiticus; the leaves of it that he was not allowed to bring with him were the incentive to his later Eastern journeys. With a glance at Palestine, Constantinople, and Patmos, he passed through Vienna and Munich, and reached Leipzig in January, 1845, well supplied with treasures. He married Miss Angelika Zelme on Sept. 18, 1845. During this and the next few years he published the Old Testament part of the Codex Ephraemi, the passimile of the Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae, the Monumenta Sacra Proclata, with fragments of seven New Testament manuscripts, his two volumes of travels in the East, and the Codex Palatinus. He visited London, Paris, and Oxford again in 1849, and in the same year published a new edition of the Greek New Testament, with increased critical apparatus. The year 1850 dates the edition of the Codex Amiatinus, and his ordinary honorary professorship, and his edition of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament; while the next year saw the issue of his essay upon the origin and use of the Apocryphal Gospels, of his edition of the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, and of his Synopsis of the Gospels; and in 1852 the Codex Claronianus appeared.

His second Eastern journey, in 1853, failed in its chief intention, namely, the recovery of the rest of the leaves of the Codex Frederico-Augustanus, but supplied him with a number of manuscripts in various languages, which now adorn the shelves of the libraries at Oxford, London, St. Petersburg, and Leipzig. The holidays of 1854, 1855, and 1856, were used for collations at Wolfenbützel and Hamburg, at London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and at Munich, St. Gallen, and Zurich. A new collection of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita appeared in 1855, and this ran into a series not yet completed. A famous controversy took place, in the following year, about the forgeries of a sharp Greek named Simonides, who tried to sell his productions as old manuscripts. Simonides was arrested at Leipzig on Feb. 1. The large amount of material gathered together during these years was presented in a compact form, in his "seventh larger critical edition" of the Greek New Testament, which began to appear in 1856, and was completed at Christmas in 1858. Up to that date no edition had offered such a mass of valuable various readings.

After long effort, Tischendorf succeeded in gaining from the Russian Government the necessary pecuniary support, and the scarcely less valuable moral support, of the Russian emperor, for a new Eastern journey; and he left Leipzig on Jan. 5, 1859, reaching Sinai on the 31st. He searched in vain for the desired leaves. But on the afternoon of Feb. 1 the steward of the monastery called his attention to a manuscript which he had laid away; and to Tischendorf's joy it proved not merely to contain the leaves left behind in 1844, but also a large number of other leaves, containing the New Testament, Barnabas, and part of Hermas. Tischendorf, almost beside himself with joy and thankfulness, spent much of the night in copying the then unique Barnabas, completing it and the fragment of Hermas before he left the monastery on Feb. 7. The prior had gone to Cairo, where Tischendorf found him on the 11th; and at his order a sheik brought the manuscript to Cairo by Feb. 23. Aided by two Germans, he copied it quire by quire, as it was loaned to him. After many delays incident to the election of a new archbishop, he received permission to carry the original to Europe to edit it, and, if the monastery so decided, to give it to the emperor. This year (1859) is the date of Tischendorf's ordinary or full professorship. The Codex Sinaiticus appeared in four large folio volumes in 1862; the New-Testament part, in a quarto volume, in 1863, and somewhat modified, in octavo, in 1865.

The following years were broken by journeys to England, to Italy, and to St. Petersburg. In 1865 appeared the first edition of his work upon the date of the Gospels: When were our Gospels written? and this was speedily replaced by new editions; while Danish, Dutch, English, French, Italian, Russian, Swedish, and Turkish translations scattered the book abroad. He published in 1867 an edition of the New-Testament part of the Codex Vaticanus, and an appendix to the Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. During this time, however, beginning with 1864, he had been issuing the "eighth larger critical edition" of his Greek New Testament; and the last part of the text with the critical apparatus appeared in 1872. He was filled with plans for a new journey to the East, and he had prepared already for a voyage to America to attend the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York; but upon May 5, 1873, he was disabled by a stroke of apoplexy, and never recovered sufficient power to work again. He died on Dec. 7, 1874, and was buried in the new cemetery at Leipzig. Five of his eight children are daughters; the eldest son, Paul Andreas, is second dragoman in the German embassy at Constantinople; the second, Johannes, is a lawyer, at present attached to the Imperial Law Office at Berlin; the third, Immanuel, is a physician, at present assisting a professor at Kiel.

Tischendorf was a man of unusual mental ability and diligence. His services to biblical students cannot easily be over-estimated and will be more and more gratefully acknowledged as the increase of distance in time removes the observer from the influence of that prejudice against him due to his estimate of himself. His editions of the New Testament, culminating in the eighth, are very valuable for the text presented, and still more for the vast amount of material which they place at the disposal of the student of the text; and the comparative agreement of Tregelles and of Westcott and Hort with him shows that his critical judgment was of a high order. A list of his works may be found in the writer's article in Biblioth. Sacra (And., January, 1876, pp. 183-193), and in the Prolegomena to his N. T. Gr. ed. VIII. crit. mai., Leipzig, first part, 1884, pp. 7-22.

TITHES. Down to the seventeenth century it was generally held that all tithes, without exception, had been introduced by the Church on the basis of the Mosaic law, and had only been confirmed and extended by the State. The investigations, however, of Selden, Hugo Grotius, and others, proved that tithes (decimæ) were also known to the Roman law, and had in many cases been introduced from it into the economical organization of the mediæval state. Any one who obtained a part of the public land (ager publicus) in a conquered country paid a tenth of the revenue he derived from it as a rent to the State, and generally he transferred this system of rent to the colonists he settled on the soil. Nevertheless, when speaking of tithes as part of the ecclesiastical organization, they had, no doubt, their origin chiefly in the Church, which, again, had borrowed the institution from the Synagogue.

to God (Gen. xiv. 20). Moses himself ordered (Num. xviii. 21) that the Levites should be paid for their service in the sanctuary from the tithes which were paid by the other Israelites, and which, properly speaking, belonged to Jehovah (Lev. xxvii. 30-33), and that one-tenth of those tithes should be set apart for the Aaronic priests. After the exile, these prescripts, as the Mosaic law in general, were enforced with the greatest strictness, and from the Synagogue the whole arrangement was transferred to the Church. When the epistles of the apostles never mention tithes, the reason is simply, that in their time the voluntary offerings of the members still sufficed for the wants of the church. But complaints arose as soon as the zeal began to grow lukewarm (Cyprian; De unitate ecclesie, 23). In the East, all soon agreed in demanding the introduction of tithes in accordance with the prescripts of the Old Testament (comp. Constit. Apostol., ii. 25, 35, vii. 29, viii. 30; Can. Apostol. 4, 5), and in the West, Jerome and Augustine spoke in favor of the same idea. It was recommended by the Second Council of Tours, 567 (Hardouin; Coll. Concil., iii. 368), and commanded, under penalty of excommunication, by the Second Council of Macon, 585 (Bruns; Council Mattiscon, ii. 5). Even the confessional was used to enforce the decree. Not to pay tithes was represented as a sin (see Penitential Theodori, in Wasserschleben; Bussordnungen, Halle, 1851). During the Carolingian age the institution became firmly established in the Frankish Empire; that is, in France and Germany. Charlemagne imposed it upon even the newly converted Saxons (see Capitulaire Paderborn, of 785). At the same time tithes were introduced in England, first in Mercia by Offa, and then throughout the Saxon dominion by Ethelwolf. In Portugal and Denmark they were introduced in the eleventh century; in Sweden, in the thirteenth.

Partly on account of the different origin, and partly under the influence of social circumstances, there soon developed different kinds of tithes. There are secular and ecclesiastical tithes (decimæ seculares, or ecclesiasticæ); the former having been established for some secular purpose, the latter for the benefit of the Church. There are also lay and clerical tithes (decimæ laicales, or clericales); the former being in the possession of a layman, the latter in the possession of a clergyman. By freedom of buying and selling, it was quite natural that secular tithes should come into the possession of clergyman, and ecclesiastical tithes into the possession of laymen; though the latter kind of proprietorship was never recognized by the Church. Gregory VII. spoke of laymen's holding ecclesiastical tithes as a crime, and later popes repeated the idea. There are finally personal and real tithes (decimæ personales, or reales); the former paid from the income of some profession or trade, the latter from the income of some kind of real estate. The latter are again divided into decimæ prædiales, from grain, wine, fruit, and other products of the soil, and decimæ animalium, from the products of the flock and the poultry-yard; this division, however, is nearly identical with that into decimæ majores and decimæ minores. With the Reformation the tithing-system was not immediately abolished: on the contrary, in most places it was retained for the support of the evangelical Church, as it had been established for the support of the Roman-Catholic Church. Luther spoke in favor of it (see Werke, edition Walch, x. 1006, and xvii. 46, 85). Even the peasants, during the peasant wars, were willing to pay tithes (see Oechsle; Geschichte des Bauernkriegs, Heilbronn, 1830). Nevertheless, in course of time there arose a strong opposition to the system, partly from reasons of political economy, and partly from antipathy to the Church; and in France it was entirely swept away by a decree of the National Assembly of 1789. In other countries, tithes were not absolutely abolished, but commuted into a fixed annual sum of money, — a form which in some cases has found favor with even the Roman curia. See TAXATION, ECCLESIASTICAL.

TITHES AMONG THE HEBREWS (תְּשׁוּבָה, תְּשׁוּבָה).

שְׁבִיעִית, "a tenth"). Not only the Hebrews, but other ancient peoples, devoted the tenth part of their produce, cattle, or booty, to sacred purposes. The Phœnicians and Carthaginians sent to the Tyrian Hercules yearly a tithe (Diod. Sic. xx. 14); the Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod. i. 89), as also the Greeks (especially to Apollo) and the Romans (to Hercules) applied a tenth to the gods. These, however, were voluntary rather than obligatory offerings. The Mosaic law of tithes was not an innovation, but a confirmation of a patriarchal practice. The earliest instances of tithes in the Old Testament are Abraham's offering of a tenth of the spoil to Melchisedec (Gen. xiv. 20), and Jacob's devotion of a tenth of his property (Gen. xxviii. 22). The tithed objects consisted of the fruits of the ground and cattle. The cattle were selected by the practice of having them pass under the rod (Lev. xxvii. 32); the tenth one being set apart, no matter whether it were bad or good, blemished or unblemished. The Talmud ordains that only the cattle born during the year, and not those that were bought, or received as presents, were to be tithed, and that, unless ten animals were born, there should be no offering. According to the Talmud, the sheep were tithed as they passed out of an enclosure, the tenth being touched with a rod steeped in vermilion. The alleged contradiction of the rules in Deuteronomy to those of Leviticus and Numbers cannot be made out. It Deuteronomy only prescribes vegetable tithes, and enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company, these injunctions are to be regarded as a development of the previous rules (Winet); or the omission of reference to the tithe feast in Leviticus and Numbers is to be looked upon as due to the fact that its existence was taken for granted by them (Michaelis, Hengstenberg, Keil, etc.).

The principal tithal rules are as follows. (1) The tenth part of the fruits of the earth and cattle were given to the Levites, who received it as a compensation for their want of an inheritance, and might eat it at their several places of abode (Num. xviii. 21). (2) The Levites must give one-tenth part of this tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 26); this latter portion after the exile (Neh. x. 38), and perhaps before (2 Chron. xxxi. 12), had to be delivered at Jerusalem. (3) A second tenth was eaten at the tabernacle, at a joyous feast (Deut. xiv. 22 sq.); the officers, if they were ceremonially clean, and the Levites, joining therein. In case the distance was so great as to make the transportation of the tenth part inexpedient, it might be converted into money, and the money used again in the purchase of the necessary vegetables and meat for the feast (Deut. xiv. 25, 26). (4) Every third year this tithe feast was celebrated by the people at their homes (Deut. xxvi. 12); the Levites, stranger, fatherless, and widows being invited thereto.

The tithes were considerably neglected after the exile (Neh. xiii. 10; Mal. iii. 8, 10); and, at the later period of Roman rule, high priests often laid violent hands on the priestly tithes (Joseph., Ant. XX. 8, 8; 9, 2). The Pharisees, on the other hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of righteousness, and entered upon a casuistical and minute application of them. Our Lord refers to their particular care in this regard (Matt. xxiii. 23).

TITTMANN, Johann August Heinrich, a distinguished German theologian of moderate rationalistic tendencies; was b. in Langensalza, Aug. 1, 1773; d. in Leipzig, Dec. 30, 1831. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was made professor of theology at the latter university. His principal works were, Institutio symbolica ad sententiam eccles. evangel., 1811. Ueber Supernaturalismus, Rationalismus u. Atheismus, 1816, and an edition of the Symbolical Books, 1817.

TITULAR BISHOP, same as Bishop in partibus. See EMPEROR'S IN PARTIBUS.

TITUS, the "fellow-helper" of Paul; a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3); was probably one of Paul's converts (Tit. i. 1), but was never circumcised (Gal. ii. 3). He is not mentioned in the Acts, and first appears in connection with the apostle on his journey to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1-3). We next find him at Ephesus during Paul's third missionary journey. Paul sent him thence, with a companion, on a mission to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 11, xii. 18). After meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 6), he was sent again to Corinth (2 Cor. viii. 6, 16-21). Our next information about Titus is found in Paul's Epistle to him. At the time the apostle wrote, Titus was in Crete (Tit. i. 5), where the apostle had left him after his release from the first Roman imprisonment. Titus was with Paul in the second Roman imprisonment, and left him to go to Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10). According to tradition (Euseb., III. 4; Constitutiones Apostolicas, vii. 46; Hieronymus on Tit. ii. 7; Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii.), Titus died as Bishop of Crete.

TITUS, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia; a distinguished opponent of Manichæism; d., according to Jerome, in the reign of Valens. Nothing further is known of his personal history than that he came into a personal conflict with Julian the Apostate, who in a letter to him accused him of exciting the Christians to acts of violence against the heathen. This letter, which falls in the year 362, was written from Antioch. The great reputation of Titus in the early church rests upon his work against the Manichæans. Jerome mentions it twice, and speaks of its author as one of the most important church-writers of his time (Ep. 70, 1, ed. Villarsi). Sozomen (iii. 14) likewise speaks of him as one of the most distinguished men of his day. In this work, Titus denies the conceivability of two beginnings, admits the distinction of good and evil only in the moral sphere, denies that death is an evil for the good, and starts from the general proposition of Plato concerning the beauty of the world. The three books which are preserved of this work were originally known only by the Latin translation of Turrianus, but have since been edited from a Greek manuscript at Hamburg, in the Thesaurus Caesii, and by Gallandi, in his Bibliotheca, v. 269 sqq. The Commentary on Luke and the Oratio in ramos, edited by Gallandi, and ascribed to him, are probably spurious. See TILLEMONT: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique, BAUR: D. Manichäische Religionsystem, p. 9; NEANDER: Church History, vol. ii. H. SCHMIDT.

TOBIT. See APOCRYPHA.

TOBLER, Titus, b. at Stein in the canton of Appenzel, Switzerland, June 23, 1806; d. Jan. 21, 1871, in Munich. He studied medicine at Zurich and Vienna, and undertook for medical purposes a journey in Palestine (1835-36): Lustreise im Morgenland, Zurich, 1839. Having become interested in the geographical and topographical investigations of the Holy Land, he made three more journeys to Palestine, the first in 1845; and as the literary results of this journey appeared, Bethlehem, St. Gall, 1849; Plan of Jerusalem, 1850; Golgotha, 1851; Die Silothquelle und der Ölberg, 1852; Denksblätter aus Jerusalem, 1853 (2d ed., 1856); Topographie von Jerusalem und seinen Umgebungen, Berlin, 1853-54, 2 vols. After the second he published Planographie von Jerusalem, Gotha, 1858, and Dritte Wandrung nach Palästina, Gotha, 1859. In 1865 he undertook his last journey to Palestine, and published his Nazareth, Berlin, 1868. See also his Bibliographia Geographica Palestinae, Leipzig, 1867, Palestinae Descriptioes et Sarcophagi, v. i, v. ii, Leipzig, 1869, and et Sarcophagi, v. i, v. ii, v. iii, Leipzig, 1871. His life was written by Heim, Zurich, 1879.

TODD, Henry John, Church of England; b. about 1763; d. at Strettington, Yorkshire, Dec. 21, 1815. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1786; rector in London; keeper of manuscripts at Lambeth Palace, 1803; rector of Strettington, 1820; prebendary of York, 1830; archdeacon of Cleveland, 1832; and queen's chaplain. He edited Milton (1801), Spenser (1805), Johnson's Dictionary (1811); wrote Some Accounts of the Banns of Canterbury, Canterbury, 1793; Vindication of our Authorized Translation and Translators of the Bible, London, 1819; Memoirs of Rt. Rev. Brian Walton, 1821, 2 vols.; Life of Archbishop Cranmer, 1831, 2 vols.; Authentic Account of our Authorized Translation of the Bible, 1835.

TODD, James Henthorn, D.D., Irish Church; b. at Dublin, April 23, 1805; d. at Silveracre, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, June 28, 1869. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1825; fellow, 1831; Donnellan lecturer, 1838 and 1841; regius-professor of Hebrew, 1849; librarian to the University, 1852; precentor of St. Patrick's, 1864; and president of the Royal Irish Academy for five years. He wrote two courses of Donnellan lectures, viz., On the Prophecies relating to Antichrist in the Writings of Daniel and St. Paul, Dublin, 1840, ditto, in the Apocalypse of St. John, 1846; Historical Memoirs of the Successors of St. Patrick and Archbishops of Armagh, 1861, 2 vols.; Memoir of St. Patrick's Life and Mission, 1863; edited some of Wiclif's writings (see literature under that art.), and greatly distinguished himself as an Irish antiquary.

TODD, John, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9, 1800; d. at Pittsfield, Mass., Aug. 21, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1822; studied four years at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor in Groton, Mass., 1827 to 1833, Northampton to 1836, First Congregational Church, Philadelphia, to 1842, and Pittsfield, to 1872. He offered prayer at the driving of the last spike of the Central Pacific Railroad. He was a man of national reputation, and the author of many excellent and widely circulated books, among which may be mentioned Lectures to Children, Northampton, 1834 and 1858, 2 series (translated into French, German, Greek, etc., printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book for the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone); Student's Manual, 1835, new English edition, London, 1877; Index Remm., 1835 (prepared for noting books read); Sabbath-school Teacher, 1836; Simple Sketches, Pittsfield, 1843, 2 vols.; Future Punishment, New York, 1863; Hints and Thoughts for Christians, 1867; Woman's Rights, 1867; The Sunset-land, or the Great Pacific Slope, 1870. A collected edition of his books appeared in London, 1853, later edition, 1879. See John Todd, the Story of his Life told mainly by Himself, New York, 1876.

TOLAND, John, a distinguished English deist; was b. near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1669; d. at Putney, March 11, 1722. He was born of Roman-Catholic parentage (was charged with being the illegitimate son of a priest), changed his original name, James Junius, at school, and became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. He studied at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh (where he graduated M.A., 1690), and Leyden, where he studied theology with a view to becoming a dissenting minister. He spent several years at Oxford, and in 1696 published his principal work, Christianity not Mysterious (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1702), which made a great sensation. The conclusions of the book are not very distinct; but the author defines that to be "mysterious" which is "above," not "contrary to," reason, and declares that Christianity contains nothing "mysterious" (that is, not before revealed). He declares himself a good Christian and a good Churchman. The book was burnt by the hangman at Dublin on Sept. 11, 1697, Toland being in the city at the time. "The Irish Parliament," says South, "to their immortal honor, sent him packing, and, without the help of a fagot, soon made the kingdom too hot for him." From this time on, he led a Bohemian life, shifting between London and the Continent; wrote some political pamphlets favoring the claims of the house of Brunswick; spent some time at Berlin in a semi-diplomatic position, and died a pensioner of Lord Molesworth. He defended his Christianity not Mysterious, in an Apology for Mr. Toland, London, 1697, and Undeclinus librinus, London, 1702. He published an edition of Milton's Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous, with a Life, London, 1697, 1698, 3 vols.; Amphor, or a Defence of Milton's Life, 1699 (construed into an attack upon the canon); Tetralogus, 1720; Impartial History of Sects, 1721, etc. An historical account of his life and writings appeared in 1722, and a Life by Hurdlestone, Montrose, 1814. His Posthumous Works were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols., with a Life by Des Maizeaux. See LELAND: Deist Writers; LECHER: Deismus; A. S. FARHAR: Critical History of Free Thought (lect. iv.); STEPHEN: History of English Thought, etc. (i. 101 sqq.).

TOLEDO, Councils of. The old Spanish city of Toledo (Toletum), on the Tagus, [forty-two miles south-west of Madrid, with a population to-day of eighteen thousand, and still the seat of an archbishop], early became the seat of a bishopric, and was the scene of numerous church synods. The First Council was called by Bishop Patronus, or Petruinus, of Toledo, in 400. With eighteen other bishops, he passed twenty canons against the Priscillianists. A second council was probably held there in 447, in obedience to the demand of Pope Leo the Great, that the Spanish bishops should take further measures against the Priscillianists. The bishops of four provinces constructed a creed in Toledo, in which it is to be noticed that the phrase, "proceeding from the Father and the Son" (a patre filioque procedens), occurs. In the eighteen anathemas that are appended to it are found the best materials for the knowledge of the doctrines of the Priscillianists. The Roman dominion in Spain was overthrown in the latter part of the fifth century by the West Goths, who ruled for fifty years from Toulouse as the seat of power. They were zealous Arians, but did not institute severe persecutions against the Catholics. The Second Council of Toledo (synodus Toletana II.) was held in 529 (or 527), and passed five unimportant canons. In 531 the king of the West Goths took up his residence in Toledo. This change gave to the city great importance as a civil and ecclesiastical centre. In 541 or 582 the Arian King Leovigild held a synod of the Arian bishops in the city to take measures for the conversion of the Catholics. But the Goths, instead of converting the Catholics, were themselves converted; the Catholic bishops having full control of the people who were Catholics, and never ceasing to denounce the Gothic rulers as foreigners, barbarians, heretics, etc. King Recared entered the Catholic Church in 589, and in the same year called the celebrated Third Council of Toledo. After three days of fasting and prayer, the assembly held its first sitting May 8, being opened by the king, who used in his address the phrase, procedit a patre et a filio ("proceedeth from the Father and the Son"). He announced, as the reason for his having convened the synod, his desire to lay down a confession of his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema over Arius, and expressed his acceptance of the creeds of Nicaea, Constantinople (with the addition of the statement, "proceeding from the Father and the Son"), and Chalcedon. The Goths who took part in the synod condemned Arianism in twenty-three articles. The synod also passed twenty-three articles bearing upon the administration of the church and social evils. These were signed by the king, sixty-four bishops, and seven episcopal substitutes. Leander of Seville closed the proceedings with an address.

The Fourth Council of Toledo (two local councils having been held in 597 and 610) was called by King Sisenand, and convened Dec. 5, 633. Sixty-four bishops were present, and Isidore of Seville acted as president. The king, who had dethroned his predecessor Suintila, threw himself prostrate before the bishops, and with tears begged their intercession with God for himself. The synod passed seventy-five articles confirming the rights of the king, pronouncing eternal excommunication upon all who engaged in rebellion against the throne, etc. The Fifth Council of Toledo convened in 636, at the command of the King Chintila, who sought thereby to confirm his power. The Sixth Council of Toledo was summoned by the same king, in 638. Fifty-two bishops were present. All crimes against the king were declared punishable with eternal damnation. The Seventh Council of Toledo was held in 646, under Chindaswinth, who had risen to the throne by violence. In the collections of the acts of the councils, decrees about the offices of archdeacon, presbyter, sacristan, etc., are attributed to this council, which have no connection with it whatever. The Eighth Council of Toledo was opened by King Receswinth, on Dec. 16, 633. Fifty-two bishops, twelve abbots, sixteen knights, and ten episcopal vicars, were present. The council re-affirmed the sacredness of the oath of fealty to the king, and took measures against the Jews and heretics. The Ninth Council of Toledo convened Nov. 2, 653, transacted no important business. The Tenth Council met in 556, and established the celebration of the feast of the Annunciation of Mary on Dec. 18. The Eleventh Council of Toledo was called by King Wamba in 675, took measures against the licentiousness of the priests, and recommended them to study the Bible assiduously. In 681 Erwig, who had come to the throne by intrigue, called the Twelfth Council of Toledo, in order to have his claims to power confirmed by the hierarchy. New measures were determined upon for the suppression of the remainders of heathenism. The Thirteenth Council of Toledo, consisting of forty-eight bishops, twenty-seven episcopal substitutes, several abbots, and twenty-six civil lords, was convened Nov. 1, 683. Again all are threatened with an endless anathema who make any attempt upon the person of the king or queen. At the Fourteenth Council, in 681, Monothelitism and Apollinarianism were condemned. The Fifteenth Council was held in St. Peter's and St. Paul's Church, 688, with sixty-one bishops present, and refused to change the expression voluntas genuit voluntatem of the preceding synod, which Benedict II. had condemned. It also defended, as against the Pope, the proposition that in Christ there were three substances or natures. The Sixteenth Council of Toledo was convened May 2, 693, with fifty-nine bishops present. The licentiousness of the priests (sodomy, etc.), and the worship of trees, stones, etc., were condemned; and it was ordered that every day of the year (Good Friday excepted) mass should be celebrated in every church for the king and his family. The Seventeenth Council was opened Nov. 9, 694; the occasion for it being a conspiracy against the king, in which the Jews were said to have had the principal part. It was ordered that the Jews should be deprived of their property, and with their wives and children put under the protection of Christians as slaves; Jewish maidens were to marry Christian men; and Jewish men, Christian maidens. The Eighteenth and last Council of Toledo was held probably in 701. Its decrees are lost. Soon after its adjournment the kingdom of the West Goths succumbed to the Mohammedans, and for several centuries the Spanish Church had no opportunity to hold synods.

Looking over the history of the councils of Toledo, we find that the right was conceded to the king of calling and opening the synods, and authorizing their decrees. Civil affairs were adjudicated as well as ecclesiastical matters, and the prime occasion of many of the synods was the settlement of some question concerning the crown. The synods had become parliaments. The metropolitan of Toledo secured great power, but was not regarded as the primate of the Spanish Church. See CENNI: *De antiq. eccles. TOLEDOTH JESHU (תורת ישו), "generations [i.e., history] of Jesus"), a Jewish apocryphon of the middle age, made up of "fragmentary Talmudic legends," which pretends to be a life of Jesus, but is in reality a clumsy and stupid fiction. Its author is unknown. Luther shows up the book in his usual vigorous style in his Schem Hamphoras. There are two widely different recensions of it. Wagenseil published a Latin translation of one in his Tela Ignea Satanae, Altdorf, 1681; and Huldreich of the other, in his Historia Jeschur Nazareni a Judaïs blasphemie corrupta, Leyden, 1705. According to the first, Jesus was born B.C. 106-79; according to the second, B.C. 70-4. TOLET, Francis, a learned Jesuit writer upon ethics and casuistry, and exegete; was b. in Cordova, Oct. 12, or Nov. 10, 1532; d. at Rome, Sept. 14, 1596. After studying at Salamanca, he became professor there of philosophy, and was transferred to Rome, where he acted in the same capacity. A succession of popes held him in the highest esteem, and employed him in diplomatic offices. Clement VIII. made him cardinal, he being the first Jesuit to receive this honor. Six-tus V. and Clement VIII. appointed him one of the laborers upon the new edition of the Vulgate. Among Tolet's numerous commentaries and philosophical works are Introductio in doctorem Aristotelis, Rome, 1561; Instructio sacerdotum de septem peccatis mortalibus, Rome, 1601, which was translated into French and Spanish, and has frequently appeared under the title Summa casuum conscientie.

TOMBES, John, b. at Beandley, Worcestershire, 1603; d. at Salisbury, May 22, 1676. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1621; entered holy orders; soon became famous for his preaching, especially among the Puritans, and was successively lecturer at St. Martin's, Oxford, preacher at Worcester, 1630, shortly afterwards at Leominster (Leicester), and 1641 at Bristol; master of the Temple, London, 1647; preacher at Beandley, 1617. In Beandley he had for his near neighbor Richard Baxter at Kidderminster. Each had his numerous admirers, many of whom made a long journey each week to hear his favorite. Between Tombes and Baxter there was incessant controversy, especially upon infant baptism and church polity. In 1653 Tombes was appointed one of the triers for the approbation of public ministers, and removed to London. In 1655 he married a rich widow, and retired from pastoral duties. He conformed at the Restoration, and lived out his days in quietness and prosperity. He was a vigorous, learned, and unwaried opponent of infant baptism. He had public debates upon this topic with Baxter and others, and wrote numerous treatises upon it. For a list of his writings and further account of the man, see WOOD, Athen. Oxon. (ed. Bliss), iii. 1062-1067. Of his writings may be mentioned, Two treatises and an appendix to them concerning Infant Baptism, London, 1645; Apology for two treatises, 1616; Anti-pedobaptism, 1652, 1651, 1657, 3 parts; Scaphisba, or the oath-book, 1662; Saints no smiters, shewing the doctrine of Fifth-Monarchy men to be antichristian, 1661; Emmanuel, concerning the two natures in Christ, 1669; Animadversiones in librum G. Bulli, Harmonia apostolica, 1676.

TOMLINE, George, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, Oct. 9, 1750; d. at Winchester, Nov. 11, 1827. Graduated at Cambridge, he was successively rector of Corwen (1782), prebend of St. Peter's, Westminster (1781), rector of Sudbury-cum-Offord, Suffolk (1785), bishop of Lincoln, with the deanery of St. Paul's (January, 1787), and finally bishop of Winchester (July, 1820). His family name was Preyman, but he changed his own name to Tomline in order to inherit a considerable fortune. He left two hundred thousand pounds. He is best known by his Elements of Christian Theology, London, 1799, 2 vols. (11th ed., 1814; vol. i. separately printed as Introduction to the Study of the Bible; new ed., 1876); Repetition of the Charge of Calumnies against the Church of England, 1811; Memoirs of Pitt, 1821.

TONQUES, Gift of, a phenomenon of the apostolic age, technically known as the "glossolalia." It first showed itself in Jerusalem, upon Pentecost (Acts ii. 1), but was repeated in other places (x. 46, xix. 6; 1 Cor. xii. xiv.). Paul, in the passages last cited, gives a full description of it. But it has been questioned whether the "glossolalia" of Pentecost was identical with that at Cesarea, Ephesus, and Corinth. The true view seems to be that it was, viz., an "act of worship, and not of teaching." With only a slight difference in the medium of interpretation, it was at once internally interpreted and applied by the Holy Spirit himself to those hearers who believed and were converted, to each in his own vernacular dialect; while in Corinth the interpretation was made either by the speaker in tongues, or by one endowed with the gift of interpretation. It was not a speaking in foreign languages; for, as a matter of fact, only Greek and Hebrew were requisite for the apostles' work, and these they already knew. It had nothing to do directly with the spread of the gospel. It was an act of self-devotion, emotional rather than intellectual, excited rather than calm. If one was not in a similar condition, the glossolalia was like the incoherent talk of a drunken man.

How long the phenomenon lasted, it is impossible to say, but probably not longer than the apostolic age. In later times analogies have been found for it in the "speaking in tongues" of the Camisards, Prophets of the Cevennes, early Quakers and Methodists, Mormons, "Läsare" in Sweden (1841-43), converts in the Irish revival of 1859, and particularly in the Catholic Apostolic (Irvingite) Church.

Other explanations of the glossolalia are: (1) It was a mistake of the narrators there was no such phenomenon — this is the rationalistic explanation; (2) It was a mistake of the hearers, they only imagined it; (3) It was speaking in archaic and foreign forms of speech; (4) It was the language of heaven or of paradise; (5) It was a permanent miraculous endowment with a knowledge of those foreign tongues in which the apostles were to preach the gospel; (6) It was a temporary speaking in foreign languages, and ended with the Day of Pentecost.

See LIT. in SCHAFF: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., N.Y., vol. i., 1882, p. 221, and his note Glossolalia, pp. 231-232.

TONSURE, The, denotes the practice of the Roman-Catholic and Greek churches, by which a portion of the skull of the priests is shaven. It precedes the consecration to clerical orders, and is a specific mark of distinction between the clergy and the laity (Conc. Trid., xiii. 6). He who has once received the tonsure must always retain it. It may be conferred upon candidates in their seventh year, but in this case they may not exercise spiritual functions till they are fourteen years old (Conc. Trid., xiii. 3). The tonsure is regarded as a symbol of Christ's crown of thorns, the regal dignity of the priesthood, and the renunciation of the world, and is sometimes based upon Acts xvi. 21, 26, 1 Cor. xi. 11, 15. It is held that Paul and Peter practised it. It is an historical fact, that, in the fourth century, neither monks nor priests practised the tonsure [so also Weter and Welte]. The cutting of the beard, and hair of the head, was forbidden by the Council of Carthage (398); and Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xliv., says that the Christian priest was not to appear with shorn head, lest he be confounded with the priests of Isis and Serapis, and other heathen divinities. The custom of cutting the hair at first prevailed among the penitent, and was taken up by the monks in the fifth century. They shaved the hair down to the skin; and this practice was considered symbolical of penitence. From the sixth century on, the priests followed the practice. Three principal styles of tonsure have prevailed. The Roman tonsure consists of the shaving of the entire skull, except a ring of hair extending all around the head. According to tradition, Peter's tonsure was of this kind. The synod of Toledo, in 633, decreed this style for Spain. The extent of the shaven part was gradually diminished; but the synod of Placentia (1388) ordered that it should be at least four fingers broad. The Greek tonsure, also called "the tonsure of Paul," consists in shaving the fore-part of the skull entirely bare. The Keltic or British tonsure, called also "the tonsure of James or Simon Magnus," consists in shaving the head bare in front of a line drawn across the skull from ear to ear. [The style of the tonsure formed a subject of most violent controversy in England after the arrival of Augustine and his monks, until the final victory of the Roman type of Christianity over the old Keltic Church in the eighth century.]

The tonsure is conferred by the bishops, cardinal priests, and abbots (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 10). The Pope may also vest the right in priests. [See BEDE: Historia Ecclesiastica, iv. 1; MARTENE: De antiqu. eccl'es. rit.; art. "Tonsur," in WETZER U. WELTE.] NEUDECKER.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, was b. at Farnham in Surrey, Nov. 4, 1710; and d. in London, Aug. 11, 1778. He was "awakened" in a barn in Ireland, 1755, and "led into a full and clear view of the doctrines of grace," 1758. He was ordained 1762, and was vicar of Broad Hembury, Devonshire, from 1768 till his death. He published The Church of England vindicated from the Charge of Arminianism (1774, 2 vols.) and some sermons, besides many articles in the Gospel Magazine. His works appeared in six volumes, 1825. They are filled with the most advanced doctrine and the most conscientiously acrimonious controversy.

His intellect was precocious. In 1759, at the age of nineteen, he issued in Dublin Poems on Sacred Subjects, pp. 156. His later hymns add to these but one-third of their bulk, but include his most important compositions. No reliable edition of his entire verses existed prior to that of D. Sedgwick, 1860. His Psalms and Hymns, 1776, contained but few of his own.

As to Toplady's talent and earnestness there are not two opinions. Montgomery's remark, that "he evidently kindled his poetic torch at that of his contemporary, Charles Wesley," means merely that he could not be insensitive to Wesley's example and influence. So similar were their gifts, that their hymns can be distinguished only by the dominant emotionalism of one, and the severer doctrinal tone of the other. Agreeing in every thing else, difference of opinion as to the Decrees made and kept them the worst of friends. "Mr. John Wesley," said Toplady in a sermon, "is the only opponent I ever had whom I chastised with a studious disregard to ceremony. . . . I only gave him the whip, when he deserved a scorpion." "They have defended their dear Decrees," retorted Wesley in his Arminian Magazine, "with arguments worthy of Bedlam, and language worthy of Billings-gate." Yet Toplady took near half his collection from these "blind Arminians," and has frequently received credit for some of their best. His own poetry was better than his polemic, and has often "a peculiarly ethereal spirit." Some of his hymns are heavily weighted with divinity; but his "Rock of Ages" is one of the best and most popular hymns in any language. TORQUEMADA (TURRECREMATA), the name of two distinguished Spanish ecclesiastics. — I. Juan de, b. in Valladolid, 1388, educated there and in Paris; was appointed (1431) by Eugenius IV. "master of the holy palace," sent by him to the Council of Basel, and made cardinal in 1439. He wrote De conceptione deipare Mariæ, libri viii. (Rome, 1547, ed. with preface and notes, by Dr. E. B. Pusey, Lond., 1869, etc.), and died at Rome, Sept. 26, 1468. See LEDERER: Der spanische Cardinal Johann von Torquemada, sein Leben u. seine Schriften, Freiburg-im-Br., 1879. — II. Thomas de, the famous inquisitor, was b. at Valladolid, 1420; d. at Avila, Sept. 16, 1498. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic, and gave himself up wholly to the organization of the Spanish Inquisition, and overcame the scruples of Isabella. It was at the request of Ferdinand and herself that the "Holy Office" of the Inquisition was created by Sixtus IV., Nov. 1, 1478. When this Pope determined to appoint an inquisitor-general, the appointment fell on Torquemada (1482). The laws and methods of the Spanish Inquisition were his work. The laws appeared in Madrid, 1576, with the title Copilacion de las instrucciones del officio de la santa inquisición, hechas por el muy reverendo señor Fray Thomas de Torquemada, etc. It was due largely to him that the large sum offered by the Jews was not accepted by Ferdinand, and that they were expelled from Spain in 1492. Torquemada's name has become synonymous with cold-blooded cruelty. LONGFELLOW has a fine poem on the subject; and PRES-COTT has given a picture of him in his Ferdinand and Isabella. See INQUISITION.

TORREY, Joseph, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rowley, Mass., Feb. 2, 1797; d. at Burlington, Vt., Nov. 26, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; pastor at Royalton, Vt., 1819-27; professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Vermont, 1827-42; and of intellectual and moral philosophy from 1842 till his death. He was president of the university from 1863 to 1865. He edited the Remains of President James Marsh, 1843, the Select Sermons of President Worthington Smith, 1861, prefacing each volume with a carefully prepared Memoir; wrote A Theory of Fine Art (lectures, New York, 1874); but his greatest service was his masterly translation of Neander's General History of the Christian Religion and Church, Boston, 12th ed., 1881, 5 vols., with model index volume.

TOSSANUS, Petrus (Pierre Toussaint), b. at Saint-Laurent, Lorraine, in 1169; d. at Mumpelgard in 1573. He studied theology at Cologne, Basel, Paris, and Rome, and was made a canon at the Cathedral of Metz. But, when the persecutions against the Protestants began, he fled to Basel, and formally embraced the Reformation. Two attempts he made to propagate his views in France (at Metz and in Paris) ended with imprisonment; but in 1539 he was by the Duke of Wurtemberg made superintendent of Mumpelgard, where he introduced the Reformation, not without great difficulties, however, as he was a Calvinist, and the duke a Lutheran.

TOULMIN, Joshua, D.D., English Unitarian; b. in London, May 11, 1719; d. at Birmingham, July 23, 1815. He was a Baptist minister at Taunton, 1765; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was one of Dr. Priestley's successors at Birmingham. He was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1791; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1801; Memoirs of Samuel Bourne, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1811; and edited, with Life, NEAL'S History of the Puritans, 1791-97, 5 vols., the basis of all subsequent editions.

TOULOUSE, Synods of. Many ecclesiastical councils have been held in Toulouse, some of which are important. At the suggestion of Louis, a synod was convened in Toulouse, probably in 829. The decrees are lost. One was held in 883 to adjust the complaint which Jews had made to King Carlmann, of being abused by clergy and laity. One in 1056, summoned by Pope Victor II., consisted of eighteen bishops, and passed thirteen canons forbidding simony, insisting upon the rule of celibacy, and placing the age of ordination to priests' orders at thirty, and to deacons' orders at twenty-five. The synod of 1118 was concerned with the inception of a crusade against the Moors in Spain. The synod which Pope Calixtus II. presided over in person reiterated the laws against simony, confirmed the right of the bishops to tithes, etc. The synod of 1161, at which the kings of France and England, and legates of Pope Alexander III. and his rival, Victor III., were present, declared Alexander pope, and pronounced excommunication upon Victor. The synod of 1219 forbade the conferment of offices upon heretics, and forbade all work upon church-festival days which are mentioned by name.

The synod of 1229, in the pontificate of Gregory IX., is important. It obligated archbishops and bishops, or priests, and two or three laymen, to bind themselves by oath to search out heretics, and bring them to punishment. A heretic's house was to be destroyed. Penitent heretics were to be obliged to wear a cross on their right and left side, and might not receive an office until the Pope or his legate should attest the purity of his faith. All men of fourteen years and over, and all women of twelve years and over, were to be required to deny all connection with heresy and heretics. This oath was to be repeated every two years. Laymen were also forbidden the possession of the Old and New Testament; and the suppression of vernacular translations was especially commended. In 1590 a Council of Toulouse declared the Tridentine Decrees binding, and took up various subjects, such as robes, the consecration of churches, oratories, the administration of hospitals, etc. As late as 1850 a provincial synod was held at Toulouse, under the presidency of Archbishop d'Astros, which declared against the tendencies of modern thought, indifference, socialism, etc. See HARDEN, MANSI, etc.; [and for a sketch of Toulouse's religious history, VINCENT: In the Shadow of the Pyrenees, New York, 1883, pp. 211-232.] SEE DECKER.

TOURNEMINE, René Joseph, b. at Rennes, April 26, 1661; d. in Paris, March 16, 1735. He was educated by the Jesuits; entered their order, taught theology and philosophy in several of their houses, and was in 1695 placed at the head of the Journal de Trévoux, which he conducted till 1718 with great moderation and tact. He also published in 1719 an excellent edition of the Brevi expusitio sensus literalis totius scripturæ (Cologne, 1630, 2 vols.) of the Jesuit Menochius (b. at Padua, 1576; d. at Rome, Feb. 1, 1655); but his principal work, Traité sur le Disme, remained unfinished. See Journal de Trévoux, September, 1735.

TOURS, Synods of. The first synod of Tours of which any account has been preserved convened in 461, passed thirteen canons re-affirming the decrees of former synods, forbidding priests to whom the privilege of marriage was accorded to marry widows, pronouncing excommunication upon priests who renounced their orders, etc. The synod of 567 met with the consent of King Charibert, and passed twenty-seven canons regulating matters of church-discipline. The synod of 813 was convened by the order of Charlemagne, and passed fifty-one canons defining the duties of bishops, putting the ordination of priests in their thirtieth year, regulating the relation of nuns and monks, forbidding markets on Sunday, etc. The canons close with a profession of absolute submission to Charlemagne. Another synod was held at the time the remains of St. Martin were conveyed from Auxerre to Tours,—either in 912 or 887. The synod of 912 is barely mentioned, and that of 1055 was convened with reference to the views of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been condemned as heretical. Berengar on that occasion renounced his views.

In 1069 the cardinal legate Stephen convened a synod at Tours, which concerned itself with the purchase and sale of church-offices, the licentiousness and concubinage of the clergy, etc. The council of 1096 was occupied with the release of King Philip of France from the ban of the church, and with the preparation for the first crusade. In 1163 Pope Alexander III. presided in person over a synod at Toulouse which excommunicated the antipope, Victor IV., and recognized his own claims. The synods of 1236 and 1282 were concerned with matters of church-discipline. The important synod of 1510 took up the violent conflict which was then raging between Louis XI. of France and the belligerent Pope, Julius II. The chancellor of Louis opened the council with complaints against the Pope, and in the king's name presented several questions to the assembled dignitaries bearing upon the relations of states to the papal see. The first of these was whether the Pope might carry on war against princes who with their lands acknowledge allegiance to the church. The synod answered that the Pope had no right to begin any such war. A second question concerned the right of a prince with whom the Pope was at war to enter the Pope's dominion, in case of certain abuses; and this the synod likewise answered in the affirmative. A provincial council was also held at Tours in 1853, to confirm and take measures to carry out the Tridentine Decrees. See HARBESIN, MANSL. SEUDECKER.

TOWIANSKI, Andreas, Polish mystic; b. at Antoszwinec, Lithuania, Jan. 1, 1799; d. at Zurich, Switzerland, May 13, 1878. From 1818 to 1826 he practised law at Wilna; in 1835 became a convert of St. Simon at Paris; and on Sept. 27, 1841, he began the public proclamation of his revolutionary views, which called for a total upheaval of society and a new arrangement. The Polish poet Mickiewicz was one of his followers. See SEMENKA: T. et sa doctrine, Paris, 1850; and MICKIEWICZ: Eglise officielle et le Messianisme, 1842-43, 2 vols.

TOWNLEY, James, D.D., English Wesleyan; b. in Manchester, May 11, 1771; d. at Ramsgate, Dec. 12, 1833. After a good school education he became a local preacher at the age of nineteen, and was from 1796 to 1832 a regular minister. In 1827 he was appointed general secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. He presided at the conference at Sheffield, 1829, and again at the Irish conference, 1830. He was, next to Dr. Clarke, the most learned man among his brethren in all biblical matters, and wrote, among other works of less value, the excellent Illustrations of Biblical Literature, exhibiting the History and Fate of the Sacred Writings, from the Earliest Period to the Present Century, including Biographical Notices of Translators and Other Eminent Biblical Scholars (London, 1821, 3 vols.; New York, 1842, 2 vols.), and translated pt. iii. 26-49 of Maimonides' Recesses of the Laws of Moses, with Notes, Dissertations, and Life (1827).

TOWNSON, Thomas, D.D., Church of England; b. at Much Lees, Essex, 1715; d. at Richmond, April 15, 1792. He was a fellow of Magdalen College; and, after filling various appointments, he was made archdeacon of Richmond, 1780. In 1778 he published at Oxford his most admired work, Discourses on the Four Gospels, chiefly with regard to the Peculiar Design of Each and the Order and Places in which they were written. His Works, ed. by Ralph Churton, with an account of the author, appeared in London, 1810, 2 vols.

TRACHONITIS is mentioned only once in scripture (Luke iii. 1), where the expression, "the Trachonite region," seems to include, besides the province of Trachonitis, parts of Auranitis, Golanitis, and Batanea. It was bounded north by Damascus, and east by Golanitis. By Augustus it was taken from Zenodorus, and given to Herod the Great, from whom it devolved upon Philip. After the beginning of the second century the name does not occur any more in history.

TRACTARIANISM, the name of a remarkable movement in the Established Church of England, due to the so-called Times for the Times, a series of pamphlets published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841. The leaders of the movement were all Oxford men, and members of Oriel. They were John Keble, John Henry Newman, Richard Hurrell Froude, Hugh John Rose, Arthur Philip Perceval, Frederick William Faber, William Palmer, Edward Benson, Pusey, and Isaac Williams.

The series consisted of ninety tracts, of which Newman wrote twenty-four, and Keble also a goodly number. The movement was essentially a revival of medieval ecclesiasticism and scholasticism, in protest to evangelicalism, and to that political liberalism which abolished the Test Act in 1828, and ten of the Irish bishoprics in 1833, whose occupants had voted against the Reform Bill of 1831. The way was prepared for the movement by John Keble's Christian Year, 1827. Its real founder was Hugh James Rose. Its start was given by A. P. Perceval's Christian Peace-Offering, 1828. The object of this book was to show that the Anglican and Roman churches were essentially agreed. Then came Froude, who argued that the existing Roman Church had departed from the primitive faith, and so, in a less degree, had the Anglican Church, but that the teachings of the latter admitted of construction in the sense of the primitive church. He therefore urged the claims of celibacy, fasting, relics, and monasticism. But, as the tendency of the political movements of their time was directly against such a return of the middle age, the little coterie at Oxford published The Churchman's Manual (1833), in which they made prominent the three points of the idea of the church, the importance of the sacraments, and the significance of the priesthood. On July 14, 1833, Keble preached an assize sermon upon National Apostasy, from 1 Sam. xii. 23. This sermon Newman regarded as the actual start of the movement. Upon July 25-29, 1833, Rose, Froude, Keble, Newman, Palmer, and Perceval held a conference at Haddenham, to revise the Manual, and devise a plan of action. It was then agreed that the two points to be aimed at were the maintenance of the doctrine of apostolic succession, and the preservation of the Prayer-Book from Socinian alteration. In September, Keble drew up the programme of the party; and on Sept. 9, 1833, the first Tract for the Times (designed to indoctrinate the laity in Catholic theology and polity) appeared, and the coterie, through their connection with the series of Tracts, received the name "Tractarians," as the writers or compilers of the tracts themselves, and as the indorsers of the sentiments advocated. The first tract was by Newman, entitled Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission. The Churchman's Manual had been sent to all the Scottish bishops, and approved by them, while the Archbishop of Canterbury did not object to its publication. And the first tracts also found a warm reception. They were looked upon as valuable allies in the defence of the Established Church against the insidious attacks of the Liberals. By November, 1835, seventy of them had appeared. The first sixty-six consist of extracts from the Fathers, Beveridge, Bull, Cosin, and Wilson, with a few original tracts. The succeeding twenty-four are longer, and more elaborate. They make altogether six volumes. But the movement was by no means a peaceful progress. In March, 1841, the Christian Observer, an Evangelical newspaper, decried it as Romanistic. Newman, in Tracts 38 and 41 (Unmodum), denied the charge. In 1836 the Tractarians vigorously opposed the appointment of Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, to the regius-professorship of divinity, on the ground of his latitudinarian principles. A great pamphlet war was thus opened; but the Tractarians were defeated. In 1837 the Romanward tendency of the movement more plainly manifested itself, especially in Isaac Williams's tract (No. 89), On Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge. It advocated a revival of the disciplina arcani of the Ante-Nicene Church, i.e., the ideas that there were doctrines which should not be publicly taught; and that the Bible should not be promiscuously circulated. Keble's tracts were in similar strain. The effect of such writing was twofold, — the public was dismayed, and certain members of the Tractarian party avowed their intention to become Romanists. In 1838 the Library of the Fathers (see PATRISTICS) was started by the Tractarians, and in 1840 the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, which contained old High-Church writers of the Church of England who more or less sympathized with the views of the Tractarians. But so decided was the setting of the tide towards Rome, that Newman made a vigorous effort to turn it by his famous tract (No. 90), Remarks on Certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles, in which he endeavored to show how it was possible to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in the interest of Catholicism. He maintained that "the sixth and twentieth articles, on Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church, were not inconsistent with the Anglo-Catholic idea; that the true rule of faith is not in Scripture alone, but in apostolic tradition; that Art. XI., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification, and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and general councils, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequently not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny that confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, were sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord's Supper; that Art. XXXIII. only condemned gross views of transubstantiation, not the mysterious presence of the body of Christ. The articles on masses and clerical celibacy were in like manner explained away" (Stoughton). The tract appeared in March, 1841; Newman acknowledged on the 16th. The violent controversy which the tract occasioned led to the "discontinuance" of the series.

The tract, although nominally an attempt to dissuade from Rome, was denounced as in reality leading towards it. Then came a sifting of the party. Those who were content to stay in the Church of England drew all the closer together. They were such men as Pusey, Williams, Keble, and Perceval. But soon the movement swept away from this middle position such leading spirits as Newman and Faber in 1845, and Manning in 1851. Before 1853 not less than four hundred clergymen and laity had become Roman Catholics. They were "chiefly impressive undergraduates, young ladies, and young ladies' en-rates" (Blunt). But the action of the Roman Church (October, 1850), in distributing England into twelve bishoprics, while it rendered that church more attractive, at the same time aroused the strong Protestant feeling, and doubtless checked many from going to Rome. For the present state of the tractarian movement, see art. RITUALISM.

Tractarian Doctrine. — The fundamental doctrines concern the sacrament of the Eucharist, which is declared to be the means of salvation, and the church with the apostolical succession, which is the divinely appointed channel of saving grace through the Eucharist. Baptism regenerates, yet the baptized can fall from grace. In the Eucharist, the bread and wine truly, but in a heavenly and spiritual manner, become the body and blood of Christ; and the worthy communicant receives the same to his spiritual welfare and salvation, but the unworthy to judgment. Because of the real presence of Christ, it is right to bow at the consecration of the elements; for one adores, not the elements, but Christ who is present in them. As regards the church as the means of salvation, founded by Christ, and perpetuated by the apostolical succession, she is the only channel of grace in Christ, because she is the only dispenser of the means of grace, the only protector and witness to the truth, and the highest authority in matters of faith and life. As channel of the means of salvation, she constitutes the communion of saints. She is one — holy, catholic, and apostolic in origin and teaching. The three marks of the true church are apostolicity (through apostolical succession securing the validity, the sacraments, and the power of the keys), catholicity (through Scripture and tradition securing truth in doctrine and life), and autonomy (absolute independence of external authority in matters of faith and practice). By apostolic succession was meant that Jesus gave his spirit to the apostles, and they to those upon whom they laid their hands, who, in turn, possessed the power to impart the gift; and so it has come down to our day. With this idea is connected that of the priesthood as the necessary and unique mediators between Christ and the congregation, and so a sharp line is drawn between clergy and laity. The true church thus constituted is not an ideal, but a reality, an external and visible organization. The true visible church is the communion of saints, in which the Word is preached in its purity, the sacraments administered according to Christ's ordinance, and discipline rightfully maintained. The invisible church is the household of God, in heaven and earth. The Rule of Faith is the Holy Scriptures and the Catholic tradition together.

As a theological school, Tractarianism is modern scholasticism. The realistic tendency of Tractarianism is plain. Justification, it teaches, is a real impartation of spiritual life through the sacraments; the true church is real, objective; truth is really objectively given; the gift of the Holy Spirit is really transmitted through the apostolical succession; Christ is really present in the Eucharist, so also in worship. The external must have a real meaning, it must express some idea. A change was therefore made in the accessories of worship. Everywhere beauty in architecture, in vestments, in music (vocal and instrumental), was insisted upon, with the result of striking improvement. Enormous sums have been spent in these directions. Cathedrals have been restored, religious houses have been erected, and the appointments of the sanctuary multiplied and refined.

And Tractarianism powerfully affected the religious life of thousands. The church was to be served by organizations for religious and philanthropic action, and these have sprung into existence. The influence of doctrine upon life was emphasized: daily duties were explained and enforced; and so the movement proved a great good to the community. But it has also been a fruitful source of secession to Rome, and has produced an agnostic and rationalistic re-action in the Church of England.

TRACT SOCIETIES, Religious. I. Great Britain.—The maintenance and diffusion of religious opinion by means of pamphlets or tractates is a habit older than the invention of printing; and perhaps John Wiclif was the greatest tract-writer that ever lived. But it has been reserved to modern times to make full use of the same method as a means of evangelization; and tract societies are now recognized by all churches as among their most effective instruments for good. Among the pioneers in this work, a foremost place must be given to HANNAH MORE, whose Cheap Repository tracts, towards the close of the eighteenth century, circulated by hundred of thousands, served greatly to counteract the influence of the irreligious, anti-social, cheap literature which at that time was diffused, chiefly by hawkers, throughout Great Britain. The Book Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor had been formed as long back as 1759. But a new departure was taken in this direction in 1799 by the formation of the Religious Tract Society in London, chiefly through the influence of the Rev. George Burder of Coventry and his coadjutors; the Rev. Joseph Hughes of Battersea being the first secretary. The object set forth in the first minute was "to form a society for the purpose of printing and distributing religious tracts." The first meeting was held in Surrey Chapel, the Rev. Rowland Hill himself exerting much influence in the establishment of the society. Two principles from the first were recognized: first, that there is a common Christian faith, in the expression and enforcement of which all evangelical believers may unite, irrespective of ecclesiastical or doctrinal distinctions; and, secondly, that this faith may be set forth in so brief a compass and so simple a way, that even the smallest tract may contain the essentials of saving truth. A third principle, no less important than these two, had to await full recognition until a later day,—that the great verities of religion may rightly be associated with every topic of human thought and interest: the Christianity of the Bible thus becoming the animating spirit of a various, instructive, and ennobling literature. At the outset, the production of tracts was the only aim; and the value of the method, as well as the appropriateness and interest of the first publications issued, led to a speedy enlargement of the work beyond the anticipations of its early promoters. The tracts of the society were issued by thousands, and obtained that place in the esteem of Christian workers generally which they have ever since retained. Nor was the testimony given to the real unity of Christ's church less valuable. Very early in the history of the society it was adopted as a fundamental rule, that its managers should be taken in equal numbers from the Church of England and from the ranks of Non-conformity. The experience of more than eighty years has shown that it is not only possible, but easy, for all to labor together in this work, without any compromise of individual opinions, or any entanglement in doctrinal or ecclesiastical dispute; and no Christians are excluded from the society, but such as exclude themselves, on the one hand by a rigid churchmanship, or on the other by a rationalism which seems to ignore important principles of evangelical truth. Nor has this comprehensiveness been evinced only in one special work. It was in the committee room of the Religious Tract Society, at the close of the year 1802, that the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY was originated, and on Tuesday, Feb. 1, 1803, that its rules were finally adopted; the diffusion of the streams thus naturally leading to the fountain-head. From the first, the two societies have labored together in brotherly union for the evangelization of the world.

The Tracts of the society, in accordance with its name and first design, claim the chief place in our notice of its publications. These are of immense variety in style and form, adapted to every class of readers, old and young. Every tract, before adoption by the society, is submitted to the whole committee, and decided on by vote. It is held as essential that every tract should set forth the way of salvation, by the atonement of Christ, and through the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart. And, further, it is required that the narratives in these tracts should be literally true. Fiction, it is held, has its becoming place in literature; but a tract, to win the highest usefulness, should deal with real personages and actual experiences. Of the tracts produced under these conditions, there are now about 3,200 on the society's catalogue, from the single-page handbill to the important series of Present-day Tracts, in which some of the foremost scholars and thinkers of the day have employed their pens for the defence of the Christian faith. The tract circulation in the year 1882-83, in the English language alone, amounted to 33,249,800.

But, as has been already intimated, the work of the society now extends far beyond the production of tracts. The publication of Books was very gradually introduced, and the earliest attempts in this direction seem to have been to popularize the standard works of "Puritan" divinity. Through the indefatigable energy of Mr. George Stokes, a gentleman of fortune (founder, in 1810, of the well-known Parker Society, who long gave his editorial services to the society, the chief practical and experimental works of the English Reformers, and of their great successors in the seventeenth century, were issued, mostly in an abridged form. To the writings of Wiclif, Tyndale, Latimer, Becon, and many more who took part in the struggle against papal domination, were added the choicest works of Baxter, Howe, Owen, Flavel, Sibbes, Charnock, and a host of others, mostly abbreviated to suit the taste or the leisure of modern times. These writings had for a while a very large circulation, and contributed not a little to sustain among thoughtful readers the relish for the old English Protestant theology. Other publishers have since taken up the work, and the fashion of abridgments has passed away; so that in a great measure this part of the society's labor has been superseded. Besides preparing these editions, Mr. Stokes also wrote a considerable number of manuals on biblical history and antiquities in a form suited to young people and Sunday-school teachers; entering thus upon a wide field, which has since been largely occupied. Among the larger works of this period was also a Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, compiled from Henry, Scott, and other writers, and in some measure combining the characteristics of both of the commentators named. To this have from time to time been added other important works of biblical exposition, notably Leighton on St. Peter, and the American commentaries of Hodge on the Epistle to the Romans, and of Barnes on the Gospels (abridged). But the great work of the society in this special direction has been the Annotated Paragraph Bible, which after several years of careful preparation, enlisting the services of many eminent biblical critics of the day, appeared in 1851 under the direction of the late Mr. Joseph Gurney, treasurer of the society, who, besides providing all expenses of editorship, had the stereotype plates prepared at his own cost. This work has stood the test of thirty-two years; and, notwithstanding the more recent appearance of several important commentaries on Scripture, it still holds a high place in the esteem of competent judges. Bible dictionaries and concordances have also been issued by the society for many years, with companions and helps of different kinds, among which may be mentioned the Bible Handbook, by Dr. Angus, and the Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek Testament, by the author of the present article. In modern practical and devotional Christian literature, the work that has achieved the largest circulation, and probably the most extended usefulness, has been James's Autious Enquirer, the society having circulated no fewer than 845,000 copies of this book in its several editions. Pike's Presences to Early Piety may also be mentioned as having formerly been very popular as a gift to the young. In the year 1819 the committee resolved to offer prizes to workmen for the best essays on sabbath observance. There were numerous competitors, and much was thus effected in awakening Christian thoughtfulness in our land in reference to a very important part of practical godliness. Prizes were also offered in 1850 for essays on the condition of the working classes; the winner of the first prize, by an essay entitled The Glory and the Shame of Britain,—Mr. Henry Danckley, now of Manchester,—has since won for himself a foremost place in the ranks of English journalism.

The range of the society's publications has been gradually widened beyond that of exclusively religious teaching. Books "on common subjects written in a religious spirit," to adopt the phrase of Dr. Arnold, have been multiplied. Foremost among these in utility has been the Educational Series, including the well-known Handbooks of the English Language and of English Literature, by Dr. Angus; also Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, with a system of Universal Geography. For some years a sixpenny Monthly Volume treated, in a popular but thoroughly competent way, many great questions of philosophy, science, and history. These were truly "small books on great subjects," and have had an important share in the education of many. Biographies published by the society have been very numerous, both of the saints and heroes of the church, and of many in humbler positions, whose example it seemed well to preserve. The lives of Tyndale and of Latimer, by the late Robert Demaus, rank among the highest in this class of literature; and it may be that almost as much real usefulness has been achieved by Leigh Richmond's Annals of the Poor, or the unpretending memoir of Harlan Page.

Books of a yet more popular class have been published by the society in great abundance. The Pilgrim's Progress has been issued in sixty-five languages, mainly by the society's aid. For many years the kindly humor of "Old Humfrey"—the "Christian Elia," as he was called by the late Dr. James Hamilton—irradiated many a little volume, both for younger and for elder readers. The name of this charming author was George Mowbray. He died in 1851, at the age of sixty-seven. A long array of juvenile publications, from Mrs. Sherwood's Little Henry and his Bear, down to the last boys' story by Mr. G. E. Sargent, or pathetic tale by "Hesba Stretton," provides reading for every taste. Of Jessie's First Prayer, by the last-named writer, the sale has amounted to 837,500 copies, inclusive of a penny edition recently published. Christy's Old Organ, by Mrs. Walton, is also well known on both sides of the Atlantic, and has been remarkably useful to many readers. The illustrations of this class of books, and of others published by the society of late years, have been, in their finish and artistic merit, a striking contrast to those contained in its earlier volumes. The highest resources of the wood-engraver's art are now called into requisition; and, in a special series of Pen and Pencil Pictures from many lands, the descriptive and the artistic portions vie with each other in the care with which they have been elaborated. The Harvest of a Quiet Eye, and other works of poetic, meditative musing, by the same author, may also be mentioned, for the beauty and finish of their pictorial illustrations.

The Preciousness of the society have also become a very important part of its work. The first was The Child's Companion, begun in 1821, and still teaching its attractive lessons to generation after generation of little ones. The Working Visitor (commenced in 1828) for many years sought to combine useful information with Christian teaching; but in 1852 the same work was undertaken by The Leisure Hour, with a higher standard of literary merit. The Sunday at Home attempts for the Lord's Day what The Leisure Hour strives to do for the week. In 1879 The Boy's Own Paper was started as a weekly journal, followed by The Girl's Own Paper in 1880. Intended at the outset to convey healthful moral and religious teaching, with a due admixture of the attractive and amusing, so as to supersede as far as possible the frivolous and often debasing literature offered to our young people, the success of these periodicals has surpassed the highest expectations of their promoters, and English-speaking boys and girls throughout the whole world welcome them as their own magazines. The circulation of the two together now amounts to about 350,000 of each number. The Tract Magazine and The Cottage and Artisan are also published by the society.

There are now in all some 10,000 separate publications on the catalogue of the society; and taking into account the books, tracts, and periodicals, with illustrated cards, texts, and the like, the total issues of the year 1882-83 have amounted to a total of 79,379,350; being by far the largest number in any year of the society's existence.

The Religious Tract Society is also a great MISSIONARY INSTITUTION. For the furtherance of its highest purposes, the committee make every week large grants of tracts to distributors at home and abroad, either altogether gratuitously, or at a considerable reduction in price. One circumstance that contributes no little to its usefulness is, that it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner acting the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist their efforts. Tracts are supplied in unstinted numbers for missionary efforts of every kind, for hospital and workhouse visitation, for emigrant and other ships, for soldiers on service abroad, and for settlers in our colonies all over the world.

To a great extent, also, the circulation of the books published by the society is aided by the plans of the committee. Thus all pastors, and missionaries of all denominations, are permitted, in the first year of their ministry, to purchase these publications at a greatly reduced price. School and district libraries are furnished at a large reduction, and great facilities for purchase are allowed to Sunday-school teachers. In the efforts also to diffuse a Christian literature in foreign languages, the society is continually active, having representatives or correspondents in every country of Europe, and in all the chief mission-fields of the East and West. It publishes, or aids the publication of, tracts, books, and periodicals in as many as one hundred and sixty-six languages and dialects, and is, in fact, an auxiliary to every Protestant missionary society. The methods by which it acts are very various. Large money grants are made in aid of the publication-work of many missions. Gifts of printing-paper are voted for periodicals; electrotype illustrations are also freely given, or supplied at a low price; and grants of publications are made for gratuitous distribution. The societies and missions thus aided are naturally, for the most part, English; but those of the United States and of Germany to a large extent share also in the benefit. Important societies at Paris, Toulouse, Basle, Berlin, Hamburg, Gernsbach (Black Forest), Stockholm, Kristiania, and other places, carry on their several plans of publication and distribution; the London Tract Society being in various ways the helper of all.

To meet these varied claims, the society has to rely, first upon its benevolent income; the money it receives from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and collections, being applied, without any deduction whatever, to the missionary work of the society. But these furnish less than half what is actually expended, the remainder being supplied from trade profits after the payment of all expenses. The benevolent income for the year 1882-83 has amounted to £14,824 sterling, to which sum £25,574 have been added from the profits on sales, and £11,403 from the part payments of the individuals and societies receiving grants; making a grand total of £51,801 spent in the missionary work of the society.

These details respecting one institution, the largest of the kind in Great Britain, will illustrate the working of other societies that have a similar end in view, but work either in denominational channels, or in a more restricted way. The SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE, founded in 1698, is wholly connected with the Church of England, and publishes yearly a vast amount of popular literature, reporting an issue, for the year 1881-82, of 8,525,091. The Wesleyans and the Baptists have also special organizations for tract-work. Christian workers connected with Mildmay Park in London, and various sections of Plymouth Brethren, publish many tracts. The Monthly Tract Society (founded 1837), and the Weekly Tract Society (1847), publish and issue each a tract periodically, to subscribers and others, chiefly through the post. The Pure Literature Society (1851) prepares and circulates lists of books judged suitable for reading and distribution. And, in addition to all these, the private ventures of able tract-writers make no inconsiderable addition to this class of literature; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Kyle, Bishop of Liverpool, and the Rev. P. B. Power, being especially noteworthy. In Scotland, the Scottish Tract and Book Society devotes itself rather to distribution than to publication, employing a large number of colporters with marked success; while the Stirling Tracts, at first prepared and printed by the private enterprise of the late Mr. Peter Drummond, a wealthy seed-merchant in that town, but now conducted by a committee, and entitled "The Stirling Tract Enterprise," are circulated by millions. A Dublin Tract and Book Repository was, until lately, carried on with a special view to Ireland; but the work for that country is now chiefly in the hands of the London and Scottish societies. Many publishers in England and Scotland find it unremunerative to publish "leaflets" — miniature tracts — or single hymns, chiefly for enclosure in letters. A vast circulation is thus secured in the correspondence of relatives and friends, and much good is accomplished in a quiet way, of which no statistics can be given. The power of the press, indeed, only begins to be understood as a means of counteracting error, of diffusing truth, and, in the largest sense of the phrase, of preaching Christ's gospel.

The Jubilee Memorial Volume of the Religious Tract Society, by Mr. William Jones (London, 8vo, 1850), contains in full detail the history of this institution for the first fifty years of its existence, and abounds in valuable information respecting the methods and results of tract-distribution in the earlier days of the enterprise. It is still the standard volume on the subject. The yearly reports of the various societies mentioned above must be studied to complete the details, and to bring them down to the present time.

[There are also tract societies supported by all branches of the Protestant Church in Paris, Lausanne, Toulouse, Brussels, Geneva, and other Continental cities.]

S. G. GREEN, D.D.

(Secretary Religious Tract Society, London).

II. United States.—The word "tract" was used by old English writers as nearly equivalent to "treatise," and was often applied to volumes, as well as to pamphlets of a few pages only, and on any subject,—scientific, political, reformatory, etc. The Scriptures themselves are a series of tracts. In our own time, though the word "tract" may still cover the same extent of meaning, in common parlance it is understood to denote a short religious appeal or pamphlet; and tract societies are voluntary associations of Christians to publish and circulate religious tracts, volumes included.

The importance of adding to the influence of spoken truth the permanent effectiveness of the printed page was early felt by Christians. What a good book can do, and how its influence may germinate and perpetuate itself, is well shown in the familiar history of Baxter's conversion, aided by reading Dr. Gibbs's book, The Bruised Reed, and Baxter's instrumentality in the conversion of Doddridge, by whose Rise and Progress Wilberforce was led to the truth, into which his Practical Piety, in turn, guided Leigh Richmond, the author of tracts that have brought multitudes to Christ. It was evident that much good might be wrought by short, condensed, earnest, and striking tracts; and efforts were early made by individuals to furnish these cheaply in such forms and numbers that they could be widely diffused; and the wisdom of associated efforts to this end was soon apparent. Hence sprang up various local tract societies, as in New England, Albany, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. One of the first of these was The Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, Boston, 1803. The Connecticut Religious Tract Society, Hartford, was formed in 1807; The Vermont Religious Tract Society, in 1808. In 1812 The New-York Religious Tract Society arose, and in 1811 The New-England Tract Society, Andover, which was afterwards transferred to Boston, and in 1823 changed its name to The American Tract Society. But the friends of this form of Christian activity were long convinced that it could only be carried on prudently and effectively by a national association centrally located, and securing the confidence and support of evangelical Christians of all denominations. Hence originated, in May, 1825, THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, New York; the Christians of this city leading off in the organization, and the society at Boston and the Christian public joining it. A building was provided for the manufacture and sale of its publications, and the tracts of the Boston society were transferred to New York. The movement gained general approval, and rapidly expanded, and took rank with the Bible Society among the chief interdenominational Christian charities of the nation.

After two years, volumes began to be published in addition to unbound tracts. Handbills, leaflets, children's tracts, illustrated cards, wall-rolls, etc., followed in quick succession; publications in German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Welsh, and Dutch; publications for all ages and classes, and treating upon all ordinary phases of truth and duty, to meet every variety of religious want. In 1833 the publication of periodicals commenced, the number increasing at intervals to supply the sabbath school and the family, in English and in German. Many of these various publications were beautifully illustrated; and in excellence of contents, and attractiveness of style, were unsurpassed by any, and a stimulus and model to many.

For the circulation of its publications, the Society has depositories in Boston, Philadelphia, Rochester, Cincinnati, Chicago, and San Francisco, supplied from the Tract House at New York, and sold at uniform prices. It sells also largely through the trade. So far as its means allow, it furnishes its publications gratuitously, or at reduced prices, in aid of ministers, life-members, missionaries, chaplains, and lay Christians engaged in efforts to reform and save; and these go to soldiers and sailors, to freedmen and immigrants, to hospitals, prisons, and asylums, to poor sabbath schools, to the destitute and neglected in our cities and on our wide frontiers. In many places it has employed the services of local auxiliaries, for systematic tract-distribution, by voluntary Christians making a monthly visit to each house, or canvassing the whole region, to leave a well-chosen volume by sale or gift in each family. For the vast population outside of church care it has employed numerous colporters, going from house to house, supplying some of its publications to all, if possible, by sale or grant, conversing with the families, holding meetings for prayer, and organizing sabbath schools. This system of union missionary colportage this Society originated for this country, sending godly and faithful men to the destitute wherever found,—on our vast and rapidly-advancing frontiers, to the freedmen and to the immigrants. The wisdom, necessity, and efficiency of the plan, are so evident, that the Christian public recognized it as an essential part of national evangelization. It rapidly expanded, and has accomplished a vast work that could not have been done by any church organization. In its forty-two years it has performed the equivalent of some 5,500 years' labor for one man, has made 12,800,000 family visits, has sold or granted 11,600,000 volumes, and led to the organization of very many sabbath schools and churches.

For the direction of its operations, the Society has an executive committee composed of a publishing, distributing, and finance committee of six members each; and the undenominational character of its issues and all its work is assured by the election of men representing at least six different denominations, whose action in the publishing committee must be unanimous. There are three secretaries (each at the head of a distinct department), a treasurer, a business-agent, editors, and a depository. The Tract House is furnished with all facilities for composing, stereotyping, printing, binding, and issuing its books, tracts, and papers, including tens of thousands of stereotype-plates and engravings. The whole cost of the manufacture of its issues and of the administration of its business is defrayed by the sales. But for its benevolent work of grants and colportage, it is dependent on its friends; and to this work all gifts and legacies not donated for special purposes are devoted without abatement. These "benevolent" moneys are the voluntary annual gifts of its friends, in many cases coming regularly and unsolicited; in others it is found necessary to call upon them individually, or by public appeals in each church, and subsequent collections, — a service requiring the employment of several district secretaries, or collecting agents, who are also, in some of the fields, superintendents of colportage.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionaries at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each member representing one of the several denominations there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. — These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1833) to $646,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House for the sole use of foreign missions, — in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,310 different publications, including 694 volumes, — a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

The issues of the Society from its home presses, — numbering 6,971, of which 1,181 are volumes, — have amounted in fifty-eight years to nearly 29,000,000 volumes and 409,000,000 tracts.

Of its periodicals, which are now seven in number, — The Illustrated Christian Weekly and Deutscher Volksfreund, The American Messenger and its companion family monthly in German, and two monthly and one weekly children's papers, finely illustrated, — the total issue for one year is about 1,500,000 copies.

The American Tract Society, Boston, in 1858 resumed for some years its separate organization and work, chiefly for greater freedom of action respecting slavery, but since 1878 again co-operates with the National Society. The Western Tract and Book Society of Cincinnati also co-operates with the Society at New York. W. W. RAND, D.D.,

TRADITION. It is a fact, that, for a long time, oral tradition was the only source from which the Christian faith drew its living waters. Congregations were founded in foreign countries, among foreign people; but paper and ink had nothing to do with the affair. Independent of the fragmentary notices from the hands of the apostles, which circulated among the congregations, but made no claims on completeness, either with respect to history or doctrine (John xxi. 25), the fulness of the faith lived on from mouth to mouth. It was oral tradition which linked an Ignatius, a Papias, a Polycarp, to the apostolical church; and yet their testimony was accepted without doubt as authoritative. There soon came a time, however, when the state of affairs began to change. When the voices of the apostles and of the disciples of the apostles grew silent, and the proofs of the genuineness of tradition demanded some power of discrimination, while at the same time an idea sprang up of the overwhelming grandeur of the part which Christianity was destined to play on earth, it was quite natural that tradition should retire to the background, and more prominence be given to the written documents from the apostolical age. When, about 200, the canon was fixed, it seemed probable, that, within a short time, the writings of the New Testament should become not only the best guaranteed, but even the sole legitimate, source of Christian knowledge.

But just at that very moment circumstances gave to tradition a new significance. Christianity, not yet politically established, but fighting its way through the antagonism of Paganism, had to encounter its first and most formidable rival, Gnosticism. It was the pretensions of the Gnostics which had compelled the Christian Church to fix her canon; and it was now discovered that the apostolical writings, upon which also the Gnostics proposed to take their stand, were insufficient to decide the contest, since they could be interpreted in one way by the catholics and in another by the heretics. In this emergency, tradition was caught at as a saving remedy. Irenæus says, "About the single passages of Scripture there can be different opinions, but not about the totality of its contents, that which the apostles have deposited in the church as the fulness of all truth, and which has been preserved in the church by the succession of bishops." Tertullian goes still further, transferring the idea of prescription from the material to the spiritual, from the legal to the religious sphere. As the heretics, he says, reject some of the books of Scripture, and distort the rest by their false interpretation, the first question is, From whom originated the Scriptures, for whom were they intended, by whom have they been preserved, etc.? The answer must be, From the Christians, for the Christians, by the Christians, etc. Consequently, where we find Christian faith and Christian life, there we may seek for the true Scriptures and their true interpretation; while the heretics, by the very law of prescription, are excluded from forming any legitimate opinion. Thus, in the tradition of the sedes apostolica, people believed they had found an unconquerable weapon against all heresy, not yet surmising that in reality they had found a magical formula by which any thing could be conjured up from the obscurity of the apostolical age, even though all scriptural testimony were lacking.

It took some time, however, before the idea became clearly defined, and attained full practical power. Although, in the congregations of Asia Minor and Greece, there existed a living apostolical tradition, besides the written testimonies of Paul and John, it must not be understood that any one—even not Tertullian, though he recommended such a measure—ever sent messengers to Ephesus, Corinth, Philippi, and Thessalonica, to ask what the apostles had orally taught concerning subordinationism or modalism. On the contrary, Tertullian, in whose interest it certainly lay to argue from tradition, in his work De præscriptione, drew all his arguments, not from the general doctrine of his church, but from the books of the New Testament; and Irenæus, who actually addressed the faithful of his time for advice to Ephesus and Smyrna on the one side, and Rome on the other, made in the Easter controversy the humiliating experience, that the apostolical traditions of those congregations contradicted each other. A tradition with the true characteristic of antiquitas—that is, well-authenticated connection with the source—had become an impossibility. A new characteristic of what was true tradition had to be adopted, namely, that of universitas; that is, universal acceptance throughout the church. But even thus difficulties arose. Cyprian, who invented the theory of the collected episcopacy as the true representative of the church, could not agree with his brother bi-shop of Rome concerning the validity of heretical baptism, and fell back upon the dangerous proposition that tradition without truth was only an old error. For a long time the state was one of transition, fermentation, and confusion.

Under these circumstances the Arian controversy came to exercise a decided influence. Quite otherwise than during the previous contest with Gnosticism, the orthodox theology had now to encounter an adversary, who, like herself, stood on biblical ground. The question was not now of excluding some apparently Pa an element. The whole controversy lay fully within the pale of Christianity; it was essentially exegetical. But in exegetical respect the orthodox theologians were not the proper match for the Arians, and they were consequently compelled to seek aid from tradition. It was, indeed, by claiming to be possessed of the true ancient interpretation of certain passages of Scripture, that the orthodox succeeded in overthrowing Arius at Nicea; and doctrinal tradition was thus introduced under the guise of exegetical tradition. But the mask was soon thrown off. In the East the doctrine of a secret apostolical tradition, from which the master theologians drew their wisdom, was first developed by the three Cappadocians. Basil the Great says in a passage, De Spiritu Sancto, 27 (which, however, is much contested), that Christian theology is derived partly from Scripture, and partly from a secret apostolical tradition, both of which have equal authority; and on the basis of this proposition he develops his doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the West it was Vincentius of Lirinum who gave the final definition of the idea of true tradition. In his Commonitorium occurs the famous passage, Manuscriptum cunctarum est, et ad tractatus, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est ("we must be sure that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all").

However aptly the rules of the Commonitorium were formulated, they would, nevertheless, hardly have been able to take hold of the course of the development, if the idea whose practical organ they were had not happened to find another and most potent agency. But, such as the actual circumstances were, the tradition found in the œcumenical councils, not only a natural ally, but its necessary organ. After the Council of Nicea (325), all duly convened synods were, in accordance with Acts xv. 28, considered as standing under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, as inspired: their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, they appeared as the true twin-brother of the tradition: indeed, their true object was to manufacture tradition. No wonder, then, that the seventh œcumenical council (Nicea, 787) laid its anathema on any one who should dare to reject the tradition of the church, be it oral or written tradition; and the next councils repeated the condemnation. From that moment, tradition, so to speak, flooded the church, carrying along with it every thing,—dogmas, constitutions, etc. Theoretically Scripture and tradition were co-ordinated. But practically it is generally the case, when two principles are placed in co-ordination to each other, that one of them gains the ascendancy; and before long even the most prominent theologians began to argue exclusively from tradition, referring to Scripture only in order to find confirmatory passages. All original productivity ceased, and was supplanted by the compiler's industry, digging in all the corners of the Fathers and the councils, and trusting itself to do nothing above a slight rearrangement of the materials. In the East this whole movement reached its consummation in John of Damascus. In the West it was still continued for several centuries on account of a somewhat different idea of inspiration, according to which, not only the Fathers and the œcumenical councils were inspired, but also the Pope and the great doctors, and the mystics and the monks, in short, the whole church. Abelard's Sic et non fell flat to the ground, with no more effect in the West than the works of Stephanus Gobarus in the East; and as all who felt the need of reform, and practically worked for it,—the Waldenses, the Wiclifites, the Hussites, etc.—naturally turned to Scripture, the Bible received from the church, which had its foundation on tradition, the name of the "book of heresies."

After centuries of slow growth, the new form of the conception of tradition became visible in the negotiations which were carried on between Nicholas of Cusa, as representative of the Council of Basel, and the Hussites, 1433-52. What Gerson in 1404, in discussing the Immaculate Conception dogma, had said with some caution and reserve,—that the Holy Spirit might communicate to later teachers much which had remained unknown to the earlier,—was now repeated by Nicholas of Cusa with tenderness and cynicism, in arguing for the withdrawal of the cup from the laity in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The church, he argued, was not bound by the letter of the Bible; on the contrary, the scriptural text could and should be variously interpreted according to the various circumstances of its application. But who was to decide on such a question? The Pope. The universality of tradition, established by the complete representation of the church in the oecumenical councils, was superseded by its unity, enforced by the verdict of the Chair of Peter. This conception, however, did not appear fully developed until after the breach between the Roman Catholic Church and the Reformation had taken place. Luther's opposition to tradition became one of principle as early as 1520, and in 1522 he declared that tradition could be tolerated only so far as it was in perfect harmony with Scripture. Over against this principle of Scripture being the highest, the absolute authority, which was carried out with still greater rigorously by the Reformed Church, the Council of Trent placed the declaration (April 8, 1546), that there were two sources of Christian knowledge, Scripture and tradition, and that the interpretation of Scripture had to be regulated by tradition; which, however, simply meant the Pope. The arguments on both sides are fully set forth in Martin Chemnitz (Examen concilii tridentini, 1565-73), and Bellarmín (De verbo Dei, 1581). Within the Protestant camp, however, various movements have been made in favor of tradition, — by Lessing, Delbrück, and Daniel in Germany; by Pusey and the Tractarians in England; and by N. F. S. Grundtvig in Denmark.

TRAJAN (Marcus Ulpianus Trajanus), emperor of Rome (98-117), was, no doubt, one of the best rulers of the Roman Empire, and a sincere, mild, even benevolent character. Nevertheless, he was the emperor who issued a decree against the Christians. He made persecution of Christianity legal. The occasion was the appointment of the younger Pliny as governor of Bithynia. In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc., and it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians became very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered martyrdom were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1878), and his panegyric of Trajan.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, a strong re-action took place against materialism. As philosophy, it began in Germany. Voltaire brought from London to Paris the ideas of Hume. From Paris they went with him to the court of Frederick, king of Prussia, and became ruling principles of thought. Kant subjected them to searching analysis in his famous work, the Kritik of Pure Reason, published in 1771, and became the leader in a great philosophical reform. Materialism took no deep root in the German mind. The great names in German idealism are Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the sequence of their doctrine, so far as it can be conveyed in very few words, is as follows: Kant sounded the depths of the human mind; Fichte imparted reality to the idea of the human person; Schelling combined the inward and the outward by supposing an Absolute, which he called reason; Hegel transformed what was to him the unsubstantial reason into a being, thus completing, as is claimed, the fundamental "categories" of Kant. The word "transcendentalism" is of Kantian origin. It means that which is valid beyond the experience of the senses, though present to the knowledge of the mind. It describes a form of idealism. In the judgment of Dr. J. H. Stirling, "The transcendental philosophy is a philosophy of the merely speculative pure reason; for all moral practice, so far as it involves motive, refers to feeling, and feeling is always of empirical origin." Again: "I call all cognition transcendental which is occupied not so much with objects as with the process by which we come to know them, in so far as that process has an a priori element. A system of such elements would be a transcendental philosophy."

In France, materialism was represented by Condillac, Cabanis (author of the saying that "brain secretes thought, as the liver secretes bile"), and others; idealism, by Maine de Biran, Destutt de Tracy, Cousin, Jouffroy, and others.

In England, not to mention the poets, who are always idealists, Coleridge reflected Schelling; and Carlyle, Goethe and Richter. The Aids to Reflection and Friend, of Coleridge, were early reprinted in this country. The writings of Carlyle — articles, reviews, essays (produced from 1827 onward), Signs of the Times, Characteristics, later, Sartor Resartus — were eagerly read in American editions. So far as this goes, transcendentalism in this country was of foreign extraction, an invasion of the German intellect; though it doubtless had roots and a character of its own, being derived from the same general impulse, but shaped by peculiar circumstances.

In New England, materialism was abroad, sometimes implicitly, sometimes by formal statement. Unitarianism, itself a protest, on the ground of common sense, against "Orthodoxy" and "Evangelicalism," was infected with the metaphysics of John Locke. It was a system of rationalism, prosaic, unimaginative, critical, suspicious of ideal elements and manifestations. Its teaching was didactic, its worship was uninspiring, its interpretations of Scripture were literal in the extreme. It was, in the main, a negative system, its forms mechanical, its beliefs traditional, its associations conventional. It was destitute of genius. The elder men, like Channing and Lowell, retained the sentiments of piety which they had brought with them from the faith they had left; but the new society did not share the original enthusiasm. A spirit of individualism was in the air, running occasionally into deism and atheism. In 1832 Abner Kneeland founded The Transcendentalist; in 1836 he was prosecuted for blasphemy. There was great interest in clairvoyance, mesmerism, and kindred doctrines. As early as 1824 F. H. Hedge raised the banner of revolt (in the Christian Examiner for November) against the materialism implied in phrenology, which even then was getting possession of the public mind. There was a rage for the expositions of Gall. The popular lectures of Spurzheim were attended by crowds. Later, Combe's book on the Constitution of Man was hailed as a gospel. Regeneration by bread was proclaimed in the name of Graham. Every kind of medicament was called in to do the work of the Holy Spirit.

At this juncture, idealism appeared in the shape of a protest against the drift of the time towards animalism and externalism. The soil was prepared by orthodox mystics, who proclaimed "the life of God in the soul of man;" by the spiritualism taught by Jonathan Edwards; by the Reformed Quakers, with their doctrine of an all-sufficing "Inner Light;" by the traditions of Abby Hutchinson, Mary Dwyer, and the apostles of soul-freedom. Not that the positions taken by these men and women were the same as those assumed by the transcendentalists. They were not; they were quite different. Indeed, they were precisely opposite; for these all recognized some supernatural authority, whereas the transcendentalists as a class were pure "naturalists," believers in the inspiration of the individual soul; but they looked only at apparent results, disregarding adjacent beliefs. The leaders were young men, almost without exception, educated for the ministry, Unitarians, members of the best class in society, eloquent speakers and talkers, scholars, men of liberal culture, outspoken in the declaration of their opinions. Of these Ralph Waldo Emerson was chief, most seraphic and persuasive, most uncompromising, too, in his ecclesiastical action. He resigned his charge in 1832, from scruples in regard to the "communion-service," which he regarded as a spiritual rite, and was willing to continue as such, not as an ordinance imposed by church or Scripture. Later, he was unwilling to offer public prayer, and retired from the pulpit altogether, making the secular platform his sole visible elevation above the multitude, — an elevation not of authority, but of convenience. A few young men gathered round him. In September of 1836, on the day of the celebration of the foundation of Harvard College, four persons — Emerson, Hedge, Ripley, and Putnam — met together in Cambridge, and, after discussing the theological and ecclesiastical situation, agreed to call a meeting of a few like-minded men, with a view to strengthen each other in their opposition to the old way, and see what could be done to inaugurate a better. At a preliminary meeting at the house of George Ripley, in Boston, there were present Emerson, Hedge, Abbott, Bartol, Brownson, Bartlett (a young tutor at Cambridge). Then and there it was resolved, on invitation of Emerson, to hold a convention at his house in Concord during that same month of September.

Invitations were sent to as many as were known or supposed to be in sympathy with the objects of the meeting. From fifteen to twenty came, among them, W. H. Channing, J. S. Dwight, J. F. Clarke, Ephraim Peabody, Chandler Robbins, George P. Bradford, Mrs. Samuel Ripley, Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Peabody, perhaps Theodore Parker. Convers Francis and Caleb Stetson were the only men of the older generation who took a practical interest in the movement. Dr. Channing was in sympathy with its general aims, but did not show himself. His contemporaries either did not appear, or immediately withdrew. The public got intelligence of the Concord meeting, and gave to the little fellowship the name of the "Transcendental Club," why, it is not easy to discover; for a club it was not in any proper sense of the word. There was no organization, there were no officers, there was no stated time or place of assembling, there were no topics for discussion; in fact, there appears no good reason for calling it "transcendental," unless that term was supposed to carry with it ridicule or opprobrium. The meetings were fitful, and hastily pre-arranged. In ten years there were scarcely more than as many convocations. Some members remained in the church, attempting to combine transcendental ideas with ecclesiastical forms; others left the church for other vocations. Each followed the leading of the individual disposition. The short lived Dial and the shorter lived Massachusetts Quarterly were results of the "transcendental" spirit.

At the time when the transcendental movement was at its height, the atmosphere of New England was filled with projects of reform. Every kind of innovation on existing social arrangements had its advocate, its newspaper, its meetings, its convention. Temperance, non-resistance, woman's rights, antislavery, peace, claimed attention from those concerned for the progress of mankind. Some of these projects were wild, visionary, and, in the eyes of cool observers, grotesque. It is not unlikely that they owed their origin to the same impulse which produced transcendentalism, though the historical and logical connection has not been discovered. That a large part of the ridicule which was vented on the transcendentalists was owing to their presumed affiliation with these summary iconoclasts is more than probable. Nor was such a presumption unreasonable; for the transcendentalists not merely took no pains to correct the impression, but rather gave it encouragement. In 1840 The Friends of Universal Progress held conventions in Chardon Street, Emerson, who was present, gave an account of the meetings in the Dial. He wrote: —

"The singularity and latitude of the summons drew together from all parts of New England and also from the Middle States, men of every shade of opinion, from the strictest orthodoxy to the wildest heresy, and many persons whose church was a church of one member only. A great variety of dialect and of costume was noticed. A great deal of confusion, eccentricity, and freak appeared, as well as of zeal and enthusiasm. . . . Madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunkers, Mingletonians, Communitarians, Groumiers, Agrarians, Seventh-day Baptists, Quakers, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers, all came successively to the top, and seized their moment, if not their hour, wherein to chide, or pray, or preach, or protest. . . . If there was not pur-liamentary order, there was life, and the assurance of that constitutional love for religion and religious liberty which in all periods characterizes the inhabitants of this part of America. . . . These men and women were in search of something better and more satisfying than a vote or a definition."

Emerson's lecture on Man the Reformer was an eloquent arraignment of society. "One day all men will be lovers, and every calamity will be dissolved in the universal sunshine." In his lecture on The Times, delivered the same year (1841), he says, —

"These reformers are our contemporaries; they are ourselves, our own light and sight and conscience; they only name the relation which subsists between us and the vicious institutions which they go to rectify. . . . The reforms have their high origin in an ideal justice; but they do not retain the purity of an idea. . . . The reforming movement is sacred in its origin; in its management and details, timid and profane. These benefactors hope to raise man by improving his circumstances; by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. In vain. By new infusions, alone, of the spirit by which he is made and directed, can he be remade and re-enforced."

But the general public took no notice of the distinction between regeneration and reform: the great body of transcendentalists did not, as the experiment of Brook Farm bore witness. The interest of the transcendentalists in reformers, was in part at least, due to the principle of sympathy, which made them desirous of extending to others the liberty they claimed for themselves. — a feeling that may have led them to extremes in the direction of pronouncement of advocacy, but saved them from practical license.

The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from individualism. But the theories were bolder than the actions. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said, —

"I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, Whosoever. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. . . . The idlest reverie, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect."

Yet no loftier, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love;" but their authors were men of cleanest life.

In religion the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no evil, in no dualism of any kind, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no church. He was humanitarian and optimist. His faith had no backward look; its essence was aspiration, not contrition. His regard was fixed on the individual soul. Very remarkable was his confidence in nature, in natural powers and capabilities, in the results of obedience to natural law, in spontaneity, impulse, unfolding, growth. His love of childhood, flowers, landscape, was proverbial. Emerson called transcendentalism an "excess of faith." But the faith was in human nature as a possible realization of the divine.

At present there is a vehement reaction against transcendentalism, partly from the quarter of the materialists, and partly from the quarter of the supernaturalists. But, except for a few local and incidental extravagances, its influence was noble, and the idealism which was the essence of it is the foundation of all spiritual belief. As one form of the great intuitive school of philosophy, it has, perhaps, seen its best days; but its elements will render vital other faiths, which will endure when it is forgotten. [O. B. TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. xvii. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-36). The transfiguration is that extraordinary episode in Christ's earthly life which anticipated his future state of glory just before he entered the path of suffering, according to his own prediction (comp. Matt. xvi. 21-28; Mark viii. 31-38; Luke ix. 21-27). It marks the culminating point in his public ministry, and stands midway between the temptation in the wilderness and the agony in Gethsemane. It is recorded, with slight variations, by all the evangelists except John, who omits this, and many other events and miracles, as being already known from the popular gospel tradition. It is also alluded to long afterwards by Peter, as an eyewitness of the transcendent majesty of the scene (2 Pet. i. 16-18).

1. The place mentioned by the synoptists is "an high mountain" (ὄρος ὑψηλόν). Peter calls it "the holy mountain" (ὅτι τὸ ὄρος τὸ ἅγιον, 2 Pet. i. 18), from which we may infer that it was well known, and had acquired a halo of glory from the event. The Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi. 37; John vi. 15); and several of the greatest events in the history of revelation, from the legislation on Mount Sinai to the ascension from Mount Olivet, took place on mountains. But the particular mount of transfiguration is in dispute. Three mountains have been named.

(a) Mount Olivet. This rests on the earliest tradition (in the Itiner. Burdig., A.D. 333), but is inconsistent with the context, as Christ was in Galilee before and after the event, and a journey to Judea in the intervening time could not have been left unnoticed. The mountain must be sought in the province of Galilee.

(b) Mount Tabor (the Ἱεραβίον of the Septuagint, the Jebel et-Tûr of the Arabs), an isolated, beautiful dome-shaped mountain, wholly of limestone, on the southern border of Galilee, on the plain of Esdraelon, about eighteen hundred feet above the sea.¹ Owing to its isolation, it looks twice as large as it really is. It rises gracefully, like a truncated cone or hemisphere, from the plain. It is six or eight miles east of Nazareth, and can be easily ascended, on foot or on horseback, in an hour. It is often mentioned in the Old Testament (Judg. iv. 6, II, viii. 18; Ps. lxxxix. 12; Jer. xli. 15), though nowhere in the New. The tradition that Tabor is the mount of transfiguration dates from Jerome, in the fourth century, and soon gained almost universal acceptance. It gave rise to the building of churches and monasteries on the summit of Tabor which should correspond to the three tents which Peter desired to build, — one for his Lord, one for Moses, one for Elijah, forgetting himself and the two other disciples, and "not knowing what he said," in his dreamy state of mind. It also gave the name To Orizapton to the festival of the transfiguration in the Greek Church. There is a poetic fitness in this tradition. No mountain in Palestine was by nature better suited for the event than Tabor. It lies in the very centre of the country, and commands from its flattened summit one of the finest views over many historic scenes of sacred history, — the hills of Nazareth and Mount Carmel in the west, the Lake of Tiberias and Mount Lebanon in the north, the mountains of Moab and Bashan in the east beyond the Jordan, and the Little Hermon and Gilboa, where Jonathan fell, and the plain of Esdraelon, the historical battle-field of Palestine, in the south. For its central location and view, it may be called the Rigi of Palestine.

But two arguments may be urged against this view, which make it at least very doubtful.

(1) The fact that the summit of Tabor was occupied by a city with suburbs of the same name (1 Chron. vi. 77), and was employed without intermission, between the times of Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.) and the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), as a fortification, and hence unfit for quiet seclusion and meditation. See Polybius, V. 70, 6; Josephus, Ant., XIV. 6, 3; Bell. Jud., I. 8, 7, 11, 20, 6, IV. 1, 8. (2) The time of the transfiguration, which occurred only "six days" (ἕξ ἡμέρας i.e., Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; or, more indefinitely, ὥστε ἡμέρας ὀκτώ, Luke ix. 28) after the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi. After the transfiguration, and the healing of the lunatic, it is said that Jesus went to Capernaum (Matt. xvii. 21; Mark ix. 33), and thence to Jerusalem. Now, it is barely possible, but not at all probable, that he should in a few days have gone from Caesarea Philippi to Mount Tabor, passing Capernaum on the way, and come back from Mount Tabor to Capernaum. Dr. Lange (Commentary on Matt. xvii. I, p. 306, Amer. ed.) remarks, "that it is exceedingly improbable that Christ should so suddenly have left his retreat in the highlands of Gaulonitis, and transferred the scene of one of his most secret revelations to Galilee, where he was everywhere persecuted."

(c) Mount Hermon (now called Jebel esh-Sheikh, i.e., "the chief mountain"), the highest peak of the Lebanon range, and the Mount Blanc of Palestine. It rises in three summits very majestically to a height of ten thousand feet above the Mediterranean, is covered with eternal snow, and is visible for many miles in every direction. It can be seen from Gerizim and Tabor, from Damascus, from the northern heights of the Anti-Lebanon and Lebanon, and the plain of Colesyria. Moses could see it from the top of Pisgah in Moab, when "the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan" (Deut. xxxiv. 1). It reaches down to the northern borders of Galilee. Caesarea Philippi, or Banias, lies at its base. The way from Banias to Damascus leads over it, and presents magnificent views. In favor of Hermon as the mountain of transfiguration are, (1) its location at the very place where Christ was a few days before, and (2) its retirement from the busy crowd. "There are several retired platforms on Mount Hermon," says Tristram, "behind the last recess of Palestine, where the scene of the transfiguration may have occurred, with the disciples apart by themselves." It is worthy of note that this event, as well as the confession of Peter, and Christ's great prophecy concerning his church, which the powers of Hades cannot overthrow, should be attached to the border-region between the Jews and the Gentiles, as indicating the point where the gospel left Palestine to become the religion of the whole world. The leading modern writers on Palestine have pronounced in favor of Hermon, and against Tabor. So Ritter: Comparative Geography of Palestine, ii. 312, Eng. trans.; Robinson: Biblical Researches, vol. ii. 330, 358 (Amer. ed.), and his Physical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 26; Stanley: Sinai and Palestine, p. 351, Eng. ed. of 1868; Trench: Studies in the Gospels, p. 192; Tristram: Topography of the Holy Land, p. 233; Keim: Gesch. Jesu, ii. 585.

2. The time of the transfiguration. It probably took place in the night; because it could be seen to better advantage than in daylight, and Jesus usually went to mountains to spend there the night in prayer (Luke vi. 12, xxi. 37, xxii. 29; Matt. xiv. 23, 24). The apostles were asleep, and are described as "heavy with sleep, yet having remained awake" during the act of transfiguration (ἦσαν βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ, ἀγρυπνοῦντες ὅτι, Luke ix. 32); and they did not descend till the next day (Luke ix. 37).

3. The actors and witnesses. Christ was the central figure, the subject of the transfiguration. Moses and Elijah appeared from the heavenly world as the representatives of the Old Testament, — the one of the Law, the other of Prophecy, — to do homage to Him who was the fulfilment of both. They were the fittest persons to witness this anticipation of the heavenly glory, both on account of their representative character and their mysterious departure from this world. Moses died on the mountain, as the rabbinical tradition has it, "of the kisses of Jehovah," in sight of the Holy Land, and out of sight of the world. Elijah was translated alive from earth to heaven on a chariot of fire. Both had endured, like Christ, a forty-days' fast; both had been on the holy mount in the visions of God; and now they appeared on earth with glorified bodies, "solemnly to consign into his hands once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power" (Alford).

Among the apostles, the three favorite disciples were the sole witnesses of the scene, as they were also of the raising of Jairus' daughter, and of the agony of Christ in Gethsemane. Peter alludes to the event in his Second Epistle. John, the bosom-friend of Jesus, probably had in view this, among other manifestations of his glory, when he testified, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). And his brother James, as the protomartyr among the apostles, was the first to follow him into that glory of which the transfiguration was a foretaste and a sure pledge.

1. The event itself. The transfiguration, or transformation, consisted in a visible manifestation and effulgence of the inner glory of Christ's person, accompanied by an audible voice from heaven, declaring him to be the Son of God, with whom the Father is well pleased. The expression used by Matthew and Mark is that the Lord was metamorphosed (μετεμορφώθη). Luke, who wrote for Gentile readers, avoids this expression, and simply states "that the fashion of his countenance was altered." But it was not only his countenance which shone in supernatural splendor: even "his raiment was white and glistening." Or as Mark, borrowing one image from nature, and another from man's art, says, it "became shining, exceeding white as snow, such as no fuller on earth can whiten them." This is one of those incidental picturesque touches, not infrequent in Mark, which betray the report of an eye-witness, and may be traced to a communication from Peter (comp. 2 Pet. i. 18). We have analogies in Scripture which may be used as illustrations. When Moses returned from the presence of Jehovah on Mount Sinai, the skin of his face shone (Exod. xxxiv. 29-35), which circumstance Hilary calls a figure of the transfiguration. Stephen's face, in view of his martyrdom, shone like the face of an angel (Acts vi. 15). The human countenance is often lighted up by joy; and the peace and blessedness of the soul, in moments of festive elevation, shine through it as through a mirror.

In the case of Christ, the transfiguration was the revelation and anticipation of his future state of glory, which was concealed under the veil of his humanity in the state of humiliation. The cloud which overshadowed him was bright, or light-like, luminous (ὁρατός), of the same kind as the cloud at the ascension, or the clouds of heaven at the second advent of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 30; Mark xiii. 26; Luke xxi. 27), and symbolized the presence of God (Exod. xiv. 19, xix. 16; Isa. xix. 1; Dan. vii. 13).

5. Different Explanations.—The event is described as a vision (ὥρα, Matt. xvii. 9). This does not exclude its objective reality: it only places it above the sphere of sense and ordinary consciousness. It was partly an objective appearance, partly a spiritual vision. The apostles saw the scene "in spirit" (ἐν πνεύματι, as distinct from ἐν ῥήματι; comp. Acts x. 10; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Rev. i. 10). They were in an ecstatic "state of supernatural clairvoyance," so to speak, "heavy with sleep," yet "keeping themselves awake throughout." And Peter did "not know what he said," being only half-conscious, overawed with fear and wonder, delighted so as to hold fast this goodly state, yet "sore afraid."

(a) The older orthodox commentators and divines describe the transfiguration as an outward, visible manifestation. Some suppose that Moses and Elijah appeared in their own bodies; others, that Moses, not yet having risen, assumed a foreign body resembling his former body (so Aquinas).

(b) The rationalists resolve the transfiguration into a dream, or a meeting of Jesus with two secret disciples.

(c) Strauss presents it as a pure myth, a poetic imitation of the transfiguration of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 1, xxxv. 29 ff.); similarly Keim, who draws a minute parallel between the two events.

(d) Ewald regards it as an actual occurrence, but with mythical embellishments.

(e) Weiss: a real but spiritual vision of the three disciples.

The circumstantial agreement of the three evangelists who narrate the event, the definite chronological date, the connection with what follows, and the solemn reference to it by Peter, one of its witnesses (2 Pet. i. 16-18), as well as the many peculiar traits to which no parallel can be found in the transfiguration of Moses, refute the mythical hypothesis, and confirm the historical character of the scene. But it is useless to indulge in speculations concerning the precise form and mode of a supernatural event.

6. Significance.—The transfiguration was, as already remarked, a visible revelation of the hidden glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21).¹ It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke's account, the ἔσχατος of Christ—i.e., especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. The event bears a relation to the history of Christ's suffering similar to that of his baptism in the River Jordan to his active ministry. On both occasions he was brought into contact with representatives of the Old Testament, and strengthened for his course by the solemn approval of the voice from heaven declaring him to be the well-beloved Son of the Father. The transfiguration, no doubt, confirmed the faith of the disciples, and prepared them for the approaching trial. It took away from them, as Leo the Great says (Serm. xciv.), the scandal of the cross. It furnishes also a striking proof for the harmony of the Old and New Testaments, for personal immortality, and the mysterious intercommunion of the visible and invisible worlds. Both meet in Christ: he is the connecting link between the two dispensations, as also between earth and heaven, between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. It is very significant, that at the end of the scene the disciples saw no man save "Jesus alone." Moses and Elijah, the law and the promise, types and shadows, pass away; the gospel, the fulfilment, the substance, Christ, remains, the only one who can relieve the misery of earth, and glorify our nature,—Christ all in all.

7. The transfiguration has given rise to one of the greatest works of art ever conceived by the genius of man. It is the best artistic comment on this supernatural event. The picture under that name was the last work of Raphael, and was carried after his coffin at his burial in the Pantheon of Rome. He died of this masterpiece, in the prime of early manhood. The original is in St. Peter's at Rome, and has been multiplied in innumerable copies. It represents Christ soaring above the earth, in a halo of glory; Moses with the tables of the law on one hand, Elijah on the other; the three disciples, with their characteristic features, at their feet, gazing in a half-dreamy state at the dazzling light; and beneath this scene of celestial peace the painter represents, in startling contrast, the suffering of the lunatic, whose healing follows in the Gospel narrative. So the Christian must ever descend from the heights of festive joy and the occasional foretaste of heaven to the hard work of daily life, before he can attain to final rest and glory.

TRANSMIGRATION of souls from one body to another, through the death of the former and the birth of the latter, forms an important element of Buddhist ethics, and was also taught in ancient Egypt; but it never took root in Greek mythology, in spite of Pythagoras and Plato; or in Judaism, though it is found in the Cabala; or in Christianity, though Jerome relates that it was taught by some obscure sects, and reminiscences of it are found, not only among the Fathers, but also in the middle ages.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, a scholastic term (from trans and substantia, "a change of one substance into another," μεταβολή, Wesenveränderung), introduced in the twelfth century,¹ for the Roman-Catholic theory of the real presence in the Eucharist.

1. The DOCTRINE is, that the elements of bread and wine in the sacrifice of the mass are, by the consecration of the priest, transubstantiated, i.e., changed as to their essence, into the very body and blood of Christ, while the visible form and the appearance of bread and wine remain to the sight, touch, and taste. The miraculous change is supposed to take place simultaneously all over the world, day after day, wherever the priest pronounces the words of institution, — "This is my body," "this is my blood."

The doctrine was suggested by several Greek and Latin Fathers under different terms, such as μεταβολή, conversio substantia, transitio, transmutatio. It was first clearly set forth (without the term) by Paschasius Radbertus in the ninth century, by Lanfranc in the eleventh, defended by the leading scholastics, and confirmed in 1215 by the Lateran Council under Pope Innocent III., which declared its belief on the subject in these words: "Verum Christi corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini veraciter continentur, TRANSUBSTANTIATIONE pane in corpus et vino in sanguinem potestate divina." The doctrine was finally settled for all orthodox Roman Catholics by the Council of Trent (in the thirteenth session, Oct.

11, 1551), in opposition to the Protestant denial, in the following terms: —

"This holy Synod doth now declare it anew, that, by the consecration of the bread and of the wine, a conversion is made of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood; which conversion is, by the Holy Catholic Church, suitably and properly called Transubstantiation."

Canons 1-1 of the same session condemn the contrary opinions. The same statement is repeated in the Tridentine Profession, art. vi. (See the Latin and English text in Schaff: Creeds of Christendom, vol. ii. 130, 136, 137, and 208.)

The doctrine as thus stated involves a stupendous miracle, or, rather, a series of miracles and magic transformations. It is not only above reason, but contradicts directly the testimony of three senses. All attempts of Catholic divines to explain it by scholastic distinctions of various kinds of presence, and by speculations about the relation of the substance to the accidents, are failures. Two opposite tendencies meet in this dogma: on the one hand, the divine is materialized; and, on the other hand, the material is spiritualized. Christ's real body and blood are enclosed in the narrow dimensions of the sacramental elements, and yet they are everywhere, by innumerable acts of priestly creation, wherever the mass is celebrated; and they are wholly partaken of by the mouth (yet not digested) by every communicant, good or bad, without division or diminution.¹

The doctrine of transubstantiation led, with other causes, to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity to avoid possible profanation by spilling the blood of Christ; and both the doctrine and the usage combined greatly to strengthen the power of the priesthood, and to widen the gulf between the priesthood and the laity.

It may be admitted that a great and precious truth underlies this as every other great error; and it is the truth which gives the error such power and tenacity over millions of devout Catholics to this day. This truth is, that Jesus Christ is the bread of life from heaven, and nourishes

"*Dogma datur Christianis,
Quod in carnem transit panis,
Et vinum in sanguinem.
Quod non corpus, quod non vitæ,
Antiqua firmat fides
Potest rerum ordinem.*

*Sub diversis speciebus, Signis tantum et non rebus,
Potest reverentur.
Carnibus, sanguis potus,
Manet tamen Christus totus,
Sub utraque specie.*

*Assumente non concius,
Non confractus et non divinus,
Integer in capite.
Sumit unus, sumunt mille,
Quantum isti, tantum ille,
Nec sumtus consumitur.*

*Sumunt boni, sumunt mali,
Sorte tamen iniqui.
Vile vel interius.
Mors est malis, vita bonis:
Vile, parvis sumptibus
Quam ut dispere citius."*

See the whole hymn of the Doctor Angelicus in Dante's Theatrum Hymnologicum, t. II. 97-100, with interesting notes.

¹ According to Dr. Matteo (R. C.), in Wetzer and Welte, xl. 134, the term transubstantiation or transubstantiatio was not officially used in the Catholic Church before the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

his people spiritually by faith, as truly as he fed the five thousand physically by the miracle of the five loaves. The error lies in the carnal, Capernaïtic misunderstanding; and this is condemned by our Lord at the close of that very discourse which sets forth that great and comforting truth (John vi. 63). The flesh profits nothing, the spirit makes alive.

II. The ARGUMENTS which Papal divines produce in defence of this doctrine are:—

1. Eireptical.—(a) A literal interpretation of the words of institution.—“This¹ is my body;” “this” [which, however, refers to the preceding “cup,” the wine not being mentioned] “is my blood of the covenant” (Matt. xxvi. 26, 27). The Lutheran symbols agree with this exegesis, but nevertheless reject transubstantiation. The Reformed symbols reject it for the following reasons: (1) the word “is” may indicate a figurative as well as a real relationship between the subject and the predicate, and often means “represents,” or “sets forth,” in the Septuagint and the Greek Testament (e.g., Gen. xli. 26, 27; Matt. xlii. 38, 39; Gal. iv. 24; Rev. i. 20); (2) the surrounding circumstances of the institution of the Holy Supper (the living Christ amidst his disciples, his body not yet broken, his blood not yet shed, etc.) forbid a strictly literal interpretation, and application to the first celebration; (3) the literal interpretation cannot be carried out, inasmuch as the Lord himself (Matt. xxvi. 27; Luke xxii. 20) and the apostle Paul, in quoting the words of institution (1 Cor. xi. 25, τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, etc.; x. 16, “the cup of blessing,” etc.), substitute the “cup” which contains the wine, for the wine itself; i.e., they use the figure of synecdoche conduplicis pro contento; and yet no Catholic assumes the transubstantiation of the vessel.

(b) The mysterious discourse of our Lord in the synagogue of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52-59). To this may be objected, that this discourse is appealed to by theologians for different theories of the Lord's Supper; that many of the ablest exegetes deny the reference of this section to the Lord's Supper, which at that time was not yet instituted; that in any case the words of our Lord (John vi. 63)—“It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life”—furnish the key for the understanding of the preceding discourse and of all our Lord's discourses; and that, finally, if any theory of the Lord's Supper is favored by that discourse, it is one which confines the fruition of the Lord's flesh and blood to the believer, since every one that eateth his flesh, and drinketh his blood, is said “to have eternal life,” “to abide in Christ and Christ in him,” and “to live forever” (vi. 53, 56, 58)—all of which can be said of believers only; while the Roman Church teaches that unworthy as well as worthy communicants partake of the literal body and blood of Christ, though with opposite effect.

2. Historical.—The Roman Church appeals to the Fathers, especially Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ambrose. It is true that a materialistic conception of the real presence and fruition of Christ set in at a very early date, we may say with Ignatius, Justin Martyr, and Irenæus (although the last speaks of the consecrated bread and wine as “antitypes” of the body and blood of Christ); but it is equally true that different theories prevailed among the Fathers; that the African divines—Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine—teach a symbolical and spiritual, rather than corporeal, presence; and that the Alexandrian school of Clement and Origen put the whole design of the Eucharist in feeding the soul on the spiritual life and the divine word of Christ; hence the Fathers have been appealed to for the Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Zwinglian theory, as well as for the Roman-Catholic. (Compare on the patristic views the doctrine histories of Muncher, Hagenbach, Baur, Nitzsch, and the writer's Church History, II. 241 sqq.) Nor has any of the seven œcumenical councils made a deliverance on the doctrine, except the second of Nicea, in 787, which sanctioned the worship of images, and declared that the elements after the consecration were no mere figures or antitypes of the body and blood of Christ, but really the body and blood. John of Damascus said substantially the same; and the Greek Church has even adopted the Roman dogma, under the name μετομοσις.

But this result was not reached in the Latin Church till a much later period. During the middle ages two controversies on the real presence took place, which prove that transubstantiation was not yet fixed in the mind of the church. The first controversy occurred in the ninth century. Paschasius Radbertus, abbot of the monastery of Corbie, first expounded and defended transubstantiation in a tract, De Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis Domini (831, 2d ed., 844), but expressly says that some taught only a spiritual communion of the soul with the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The tract provoked considerable opposition, and Ratramnus (Bertram), also a monk of Corbie, refuted it (without mentioning the name of his abbot) by a tract, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini ad Carolum Calvium.¹ He appealed to the Scriptures (John vi. 63) and to St. Augustine, and taught that bread and wine remain unchanged after consecration, as the water in baptism, but become the significant symbols of a spiritual communion with Christ by faith; so that the body and blood of Christ were present, and partaken of only spiritually et secundum potentiam. John Scotus Erigena, Higerar, Rabanus Maurus, and, in part, Gerbert, likewise wrote against Radbert's view. (See Neander: Church History, Boston ed., iii. 191-502, and Schaff, Ch. History, IV.) The second eucharistic controversy took place in the eleventh century. Berengar of Tours (between 1040 and 1050) attacked in a work, De Cana Sacra, the doctrine of transubstantiation as contrary to reason, to the Scriptures, and to the older church Fathers, especially St. Augustine. His former friend Lanfranc, prior of Bec in Normandy, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1089), was the principal champion of transubstantiation. He first drew the logical inference from the doctrine, namely, that unbelievers as well received the essence of the sacrament (but not its substantia efficiens). Hildebrand, then papal legate in France, afterwards Pope Gregory VII., for a while protected Berengar; but a Roman synod condemned him as a heretic. Berengar was forced to commit his writings to the flames; but on returning to France he renewed his opposition, was again cited to Rome, and even Pope Gregory VII. could not protect him any longer against the powerful current in favor of transubstantiation: he saved him, however, from a violent end. Berengar was allowed, after a sort of forced recantation, which he afterwards regretted, to retire to a solitary island near Tours, and lived till 1088. (See Neander, iii. 502-530; Schaff, Ch. Hist. IV.)

After this, the doctrine of transubstantiation triumphed completely in the Western Church, and held its sway almost undisputed till the sixteenth century. It fell in with the magic supernaturalism and superstitious piety of mediæval Christianity. Thomas Aquinas has given it poetic expression in his famous hymn, Lauda Sion Salvatorem, for the Corpus Christi Festival. Thomas à Kempis, in his inimitable book on The Imitation of Christ, best represents the devotional use made of it by pious Catholics.

III. OPPOSITION.—The forerunners of the Reformation began the opposition, especially Wiclif, Hus, and Wessel. The Reformers were unanimous in rejecting transubstantiation as a fundamental error, contrary to Scripture, to reason, to the testimony of the senses, to the very nature of the sacrament, and leading to gross superstition and the adoration of the host (first prescribed by Cardinal Guido in Cologne, 1263). The last was denounced as downright idolatry (though it follows as a logical consequence from the doctrine that the very body and blood of our Lord are literally present on the altar).

There was, however, a serious difference among the Reformers in the extent of opposition. Luther, from conscientious conviction, adhered to the literal interpretation of the words of institution, the doctrine of the corporeal presence, and the fruition of the true body and blood of Christ by all communicants (though with different effect), but substituted for transubstantiation the idea of co-existence of body and blood "in, with, and under" bread and wine during the sacramental transaction; while Zwingli and Calvin gave up the literal interpretation, and the latter substituted for the idea of a corporeal presence the idea of a spiritual real presence, and for manducation by the mouth and the teeth a spiritual real fruition by faith alone. TRAPP, John, b. in 1601; d. at Weston-on-Avon, 1669, where he had been vicar since 1624. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. Besides God's Love Tokens (London, 1637), he issued a Commentary on the entire Bible, in 5 vols. folio, 1651-56 (reprinted, edited by Revs. W. WEBSTER and HUGH MARTIN, with Memoir by Rev. A. B. TRAPPISTS, The, are the members of an order in the Roman Catholic Church which arose out of a Cistercian abbey founded by Count Rotron of Perche, in 1140. This abbey, called "Notre Dame de la Maison Dieu," lies in a damp, unhealthy valley, reached by a narrow and stony passage; hence the name La Trappe ("the trap"). The monks distinguished themselves by austerity until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, when they became so notorious for revelling, licentiousness, and robbery, as to win the title of the "Bandits of La Trappe." This state of affairs continued till the middle of the seventeenth century, when the abbey passed into the hands of Dominique Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Ranée, then (1636) a boy of ten years. The young abbot was well endowed with mental gifts, but abandoned himself to a wild career of sensual indulgence. Overcome by feelings of repentance, he went to the opposite extreme of austerity, retired to La Trappe, and, in spite of opposition on the part of the monks, carried through a rigid discipline. In order to do this, he introduced some Benedictine monks to his abbey.

Ranée's rules obliged the inmates of La Trappe to rise at two o'clock, and retire at seven in winter, eight in summer. They slept on sacks of straw, spent eleven hours daily in spiritual exercises, the rest of the time in hard work. During the hours of work, as in all their relations to one another, the monks observed almost absolute silence, and in greeting one another used the formula, Memento mori ("Remember that we must die"). Their wishes were made known through signs. Their fare was simple, consisting of vegetables, bread, and water. After the evening meal, the monks spent a short time in digging upon their future graves. Their garb was a long cloak with wide sleeves, of a gray color, and a black cap.

Ranée was opposed to literary pursuits, and expressed his views in the Traté de la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique, 1683. He was answered by Mabillon, in his Traité des études monastiques, 1691. Rancé died Oct. 12, 1700. In 1692 Princess Louise of Condé founded a female branch of the order at Clacot, France; and branches were also established near Florence and Düsseldorf. The Revolution drove the Trappists out of France. They found refuge in Switzerland, where Augustin de Lestrange founded a cloister at Valsainte, canton of Fribourg. In 1798 it was destroyed by the French. Lestrange found a refuge in Warsaw and Cracow, Poland; but the Trappists were expelled from here in 1800, and, after various attempts to get a foothold in Germany and Italy, were put in possession of La Trappe after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1817. Lestrange was very active until his death (1827), and succeeded in establishing various branches of his order. In 1829 a royal order was issued, closing the Trappist houses; but nine remained, several of which, however, were closed in 1830. In 1844 the Trappists opened a house in Algiers, and in 1848 some of them emigrated to the United States. A branch of the order took the name of the "Trappist Preachers," in 1851. It does mission-work, and has its seat in the monastery of Pierrevire, near Avallon. [Since 1870 the Trappists have ceased to have legal existence in Italy and Switzerland. In 1893 a colony, under the direction of Lestrange himself, settled near Conewago, Penn. After different removals, it moved, in 1813, to Tracadie, N.S. In 1848, Trappists from La Meillerie, in France, emigrated to Kentucky; and a second establishment has been founded near Dubuque, Io. TRAUTHSON, Johann Joseph, a distinguished ecclesiastic of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in Vienna, 1701; d. in Vienna, March 10, 1757. In 1751 he was made archbishop of Vienna, and in 1759 honored with a cardinal's cap by Benedict XIV. He caused a great deal of excitement by his pastoral letter of Jan. 1, 1751, in which he exalts the work and intercession of Christ at the expense of the intercession of the saints, and urges the proclamation of the central truths of the gospel. The letter called forth a number of writings from Protestants and Catholics. Trauthson, however, had no thought of protestantizing the Church. He succeeded in introducing some reforms, as the diminution of the number of holy days in his diocese. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

TRECELLES, Samuel Prideaux, LL.D., b. at Woolhouse Place, Falmouth, Jan. 30, 1813; d. at Plymouth, April 24, 1875. He was educated at the Falmouth classical school; was employed in the North Abbey Iron-works, Glamorganshire, 1828 to 1834; and in 1836 became private tutor at Falmouth. From early life he took an interest in New-Testament textual studies, and in his twenty-fifth year formed the design, to which he gave his life, of preparing a critical edition of the Greek New Testament, with a text derived from the oldest manuscript versions prior to the seventh century, and citations from early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. In 1838 he issued a first specimen of his plan, and in June, 1844, the first instalment, — The Book of Revelation. He made three visits to the Continent (1845-46, 1849-50, 1862) to collate the ancient manuscripts. In 1845 he spent five months in Rome; but, although permitted to see, he was not allowed to collate, the Codex Vaticanus. In 1848 he published his Prospectus for a Critical Edition of the Greek New Testament, now in Preparation, with an Historical Sketch of the Printed Text (Plymouth, 27 pp.); but the first part of his great work, containing Matthew and Mark, did not appear until 1857 (London). By the side of the Greek he gives Jerome's Latin Version from personal collation of the Codex Amiatinus. He was stricken with paralysis in 1861, just after Part Second had appeared, and again in 1870, while at work upon Part Sixth (Revelation), which appeared in 1872. Part Seventh, containing the Prolegomena, and finishing the work, appeared in 1879, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. Besides his Greek New Testament, Trevelles edited the Codex Zacynthius (1861) and the Canon Muratorianus (Cambridge and London, 1868); revised the manuscript and superintended the publication of The Englishman's Greek Concordance to the New Testament (London, 1839, 2d ed. 1841), Index to (1845), The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance to the Old Testament (1813, 2 vols.); translated Gesenius' Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon (1847); wrote the 4th vol. of the 10th ed. of Horne's Introduction (1856), and the original, independent volumes, Remarks on the Prophetic Visions of the Book of Daniel, 1847, 4th ed. enlarged by Notes and Defence of the Authenticity of the Book, 1852; On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, 1850; The Jansenists, 1851; Lecture on the Historic Evidence of the Authorship and Transmission of the Books of the New Testament, 1851; Heads of Hebrew Grammar, 1852; Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision on Critical Principles, 1854.

Trevelles was of Quaker parentage, but in early life joined the Plymouth Brethren, from whom, however, he later separated himself. He was active in charitable and philanthropic enterprises. In 1850 he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of St. Andrews; in 1863 he was put upon the civil pension-list for one hundred pounds per annum, and later for two hundred. In 1870 he was invited to join the New-Testament Company of the English Revision Company; but ill health prevented him from attending. For a criticism upon his textual labors, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 277, and SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament (1883), pp. 262 sqq.

TREMELLIUS, Emmanuel, b. of Jewish parentage, at Ferrara, about 1510; d. at Sedan, 1580. He was converted to Romanism by Cardinal Pole, and to Protestantism by Peter Martyr, with whom he went to Strassburg, and thence to England in 1547, where he enjoyed the friendship of Cranmer and Parker, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge. When Queen Mary came to the throne (1553) he went to Germany, and taught Hebrew at Hornbach, Heidelberg, some time at Metz, and finally was appointed professor of Hebrew at the university of Sedan. His fame rests upon his elegant Latin version of the Bible, which appeared in parts, between 1575 and 1579, at Frankfort-on-the-Main (2 vols.); New-Testament part reprinted in London, 1580; best edition of whole work, Hanau, 1621. In it he was aided by his son-in-law, the elder Francis Junius, who in the second edition joined to it Tremellius' version of the Syriac New Testament (Paris, 1569), and Beza's of the Greek (Geneva, 1590).

TRENT, Council of (Concilium Tridentinum), the nineteenth, or, according to another reckoning, the eighteenth, of the oecumenical councils recognized by the Roman-Catholic Church; so called from Trent (Tridentum), a city in the southern and Italian part of the Tyrol, where it was held, with interruptions, from Dec. 13, 1545, to Dec. 4, 1563. In a doctrinal and disciplinary point of view, it is the most important council in the history of the Roman Church, and fixed her character, and relation to the Protestant evangelical churches. It produced her highest standards of faith and practice, which have since been supplemented by the Vatican Council (in 1870). It was called forth by the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and demanded by both parties in the contest, but was again and again postponed by the policy of the papal court. Finally it was convened as an exclusively Roman council, by order of Pope Paul III., at Trent (at that time a free city of the Holy Roman Empire under a prince-bishop), on Dec. 13, 1545; transferred to Bologna in March, 1547, from fear of the plague; indefinitely prorogued, Sept. 17, 1549; re-opened at Trent, May 1, 1551, by Pope Julius III.; broken up by the sudden victory of Elector Maurice of Saxony over the emperor, Charles V., and his march into Tyrol, April 28, 1552; recalled by Pius IV., for the last time, Jan. 18, 1562, when it continued to its final adjournment, in Dec. 4, 1563. It closed with "Anathema to all heretics, anathema, anathema." The history of the council is divided into three distinct periods, — from 1545 to 1549, from 1551 to 1552, and from 1562 to 1563. The last was the most important.

The decrees and canons of the council were confirmed by a bull of Pope Pius IV., Jan. 26, 1561. This bull enjoins strict obedience upon all Catholics, and forbids, under pain of excommunication, all unauthorized interpretation, reserving this to the Pope alone, and threatening the disobedient with "the indignation of Almighty God and of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul." The number of attending members in the three periods varied considerably. It increased toward the close, but never reached the number of the first oecumenical council at Nicea (which had three hundred and eighteen members), nor of the last of the Vatican (which numbered seven hundred and sixty-four). The decrees were signed by two hundred and fifty-five members, including four papal legates, two cardinals, three patriarchs, twenty-five archbishops, a hundred and sixty-eight bishops, two-thirds of them being Italians. Lists of the signers are added to the best editions of the decrees.

The object of the council was twofold. (1) To condemn the principles and doctrines of Protestantism, and to define the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church on all disputed points. It is true the emperor intended it to be a strictly general or truly oecumenical council, at which the Protestants should have a fair hearing. Melanchthon and Brentius, with some other German Lutherans, actually started in 1552 on a journey to Trent; but they were refused a deliberative voice, and their mission was an entire failure. (2) To effect a reformation of discipline, which was admitted by all honest and earnest Catholics to have fallen into such deplorable decay as to explain, if not to justify, the Reformation.

Twenty-five public sessions were held, but about half of them were spent in solemn formalities. The chief work was done in committees or congregations. The entire management was in the hands of the papal delegates. The court of Rome, by diplomacy and intrigue, outwitted all the liberal elements. The council abolished some crying abuses, and introduced or recommended disciplinary reforms as regards the sale of indulgences, the morals of convents, the education of the clergy. In this respect the Reformation produced a salutary effect upon the Roman Church itself, as is admitted by the best historians of that church. But in regard to the department of doctrine, although liberal evangelical sentiments were uttered by some of the ablest members in favor of the supreme authority of the Scriptures, and justification by faith, no concession whatever was made to Protestantism.

The doctrinal decisions of the council are divided into decrees (decreta), which contain the positive statement of the Roman dogmas, and into short canons (canones), which condemn the dissenting Protestant views with the concluding "anathema sit." They are stated with great clearness, precision, and wisdom. The decree on justification betrays special ability and theological circumspection. The Protestant doctrines, however, are almost always exhibited in an exaggerated form, and mixed up with real heresies, which Protestants condemn as emphatically as the Church of Rome.

The following is a list, in chronological order, of the articles of faith which were settled by the council in favor of the views held ever since by the Roman-Catholic Church: —

Session III. (Feb. 4, 1546). — Decree on the symbol of faith (the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed as a basis of the following decrees).

Session IV. (April 8, 1546). — Decree on the Scriptures (including the Apostolus and church tradition, which are declared to be the joint rules of faith. The Latin Vulgate is put on a par with the original text).

Session V. (June 17, 1546). — On original sin.

Session VI. (Jan. 13, 1547). — On (progressive) justification by faith and good works, in opposition to justification by faith alone.

Session VII. (March 3, 1547). — On the seven sacraments in general, and some canons on baptism and confirmation.

Session XIII. (Oct. 11, 1551). — On the sacrament of the Eucharist.

Session XIV. (Nov. 25, 1551). — On the sacraments of penance and extreme unction.

Session XXI. (July 16, 1562). — On communion under both kinds, and the withdrawal of the cup from the laity.

Session XXII. (Sept. 17, 1562). — Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

Session XXIII. (July 15, 1563). — Sacrament of ordination.

Session XXIV. (Nov. 11, 1563). — Sacrament of matrimony.

Session XXV. (Dec. 3 and 4, 1563). — Decrees approving the scholastic doctrines of purgatory, the invocation, veneration, and the relics of saints and sacred images, also on the selection of food, fasts, festive days, and providing for an index of prohibited books, catechism, breviary, and missal, to be issued under the direction of the Pope.

The council was acknowledged in Italy, Portugal, Spain, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and the Roman-Catholic portion of the German Empire, but mostly with a reservation of the royal prerogatives. In France it was never published in form, and was only recognized in its doctrinal part. No attempt was made to introduce it into England. Pius IV. sent the decrees to Mary, Queen of Scots, with a letter, dated June 13, 1561, requesting her to publish them in Scotland; but she dared not do it in the face of John Knox and the Reformation.

The canons and decrees of the council were first published by Paul Manutius (Rome, 1564), and often since in different languages. Best Latin edition by Le Plat (1779), and by Schulte and Richter (Lips., 1853); best English edition by Rev. J. Waterworth with a history of the council, Lond., 1848.

The original acts and debates of the council, as prepared by its general secretary, Bishop Angelo Massarelli, in six large folio volumes, are deposited in the Vatican Library, and remained there unpublished for more than three hundred years, until they were brought to light at last, though only in part, by Augustin Theiner, priest of the oratory (d. 1871), in Acta genuina SS. Œcumen. Concilii Tridentini nunc primum integre edita, Lips., 1871, 2 vols. Most of the official documents and private reports, however, which bear upon the council, were made known in the sixteenth century and since. The most complete collection of them is that of Le Plat; Monum. ad Hist. Conc. Trident., Levan., 1781-87, in 7 vols. New materials have been brought to light by Mendham (1831 and 1846) from the manuscript history of Cardinal Paleotto, and more recently by Sichel (Actustücke aus österreichischen Archiven, Wien, 1872), and by Dr. Dollinger (Engdruckte Berichte zur Geschichte des Conc. v. Trident, Nordl., 1876, 2 parts; Druffel, Mon. Trid., Munich, 1884 sqq.).

The history of the council was written chiefly by two able and learned Catholics of very different spirit.—the liberal, almost semi-Protestant monk FRA PAOLO SARPI of Venice (Historia del Concilio Tridentino, first, London, 1619, and repeatedly since in Italian, Latin, French, and German; best ed., with notes by COURAYER, Amsterdam, 1751, 3 vols.; Eng. trans. by Sir N. BRENT, 1619, also 1676), and, in the interest of the Papacy, by Cardinal SPORZA PALLAVICINO, who had access to all the archives of Rome (Historia del Concilio di Trento, Rome, 1656-57, 2 vols. fol., and other eds. Rome, 1665, Milan, 1717, 3 vols. 4to; Latin trans. by J. B. GUTHRIE, Antwerp, 1673, fol.). Both accounts must be compared to get a full view. For a criticism of both, see RANKE'S History of the Popes, Appendix, and BRISCHKE'S Bearthigung, etc., Tübing., 1844. WESSNERBERG, a liberal Catholic, gives a history in the third and fourth volumes of his work, Die grossen Kirchenversammlungen des 15^{ten} und 16^{ten} Jahrh., Constanz, 1810. Professor LOW Bishop HEFFEL intended at first to carry his valuable History of the Councils (Conciliengeschichte) down to the Council of Trent, but gave it up at last for reasons assigned in his Preface to vol. vii. part ii. (1873), and stopped with the Councils of Basel and Florence. Among Protestant historians of the Council of Trent we mention SALIG (1741-45, 3 vols.), DANZ (1846), J. A. BUCKLEY (London, 1852), BUNGENER (in French; Eng. trans. by D. S. SCOTT, Edinburgh, 1855; republished by McCLINTOCK, New York). Dr. PEISEY discusses the doctrinal articles in his Eirenicon. On the Tridentine Standards, see SCHAFF: History of the Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 90-100, and vol. ii. 77-210. A good sketch of the Council is given in the fifth volume of GIESELER'S Church History (Eng. trans. by HENRY B. SMITH and MARY A. ROBINSON, N.Y., 1880), pp. 21-44, with judicious extracts from the sources. Cf. KÖLLNER'S Symbolik, vol. i. 8-60, the art. "Trienter Concil.", by H. SCHMIDT, in the first edition of HERZOG, vol. xvi. 369-394, and Cardinal HERGENROTHER'S Kirchengeschichte (24 ed.), vol. ii. pp. 402-422. See also TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH. PHILIP SCHAFF.
